Notes and Clippings.

THE church of England requires $58,000,000 a year.

THE witch-burners of Salem were as fond of baked bein's as their descendants in Boston now are.

MR. ABBOT, of the Index, was recently heard by our special agent indulging in the following soliloquy:

"Oh, when I think of what I are,
And what I used to was,
I feel I hove myself away
Without sufficient cause."

AT the time of the French revolution in 1792, there were in France 27,000 monks, 37,000 nuns, and 70,000 priests, and the church's yearly revenue amounted to $36,000,000. There are now some 80,000 or 90,000 priests in that country.

THE London Comstock, Mr. Charles Hastings Collette, solicitor to the Society for the Suppression of Vice, has been brought before a police magistrate charged with the appropriation to his own use of a sum of £2,300, for which he was trustee under the marriage settlement of Mr. and Mrs. Henry Charles Finch.

DR. V. M. WHITE, of London, publishes statistics to show that Catholicism is declining relatively in the United Kingdom. In 1841 the Catholics formed twenty-seven per cent of the population: now their proportion is eighteen per cent. He thinks, however, that the political influence of the church of Rome has increased.

PROFESSOR TYNDALL, speaking of the theory of evolution, says: "I share Virchow's opinion that the theory of evolution in its complete form involves the assumption that, at some period or other of the earth's history, there occurred what would now be called spontaneous generation. I agree with him that the proofs are still wanting."

LEO XIII. in a recent address speaking of the Infidelity of the day declared that the error which surmounts all others and infects the proud intellects of the age is "that cold and base naturalism which has now invaded all classes of public and private life, substituting human for divine reason, nature for grace, and disowning the Redeemer.

IN one of his recent harangues Joe Cook expressed indignation and surprise that something or other should hav occurred "within sight of those cultured streets of Boston." We were aware that certain Bostonians, not having the fear of the Queen's English before their eyes, are in the habit of describing themselves as "cultured;" but it was reserved for Joe Cook to detect the same mysterious peculiarity in the streets of that astonishing city.—Sun.

A COMMITTEE of the Park Street church, Boston, reported lately that it had made patient investigation among the converts of the recent revival meetings in that city, and found a marked falling from grace among those who had been most earnest in religious professions a year ago. The Rev. Dr. Withrow, in reading the report from his pulpit, said that with few exceptions the converts had relapsed into a condition worse than that in which they were previous to their professed change of heart.

THE main reason why so many of the clergy array themselves in strange garments, to each of which they affix a mystic signification, hav strong views about candles and other church ornaments, weary their followers respecting the advantages of fish dinners over meat dinners, and urge young ladies to confess their sins to their spiritual pastors, is because they hav more energy than brains, and, not being able to make themselves famous, are all the more eager to attain some sort of notoriety.—London Truth.

HOW ANTHONY COMSTOCK and the bigots behind him must long to hav, in America, laws similar to those of Turkey. There they hav sentenced a Mussulman priest to death for assisting to translate the Bible into the Turkish language. That is, in Turkey, Infidels are executed. Now, if Comstock could only get things in shape to make hanging, burning, or something of that kind the punishment for Infidelity here, his obscenity and lottery laws might go to the dogs for all he would care. He would hav so much business mingled with pleasure in attending to the Ingersolls, the Frothinghams, and the Adlers of this wicked and perverse generation that all his other affairs would get rusty from neglect.—Truth.

OFFICIAL censorship over the mails is just now being pushed a little too far by Postmaster-General Key. The latest will be found in his report to Congress recommending that newspapers containing lottery advertisements shall be excluded transportation in the mails. This is the most cheeky and impudent proposition that has yet appeared from that source. Dictating to the press of this country what advertisements a publisher shall accept in order to be allowed the use of the mails! A little more of this kind of censorship and the people will begin to wake up and ask questions of the present administration that will be difficult to answer.—Le Claire (Iowa) Pilot.

THE other day a sensible jury decided by their verdict not to believe Anthony Comstock on oath. Let us trust that the day of this creature's downfall may be near at hand. Under the pretense of virtue this Comstock has committed outrages against human nature. Under the cloak of virtue he has perpetrated deeds at which hardened vice would blush. He has been a spy, an informer, a betrayer. He has tempted to the commission of crime in order to pound the law upon his victims. He has forced even a newspaper man to blush for and at human nature. But he has come to the end of his rope. We would like to know he were literally at a rope's end.—The Postal Card.

THE recent Old South fair in this city afforded another illustration of the scandalous manner in which good morals and the laws of the state are often defied. Not only was gambling in the form of raffling carried on freely, but it was understood to represent the deliberate policy of the managers. It would be hard to find a more flagrant violation of either morality or the law of this state than the gambling in question. The facts are the more serious because it is a common occurrence for North End gamblers to be arrested and punished by our courts. They are no more really guilty than those concerned in the raffles of our popular fairs, the difference being that the latter are better dressed and hold pews in fashionable churches.—Boston Congregationalist.

A MISSIONARY making a journey through Zululand was entertained at a native's hut. An old woman from a distant place, where the people had never heard of God or the Bible, related the following tradition: "One of the Zulu ancestors, long ago, stood by the river, lifted his stick and the water stood up like walls, so that the people passed over on dry land." She told of another who had slept and dreamed of a "climbing way" up to the sky, with the "maids of heaven" going up and down, and of his waking and placing stones to mark the spot. Also, of a boy who had slain a great giant with stones from the brook, and who afterwards was made king. These must be traditions of Jacob at Bethel, the passage of Israel over the Red Sea or the Jordan river, and the slaughter of Goliath by David.

ONE by one the leading scholars and professors in all branches of science are being forced to the conclusion that the Mosaical account of the creation must be regarded as fiction rather than fact. One of the latest who has announced himself as having reached this conclusion is Prof. Richard A. Proctor, than whom there is no abler and profound astronomer living. The New York Herald, in its report of a recent lecture of his on "The Religion of Astronomy," says: "On the subject of the existence of design or purpose in the many planetary systems Prof. Proctor said that candor compelled him to say that he could not discover any. Intention did not seem to have any place in the constant evolution of new worlds." It will now be in order for a certain class of theologians to denounce Prof. Proctor as an ignoramus, as a horse-thief, and as a villain!—Duluth Tribune.

IN an apology for the daily press publishing so many reports of criminal doings, the La Crosse daily Democrat says: "So far as its responsibility for crime is concerned because of its publication, it may cite a distinguished example which even the most sentimental caviller will not underrate—the Bible. Those who hav perused that sacred volume, whose pages teem with circumstantial accounts of many fearful crimes, will scarcely deny that the people of the day in which it was written were worse than the people of our day; that the sacred historian was not more choice in his language than the modern reporter, and that the subjects therein are fully equal in villainy and repulsiveness to those which now often monopolize the columns of the daily newspaper. In fact, there are far worse ideas and more obscene language between the lids of the Bible than that for which Bennett now lies rotting in a New York jail. Chapter after chapter of a book which is the established rule of life for all Christianity contains language which, used in a daily newspaper, would prohibit its circulation in the mails and send its publisher through the United States courts to a felon's cell."

THAT remarkable concern, the Young Men's Christian Association—which the Court of Common Pleas lately decided was a public charity, and therefore entitled to exemption from taxation upon its great building at Fifteenth and Chestnut streets, Philadelphia—has shown how much of a charity it really is in its conduct toward the members of the new church, commonly called Swedenborgians. The new church, remarks the Dispatch, is a Christian sect: but it is not sufficiently Calvinistic to suit the managers at Fifteenth and Chestnut streets. Therefore, when Rev. Chauncy Giles of the First New Jerusalem church made application to rent the theater which is in the Hall building, for the purpose of delivering a series of lectures on "The Natural and Spiritual Death, and Resurrection and Life after Death"—in all of which he expected to show how the doctrines of his church agree with the Bible—the Young Men's Christian Association managers refused to rent the hall to him upon the ground that he was not "evangelical." Any wandering fiddler, any professor of legerdemain, any manager of concerts at which profane secular songs are sung, may rent Association Hall without any difficulty. But when a minister who does not belong to the favored sects seeks the use of the hall for a good and moral purpose, the managers of this great public charity—to support which the Court of Common Pleas, No. 1, says the citizens generally should be taxed—hold up their hands in holy horror and say: "Oh, no; we might let the hall to a bagpiper, or to a pedestrian tournament, go-as-you-please; but when it comes to renting a place to a minister who is not evangelical, we could not think of assisting in such a sin as that!"

BEECHERISM.—A celebrated preacher takes liberties with the Bible and his hearers which would speedily reduce a less noted man from his position in the pulpit. Extracts from Henry Ward Beecher's sermon of Sunday, Nov. 31st, are published, which must sound rather heterodox to Dr. McCosh and other celebrated theologians. The sermon was founded on the text, "I am not ashamed of the Gospel of Christ," an affirmation made by Paul in his epistle to the Romans. On this Mr. Beecher said:

"If Paul was now on earth, seeing the products of the centuries, it would be very inane for him to say, 'I am not ashamed of Christ.' Yet in some respects the glorying of Paul was not mere declamation, for who was Christ? Who God was he had told them—'God who made the world:' but who was Jesus? A peasant, mechanic at a period of the world when workmen were very low in the social scale, and if one had asked who was divinity that you worship, he would hav said 'Jesus.'

"'Of what country?'

"'Nazareth.'

"'Who were his parents?'

"'Joseph and Mary, reputedly.'

"'Who was his mother?'

"'Mary, who just escaped a divorce through the magnanimity of her betrothed.'

"'Who was his father?'

"'No one.'

"' . . . What is his country?'

"'Judea.'

"'Um—a Jew—a bastard Jew. What did he do?'

"'Worked as a carpenter in the shop of his putative father.'

"'What became of him?'

"'He was charged with a violation of the Roman laws, tried and convicted, and put to death.'

"'Um—a bastard, Jewish mechanic, a malefactor, put to death for violation of the laws of his country; is that the fellow you bring to me to worship?'

It is supposed that the middle spans of the bridge had been carried away by a storm before the train approached.

"God in the Constitution," or Not?

LECTURE DELIVERED BEFORE THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF HANNIBAL, MO., BY D. JENKINS.

The following form of petition to Congress in behalf of the proposed Religious Amendment was recommended by the National Reform Association at their Convention, in New York, Feb. 27, 1873:

To the Honorable the Members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The undersigned, citizens of the United States, petition your honorable body for such an amendment to the Constitution of the United State as shall suitably express our national acknowledgement of Almighty God as the source of all authority in civil government; of the Lord Jesus Christ as the ruler of nations, and his revealed will as of supreme authority, and thus indicate that this is a Christian nation and place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of the government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

Also:

Believing that Almighty God is the source of all power and authority in civil government; that the Lord Jesus Christ is the ruler of nations, and that the revealed will of God is of supreme authority in civil affairs, etc.

If he is the ruler of nations, why does he permit them to fight each other?

Is the church dangerous to republican institutions? Should we use all reasonable and just means to prevent the union of church and state? Is it customary for Protestants to fear Roman influence? Equally so for Romanists to fear Protestant power? Hav we any cause to fear either?

When the church combined with the state in the 4th century, orthodoxy established itself on the universal throne of the known world. The Fathers of the church were honored and their writings read and studied. Greek learning fell into disrespect. It was sustained some time by the other Platonists, and the sacred togas vied with the Christian word. It was taught in the Serapion of Alexandria, the then center of refinement, art, culture, scholarship, and learning. The sects into which Christianity then became divided quarreled among themselves. Each sect as it obtained recognition from the government alternately persecuted and was in turn persecuted by its rival. It is customary for Christian champions of truth to declare that among the Latin and Greek writers of this period there is nothing extant written against the Christian religion except what we hav of Porphyry and Celsus, the fragments of whom we gather from the quotations from the Fathers referring to them. It is argued from this that they were not worthy of preservation, and the literary world suffered them silently to sink into contemptible oblivion. But they seldom inform us that they were condemned to be burnt by Christian authority. They do not tell us (which is the fact) that no pagan writings were permitted to be read. They do not proclaim proudly the fact that these ancient Christians, so near the time of the "blessed Savior," made it a crime worthy of death to even possess or read a heretical Christian book. They seldom tell us that it became as much as a man's life was worth to oppose Christianity or to teach even the reformed Platonic philosophy. They do not tell us, for instance, the story of the gifted, beautiful, eloquent, accomplished daughter of Theon of Alexandria, the great mathematician. This sweet and learned young lady, going to the school where she lectured on philosophy so eloquently as to excite the envy and hatred of the holy Archbishop St. Cyril; this "Mistress of Philosophy," must be silenced at all hazards. The women, who were to keep silent in the churches, must not be permitted to outshine the stars of God. Her beauty, her position, her learning, her brilliancy, her eloquence, must not be permitted to lead away souls from the ministers and the sanctuaries of the Most High. As she went forth one day to her Academy, she was seized by the bare-legged, black-cowled monks, servants of the "Man of Sorrows," and this beautiful teacher was dragged from her chariot, stripped naked in the streets of a great city, and, says one: "Her sweet person, that seemed to embody all the enchantments of ancient Grecian art and eloquence, poetry and philosophy, was then drawn into a Christian church, murdered by the club of Peter the Reader, and her flesh scraped from the bones with sharp shells, and the mangled remains flung into the flames. With Hypatia expired the flickering flame of philosophy in the Eastern world. Literature and learning lay prostrate at the feet of the church all through the long night of the dark ages." The Christian saints would not permit the learning and eloquence, or virtues, of such pagan saints and martyrs to be venerated or perpetuated; but disgusting monks, hooded monastics, cowled priests, lying, hypocritical saints, and bloody persecutors, with hands of iron and hearts of stone, bishops and archbishops, cave saints and pillar saints, perfumed with the stench of their own filth and overrun with vermin, are held up by the church as the exemplars of the world, and their glory arises about in proportion to their uselessness.

Cruelty, from the age of Moses, has ever been the accompaniment of godliness; and just in proportion as man has been enabled to love the divinity has he been able to despise humanity. The history of the dark ages is only the history of crimes and persecutions; of bloodthirsty cruelty, lust for power, tyranny, ignorance, darkness, oppression, superstition, vice, piety, and crime. Every new idea was an enemy to the church and its infallible head, and decreed by the powers which be and which were ordained of God to be destroyed and burned; and in order to destroy it, it was necessary to consume the vessel which contained it. So pious were many, indeed, that they had more of the article than they needed, and the vicegerent of the Almighty kept a storehouse for the surplus, and so greatly had it accumulated that the holy Fathers sent out peddlers to sell it for the benefit of sinners. Thus commenced the "sale of indulgences" in the Christian church, where license to vice, sin, and crime of any character could be purchased for a trifle; robbery, theft, arson, burglary, adultery, incest, and murder were licensed on very reasonable or moderate terms, the surplus virtues or godliness of the saints being thus utilized to fill the coffers of the church and sanctify every species of iniquity and crime. That was Christianity in the 16th century, and this the conduct of the "Bride, the Peerless Bride!" for "Lo, I am with you always, even unto the end of the world. Amen." Jesus had promised, and not one jot or tittle of his word should pass away till all be fulfilled.

We will pass over all the long, dreary night of the middle ages, with its flames, fagots, and faith, its licentious priests and monster popes, its ordeals and trials by Providence to obtain that to which all were entitled. We speak not of Pepin and Charlemagne, or of Charles V. even. Their lives are household words to every student of history.

It is generally believed that no danger is to be apprehended from any or all Protestant sects. But hav we no Protestant persecutions? Did Protestantism encourage science or knowledge? or were Protestants, too, only the blind adherents of another faith? Says the great historian, James Anthony Froude, in his "Short Studies on Great Subjects:" "A greater man than Macaulay or Buckle, the German poet Goethe, says of Luther that he threw back the intellectual progress of mankind for centuries by calling in the passions of the multitude to decide on subjects which ought to hav been left to the learned. Goethe, in saying this, was alluding especially to Erasmus" (p. 44). This was the great scholar, philosopher, scientist, and poet of Germany's opinion of his own countryman. Says Luther, "Intellect does not understand religion, and when it comes to the things of God it laughs at them." We are inclined to believe that Luther was right. But would such a man be likely to encourage intellect and its search for knowledge? Alas, even the Holy Inquisition was founded by a saint—St. Dominic.

Our saints are the great inventors, instructors, and utilitarians of the ages, who hav something to show in the way of human improvement, advancement, and happiness; in relieving human suffering; in lessening human labor, and ameliorating man's condition.

When Calvin burnt Seruetus over a slow fire to prolong his sufferings, he was thoroughly versed in the theology of scripture. When Luther and Melancthon sanctioned the act, they were admired and not censured by the whole Protestant world. When Knox, according to Chambers, favored the murder of Reggio, because he was a Catholic, was he less a Protestant or Christian? Says Froude: "Thus even the best men lent themselves unceremoniously to the most detestable cruelty. A poor woman was burned at St. Andrews when Knox was living there, when a word from him would have saved her" (p. 152). Oh, how they tortured Sympronеus Mitelus there, by the most horrible inflictions, in the name of the Bible, the church, and religion. This was Presbyterian religion in early days.

The most bigoted, intolerant, and Catholic pious of all nations is Spain. Says Buckle: "The influence of the French skeptics and Armada curtailed the power of the Inquisition in Spain," etc. (vol. ii, p. 86.) "Their influence put an end to the war of religious opinions by making a treaty with Turkey which Spain never would otherwise have done, and astonished all Europe" (p. 88). Says the same historian, of Presbyterian Scotland: "It was to Protestantism what conservative Spain was to the Roman church—the most pious, bigoted, and backward of all countries." Says Buckle: "Of this (opposition to the crown) the preachers availed themselves to strengthen their own influence, and for upwards of a century their exertions stopped all intellectual culture, discouraged all independent inquiry, made men in religious matters fearful and austere, and colored the whole national character with that dark hue which, though now gradually softening, it still retains" (vol. ii, p. 268). Again, page 365, he says: "It was therefore natural that in Scotland in the 17th century, when the authority of the clergy was most uncontrolled, the consequences of that authority should be most apparent. It was natural that a literature should be created such as that of which I hav given some account; a literature which encouraged superstition, intolerance, and bigotry; a literature full of dark misgivings and of still darker threats; a literature which taught man that it was wrong to enjoy the present, and that it was right to tremble at the future; a literature in a word which, spreading gloom on every side, soured the temper, corrupted the affections, numbed the intellect, and brought into complete discredit those bold and original inquiries without which there can be no advance in human knowledge and consequently no increase of human happiness" (vol. ii, p. 455). In speaking of the inductive method by which all our successful scientific investigations are pursued, Buckle says: "The only exception to this (inductive method) is theology. There the inductive method, as I hav already observed, is inapplicable, and nothing remains but deduction, which is quite sufficient for the purposes of the theologian. For he has a peculiar resource which supplies him with general principles, from which he can argue; and the possession of this resource forms the fundamental difference between him and the man of science. Science is the result of inquiry; theology is the result of faith. In the one, the spirit of doubt; in the other, the spirit of belief. In science, originality is the parent of discovery and is therefore a merit; in theology, it is the parent of heresy, and is therefore a crime. Every system of religion the world has yet seen requires faith as an indispensable duty; but to every system of science it is a hinderance instead of a duty, inasmuch as it discourages those inquisitive and innovating habits on which all intellectual progress depends. The theologian, thus turning credulity into an honor and valuing men in proportion as they are simple-minded and easy of belief, has little need to trouble himself with facts which indeed he sets at open defiance in his eagerness to relate portentous and often miraculous events" (vol. ii, p. 459). Again, this great historian says: "I speak not on vague rumor, but from what I know as existing at the present time, and for the accuracy of which I can vouch and hold myself responsible. I challenge any one to contradict my assertion when I say that, at this moment, nearly all over Scotland the finger of scorn is pointed at every man who in the exercise of his sacred and inalienable right of free judgment refuses to acquiesce in those religious notions and to practice those religious customs which time indeed has consecrated, but many of which are repulsive to the eye of reason, though to all of them, however irrational they may be, the people adhere with inflexible obstinacy. Knowing that these words will be widely read and circulated in Scotland, and averse as I naturally am to bring on myself the hostility of a nation for whose many sterling and valuable qualities I entertain sincere respect, I do nevertheless deliberately affirm that in no civilized country is toleration so little understood, and that in none is the spirit of bigotry and persecution so extensively diffused. Nor can any one wonder that such should be the case who observes what is going on there. The churches are as crowded as they were in the middle ages, and are filled with devout and ignorant worshipers who flock together to listen to opinions of which the middle ages alone were worthy. . . . And the result is that there runs through the entire country a sour and fanatical spirit; an aversion to innocent gayety; a disposition to limit the enjoyments of others; and a love of inquiring into the opinions of others, and of interfering with them, such as is hardly anywhere else to be found; while in the midst of all this there flourishes a national creed, gloomy and austere to the last degree; a creed which is full of forebodings, and threats, and horrors of every sort, and which rejoices in proclaiming to mankind how wretched and miserable they are; how small a portion of them can be saved; and what an overwhelming majority is necessarily reserved for excruciating, unspeakable, and eternal agony" (vol. ii, pp. 462-3). This is the production of Presbyterianism as the national church of Scotland. How do you like the fruits of its spirit and the spirit of its Calvinistic theology? So says the great scholar, historian, and thinker, and who can gainsay him? Is it not a perversion of man's nature? But Christianity crooks men downward and earthward to make them upright, according to orthodox theology.

But hav Protestants never persecuted? Who persecuted the Nonconformists? Who chased the Covenanters into the dens and caves of the mountains? Who applied the utmost refinement of cruelty to Roman Catholics in the Netherlands? Who persecuted the Shakers? "Men and women," says the edict, "who disobey this command shall be punished as disturbers of public order. Women who hav fallen into heresy shall be buried alive; men, if they recant, shall lose their heads; if they continue obstinate, they shall be burned at the stake" (Froude's "Short Studies on Great Subjects," p. 45). This was Protestant cruelty with the Bible in their hands. Sweden is said to be at this time the most bigoted, persecuting, and intolerant country in Europe. Does the Bible in their hands prevent them? Did it prevent the enactment of the Blue laws in New England, or the erection of the stake and scaffold in Old England?

Luther is a representative man of Protestantism. See a specimen of his culture, meekness, wisdom, and elegance, and wonder not at Protestant bitterness. Said he of Henry V., in his controversy with him, "He is an ass, a pig, a dunghill, the spawn of an adder, a basilisk, a lying buffoon dressed in a king's robes, a mad fool with a frothy mouth and a whorish face;" and afterward said to him, "You lie, you stupid and sacrilegious king."

And he addressed the pope as follows: "Little pope, little popey; you are an ass, a little ass; walk softly, it is slippery; you may break your legs, and then it will be said, What the devil is all this? the little ass of a popey is crippled. An ass knows that he is an ass; a stone knows that it is a stone; but those little asses of popes don't know that they are asses" (Veny's Lives, p. 40).

"Perhaps," says Cobbett, "the world has never in any day seen such a nest of atrocious miscreants as Luther, Zuinglius, Calvin, Beza, and the rest of the distinguished reformers of the Christian religion. Every one of them was notorious for the most scandalous vices even according to the confession of his own followers. They agreed in nothing but in the doctrine that good works were useless, and that the saints, as they modestly called themselves, would not forfeit their right to heaven by any sins, however numerous and enormous, and their lives proved the sincerity of their teaching. There was not a man of them whose acts did not merit a halter."

It is related by Luther's friends that in his later years he could not hear the name of the great philosopher Aristotle without throwing him into a fury. "He is," says Luther, "truly a devil; a horrid calumniator; a wicked sycophant; a prince of darkness; a real Apolyon; a beast; a most horrid impostor on mankind; one to whom there is scarcely any philosophy; a public and professed liar; a goat; a complete epicure—this twice execrable Aristotle." The schoolmen, so Luther said, were "locusts, caterpillars, frogs, lice." He entertained an abhorrence for them. These opinions, though not so emphatically expressed, were entertained by Calvin. (Draper, quoted by Jamieson in TRUTH SEEKER, Sept. 13, 1879, p. 592.)

"He that says the gospel requires works for salvation, I say flat and plain he is a liar. . . Erasmus of Rotterdam is the vilest miscreant on earth. Whenever I pray, I pray for a curse on Erasmus. . . Every doer of the law, and every moral worker is accursed, for he walketh in the presumption of his own righteousness. . . I should hav no compassion on these witches. I would burn them all" (Luther's "Table Talk.") What may we expect of Protestantism, when such is the language of the great representative man of the Christian Protestant world, to whom they all look up with so much admiration? But Luther's learned companion, the so-called amiable Melancthon, is often referred to for his mildness, innocence, kindness of heart, and genuine amiability and goodness. In a letter to Calvin, after the burning of Servetus in a slow fire, Melanchton says to that fierce persecutor: "The church owes you a debt of gratitude. Your magistrates acted justly in putting to death that blasphemous man." Can we expect tolerance and kindness from the followers of such as these?

We hav spoken of the great reformer of France and Switzerland, Calvin, and his persecutions (Did he understand the Bible?); of Luther and Melancthon of Germany, who approved the burning of Servetus; of Knox, the great reformer of Scotland, and of the Protestants of Old and New England. Did Luther and Melancthon, and Calvin and Knox, understand the Scriptures? Did they violate its sacred commands? If so, which? If the study of the Bible did not prevent persecution in the past, why will it now? If they acted inconsistent with it, who has the right to judge them? And by what rule are they to be judged? Did God's spirit enlighten them to burn and persecute others? If not, how do we know that God's spirit had anything to do with their reforms? If it did, did his spirit cause them in their zeal to burn God's enemies? And does God's spirit assist to do only what we approve?

Protestantism and the study of the Bible hav been tried among the Scandinavian nations as Lutherism; in Switzerland, etc., as Calvinism; in Scotland, as Presbyterianism; in England, as Episcopalianism; and in New and Old England, as Puritanism. In every country where it has held political power it has persecuted most unmercifully those whose minds were not so constituted as to think its thoughts, travel in its ruts, bear its mark or its flag, sing its songs, and pray its prayers. We hav no way of judging its future but by its past. Is it, then, safe to giv it the purse and sword of the whole people, and trust it again with temporal power? If the Bible and piety hav proved no guarantee for the safety of the people and their exemption from the abuse of priestly power in the past, by what process of reasoning can it be shown to be a security for the future? Said the shrewd son of the forest? "If a man cheat me once, shame on him; but if he cheat me twice then shame on me." What, then, shall we say of those who permit themselves to be cheated continually by the same parties in the same way? Do our silly sheep suppose that no man can take such care of the whole flock as the wolves? Alas for those who are ignorant in spite of experience!

We hav not quite forgotten the bloody scenes among the Druses of Mt. Lebanon of a few years ago; of the Turkish or Mohammedan horrible massacres of three years ago; of the equal atrocities of the Greek Christians, perpetrated on account of their faith, the orgin of the late Roumanian and Turkish war. "These persecutions were by the Greek church, the least persecuting of Christians," says Draper. We hav read of the persecutions of heretics a few years ago in southern Russia—about the driving into exile, dragging through ponds in the midst of winter, and other terrible enormities perpetrated upon those who were heretical in faith. We view even now with sympathy the hundreds emigrating from that country to ours to avoid persecution or oppression by the Roman church.

Thus we see that the Greek and Roman, or Eastern and Western Christians, with the civil power in their hands, hav used it to oppress and persecute. The Lutheran, the Presbyterian, the Episcopalian, and the Puritan, alike hav proved unworthy or unsafe to be intrusted with power united to the state.

The Catholic church alone, it is claimed, hav put to death, for the sake of orthodoxy, over fifty millions of their fellow-beings. When we add to this the disgrace and contumely, the injury to reputation of themselves and their families, the excommunications and interdicts, the consignment of their names to obloquy and everlasting infamy, we may form a slight idea of what they hav done. The "Bloody Assizes" would never hav been held uninspired by the church. The Star-Chamber originated in a zeal for God and religion. The Inquisition was the work of priestly zealots. Hatred of the bitterest character ever experienced to man was inspired by love to God and his church.

It is not long ago that Protestants were put to death in Mexico for the Protestant faith. Are these the men, either Protestant or Catholic, to be intrusted with power? We hav trusted them much; they hav betrayed those who trusted them time and again. Whose fault shall it be if we trust them again with power? What says the voice of experience? What says the warning voice of blood and slaughtered millions from the ground? Beware!

O Religion, what crimes have been committed in thy name!

It now seeks exemption from taxes, asking a partiality to be shown it by our government shown to no other property. Shall it be granted, and a property belonging mostly to the wealthy classes of nearly five hundred millions of dollars be exempt from taxes, which are rapidly increasing, and we take all the load of additional taxation necessary for their relief?

They ask that God and the scriptures should be acknowledged in the Constitution of our country. What for? Is God and his book a thing dependent in any way upon laws and constitutions? Would it cause the country to believe more fully in them? Would it increase the nation's faith? Would it elevate the Christian's hope? Would it prove the greatest good to the greatest number, or no good at all? They say it would to all intents and purposes be essentially the same. If so, why make any change? If essentially the same there would be nothing gained. And why such efforts for nothing? But if it produce any effect it will, we think, be a bad one, and therefore should not be made.

It must acknowledge Jesus Christ to be the king and ruler of nations. But is he? If he is, then is he not responsible for all the wars, crimes, ambitions, and wickedness of nations, especially where they are (as most of them are) united with the church? Is he responsible for the ultra-pious Protestant power, England, in waging a war for the promotion of vice in the opium war against China? God was acknowledged in the Rebel Constitution. Did that prove that the Rebels were his people and they fighting in his cause? But the idea is simply absurd.

They wish to hav laws against blasphemy, etc. We hav such now—a dead letter on the statute books of the country. Laws to protect the Omnipotent, who thunders forth, "Vengeance is mine; I will repay, saith the Lord"! yet is so weak that senates here must enact laws with heavy penalties against others to protect his reputation! Alas for a reputation, even of a god, that needs statute laws, and even national constitutional provisions, to protect it! Why wish for more stringent laws for the observance of the Sabbath? Suppose they first enforce those which they hav. Who is to judge how a man should observe it? Is my neighbor, or neighbors, who make laws, authorized to direct me in its observance? Hav I a right to direct others? Are a man's conscientious duties towards himself or his maker to be the subject of laws and legal enactments? Is conscience to be coerced? Is a part to dictate to the whole in matters of conscience, belief, and practice? Alas for our country when one man is to decide in matters of faith and practice for another, and enforce the same by authority of law! Does might make right? Are the majority to decide for the minority and compel compliance to their enactments? And if one's religion differs from mine or another's, enforce ours upon him if necessary at the point of the bayonet? Would not such laws and law-makers be justly held in abhorrence? The very idea of making Christianity a thing of constitutions, and religious duties a matter of state policy and legal enactments, is the very spirit of the past—of the Inquisition and persecution. By what right do the majority seek to make laws to coerce the consciences of the minority in matters of faith? Why should the Persian, who keeps Thursday holy; the Mohammedan, who keeps Friday; or the Jew, who keeps Saturday, all be compelled in a free country like ours to keep holy a day which neither of them believe? Would you convert them to its observance by law? Is force the proper way to convince them of their duty? Would you endear Christianity to all by persecuting those who do not believe it? Has the preacher given up the cause to the magistrate? You pray that men should observe Christian ordinances, and fulfill your own prayers by enacting laws to be enforced, if necessary, at the point of the bayonet. Is that moral suasion or legal suasion? Is it the boasted moral power you talk of so much? Sixty thousand ministers, and millions of believers, so-called, are praying, "Thy kingdom come, thy will be done on earth," and then aid it by compelling acquiescence in what they deem its requirements! Are you better than your bloody forefathers of persecuting fame?

But it is argued that we would find protection in universal intelligence and the spirit of the age against persecution were the Constitution which now partially protects us changed. Is it so? Why change it at all? Men hav always persecuted each other from a sense of duty. Hav men lost their sense of duty now? Did that prevent the persecutions of the past? Did it protect the murdered child of Freeman against its parents and the approval of his church? Did it prevent the imprisonmen of Prosch, of Dr. Foote, of George Francis Train, of E. H. Heywood, of Blood, of Tennie Claflin, of Victoria Woodhull, of poor Lant, or of D. M. Bennett? Attempt is even now being made to remove the eminent scholar and author from the superintendence of New York public schools, not for incompetency or unfaithfulness, dishonesty, default, or inability—he is tried and known to be competent, honest, and faithful—but it is ascertained that he believes that the spirits of the dead commune with the living; that we may enjoy the companionship of those who hav bid farewell to their bodies on earth. What a crime! To think that our dear ones are not wholly lost to us unfits a man for an office of trust and honor. Alas for Mr. Henry Kiddle! He has since resigned.

Prof. Swing, in a late lecture, says: "So late as the sixteenth century all the leaders in the new Protestantism freely held to the idea that persons who should stubbornly refuse to be converted should be put to death. Luther and his companions believed in religious conquest by persecution; and up to the very border of our era the leaders of the gospel cause spread their domain just as Cæsar extended the Roman Empire."

Mrs. Annie Besant, a brave, true, talented woman, of irreproachable character, had her eight-year-old child taken from her arms, rudely torn away from a kind mother's care, in England's metropolis, because its mother was a disbeliever. A woman cannot, under certain circumstances, be intrusted with the care of her own children unless she acknowledges a young Jewish reformer as her Savior, in the very same country, too, which Buckle eulogizes as "the majestic edifice of national liberty which stands alone in Europe like a beacon in the midst of waters." Were the laws more thoroughly Christianized, and persecutions under them set on foot in our land, it is supposed that the mass of the people, and even of the church and priesthood, would be opposed to oppressive and severe measures. But do we not see in all ages that the extremists lead public opinion and mold public thought?

Again, the same causes in like circumstances produce similar effects. The same causes that produced the Star-Chamber, the torturing and burning of witches, etc., and the Inquisition, are still, or may be, in full force, and the superior enlightenment is not a safe guarantee.

Concerning the persecutions of witches, Macaulay says: "It is not on them (the clergy) that our blame should fall; it is on the system that made them what they were. They were but illustrations of the great truth that when men hav come to regard a certain class of their fellow-creatures as doomed by the Almighty to eternal and excruciating agonies, and when their theology directs their minds with intense earnestness to the contemplation of such agonies, the result will be an indifference to the sufferings of those whom they deem the enemies of their God, as absolute as it is perhaps possible for human nature to attain."

Says Sir Walter Scott concerning the same subject: "It may be noticed that times of misrule and violence seem to create individuals fitted to take advantage of them and having a character suited to the seasons which raise them just as a blight on any tree or vegetable calls to life a peculiar insect to feed upon and enjoy the decay which it produces."

But here we may inquire, in the case of Macaulay, whether the clergy are not the authors of the pernicious system, and therefore in the highest degree blamable. Also whether, in Sir Walter's simile, the insect is not the cause and not the effect of the decay which is deplored. Maggots riot in carrion, but if death is produced by murrain, which is only a preceding maggot, the maggot tribe must bear the blame. "Where the carcass is, there will the eagles [as well as the carrion crows and turkey-buzzards] be gathered together."

If Christianity is to be enforced upon unbelievers, or obedience to it be compelled by laws, should your faith, my Christian brother, be a rule for my conduct? Can virtue be manufactured by laws? Is there any virtue in a compelled obedience? Can you attract men to you and your faith by punishing them for infraction of what you hold sacred but which they do not? Does God wish you to compel others to serve him or obey his requirements?

There is not, for instance, one text, word, or syllable in favor of keeping holy the Christian Sabbath in the whole Bible. The first day of the week was not holy, nor did your God rest on that day, but the seventh. You hav only the authority of the Roman Catholic church in favor of your Sabbath. Would you use American laws to enforce Roman Catholic institutions upon the people? Does might make right in matters of conscience? Again, we ask, Should the majority enforce obedience to the requirements of religion upon the consciences of the minority? Hav the heretical minority no rights which the orthodox majority are bound to respect? Are not our convictions as sacred to us as yours to you? Why insist in enforcing your convictions upon those who are unconvinced? Must they act contrary to their own convictions or be convinced by law? Is the strong arm of the law to be again raised as a means of conversion? We ask that the law should confer no advantage on one class or belief over another. Our motto is, "Privilege for none, justice for all." Why should not our Christian brethren be willing that we should enjoy all the rights under the Constitution and laws that they do? Hav we not an equal individual interest in them? Did not our friends do as much and labor as faithfully to establish them? Hav we not fought and many of us died to sustain them? And shall the very means for which men hav suffered be used as a means of crushing them? Is it generous or just that a country built up by the whole, sustained by the whole, and defended by the whole, should be ruled over in matters of conscience by a part? Should men who hav risked their lives in defense of equal rights to all be deprived of those rights in that land? Should not the descendants of the skeptical or unbelieving Colonel Ethan Allen, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Thomas Paine, or Thomas Jefferson, hav the same rights as the followers of John Wesley, who sided with the Tories, or Carroll, of Carrollton, who was a Roman Catholic? If we hav, as we are told, an Infidel Constitution, has not our country prospered under it? And, if changed, ought not Infidels to be consulted in that change and their rights protected equal to their Christian fellow-citizens? If it is right for Christians to legislate as they may suppose their faith requires, because in a majority, does it not follow that when unbelievers obtain the majority they should legislate as their belief requires? And should Christians then blame them for oppression begun by themselves? Should they complain if unbelievers profit by their example—if the measure they mete should be measured to them again? If unbelievers should at some future time persecute believers after having been persecuted by them, whenever in power, in every country, land, clime, and age, should not then their complaints be unheard, unheeded, and unavailing? Is there not such a thing as retributive justice? "For with what judgment ye judge ye shall be judged," saith the book. Is it because God is unable or unwilling to protect and sustain his own that you wish to make laws for that purpose?

Christian brethren, since the world began, the unbelievers hav never persecuted the believers. There has never been persecution of any faith or religion without priests connected with it. And, again, wherever freedom has been crying against oppression, wherever there has been opposition to the tyranny of priests or kings, skeptics and unbelievers hav been on the side of freedom, and the church and priesthood against it.

The priesthood hav sustained tyranny and oppression more than any other instrument or institution on this planet; instigated more wars, encouraged more hatred and bitterness between men; been more unjust, pretentious, supercilious, proud, haughty, assuming, presuming, and revengeful; put to death more human beings, and upon the most frivolous pretenses; enacted more unjust laws; been more severe in its judgments, more cruel in its punishments; made the most trifling things crimes; visited upon them the most terrible punishments; invented more torture and most cruel and dangerous instruments of torture; made vice a virtue and virtue a crime in the name of the Most High; cursed every nation and state which it has attempted to rule; shed more blood, fomented more wars between nations, and always the most cruel wars; set man upon his brother, and erected the rack, the dungeon; sharpened the dagger, whetted the glistening sword, erected the stake, and surrounded it with the blazing fagot and flame to consume any one who doubted or believed a little more or less than the orthodox standard. And the very same principles which hav done all this, which hav been guarded against by the founders of our government, are now attempted to be inserted into it; and all the same infernal engineering of cruelty and oppression may, if judged necessary, be used upon us.

Even in this country, moderately free as it is, men hav been imprisoned, fined, and punished for teaching the people to read the Bible; George Francis Train imprisoned for quoting from it and circulating the quotations; Joseph Treat and others not permitted to testify because of unbelief; Thorn turned out of office for disbelief, etc.; John A. Lant for honestly defending his own belief and disbelief and quoting Train; Prosch, without any crime, and many others; Victoria Woodhull, her husband and sister, for publishing a Freelove paper, and E. H. Heywood for writing a pamphlet containing his honest opinions. D. M. Bennett is now condemned to fine and imprisonment for selling Heywood's pamphlet on sexual freedom and advocating sexual purity, and Dr. Foote is under several thousand dollars' bail for the crime of telling the truth.

Decoy letters are being sent, and efforts are being made by United States detectives and their agents to induce men to commit what they themselves hav caused to be made crimes, that they may hav an excuse for arresting, trying, harassing, and ruining them in their reputation and finances; immure them in prison at hard labor, and otherwise torture, annoy, and persecute them, while the most prominent reverends and doctors of divinity stand at their backs and bless these decoy agents, liars, perjurers, and murderers, who hav worried men and women into their graves, in the name of God, merciful and gracious. And all this in the model republic, and is there no cause to fear persecution now? Hav these persecutors no Bible? Bodies contain impurity and various forms of evil, useful in themselves in the economy of nature. The poison gland of the snake, the ink bag of the cuttle-fish, the gall of the ox, and the stench bag of the polecat and the skunk hav their uses. But in the world's body politic, the church has furnished a poison gland, a reservoir of the world's gall and venom, and a stench sack, cuttle-fish, and ink bag large enough to supply the whole universe. Do they accuse us of harshness? Let the malignity of eighteen centuries of their own answer them. Do they charge us with severity? Point them then to the flames of torturing hell. Do they accuse us of doing them injustice? Point them, for an answer, to between fifty and a hundred millions of skeletons of those they hav slaughtered as a reply. Do they claim gentleness and kindness? Let the choking voices from the dungeons of the Inquisition lisp in feeble, agonizing accents a reply. Do they claim justice? Point to the court of Star-Chamber and infamous Jefferies. Do they treat men gently to-day? Point to the victims of the scaffold, the most sure and efficacious means of converting to Christianity in a Christian land. Do they say that they are guardians of liberty and we are safe? Point to the Woodhulls, Treats, Lants, Footes, Bennetts, and hosts of others, and their persecutors who boast that they hav worried some of them to death, and that "the world is better off without them." Does the church sanction such persecutions? See the grinning faces of the vile reverends as they pat the liar, the perjurer, slanderer, and smut hunter of this great nation on the back, with a holy commendation and Christian blessing upon his iniquitous deeds. See the Rev. Joseph Cook, Rev. Newman, Rev. Howard Crosby, Rev. J. Courtney, Samuel Colgate, Dr. John Hall, etc., defending, and the New York Independent justifying lying, treachery, and wickedness, because the end sanctifies the means, and say, are our liberties safe with the Constitution and laws in such hands and the courts and juries under their influence? Would you put our Constitution and laws in such hands? Are our enemies the protectors to whom we may safely look? As well ask if wolves should be the protectors of lambs. They accuse us of severe language. Will they look at orthodox hatreds even unto death, through fifteen centuries, and the fulminations of hatred and malice in the excommunications of the holy church?

It was but the other day that O. Clemens, in Keokuk (the brother of Mark Twain), was excommunicated, and the pious presiding minister advised his flock to withdraw their intercourse from him. Is not any man who speaks honestly his firm convictions, in opposition to the clergy and church, in danger to-day? Are not slander, detraction, calumny, and defamation, and tongues steeped in pious venom, doing their utmost to blast his reputation? Is it not considered unsafe in this Christian city, under the shade of a dozen churches, with their steepled roofs pointing upward, for a man to dare to be true to himself, and honestly declare his serious convictions? Why do known Liberals decline to unite with any Liberal society, take any Liberal paper, or hear a Liberal lecture? Do they not fear pious calumny, Christian hatred, and religious detraction? Thus honesty is at a discount, and hypocrisy and lying at a premium in our midst. Hypocrites are yearly entering the church, acknowledging a belief in a creed which in their hearts they despise; while those who are too honest and truthful to do so are not permitted to enter. But let them turn hypocrite as some do, and lie about their belief, and they are at once permitted to enter. Thus a lie is the ticket which will at once admit any one into these sanctified abodes of God—those houses of God, occupied nine-tenths of the time by rats, and yet so much more holy than our own houses, occupied by our own dear children, and so holy that none but some ordained Rev. or his supporters are permitted to speak there. They speak loudly of our abuses of them. Let them point, if they can, to one instance in their history where they hav obtained power without abusing it. We would exalt human nature, even theirs; they would degrade it, even their own. We believe in man's inherent goodness; they in his inherent wickedness. We believe man is a child of the infinite God; they, that he is a child of wrath, a spawn of the devil. We believe man is naturally good; they, that he is totally depraved. We believe man started very low, and is ever arising, improving, mounting upwards; they, that he started high and is fallen very low. We look forward with hope to the future; they look for light and hope to the dark past, with its ignorance and superstition. We look forward for knowledge in the discoveries of science and the victories of art; they look back for information to the darkness of the past, and the graves of dead generations. They would reverence and adore the wisdom of the age of Pharaoh, Solomon, and Herod; we hav a higher reverence for the age of Newton, Humboldt, and Ingersoll. They would venerate Moses and Joshua, Jephthah, Gideon, David, Isaiah, and Noah. We would honor Washington, Paine, Franklin, Greeley, Harrison, and Lincoln. They venerate St. Tyriel, Cyril, and a hundred other saints, although no Protestant church has ever canonized one; we venerate Tyndall, Huxley, Darwin, Spencer, Youmans, and others of to-day. They venerate the saints of grace; we, those of nature. They reverence a host of worthies whose goodness was superstition, whose lives were useless, who lived to devour the fruits of others' labor, rendering no visible equivalent. We honor Stephenson, Whitney, Fulton, Wood, Howe, Morse, and Edison. We are advocates of utility; they, of inutility. We of the visible; they, of the invisible. We of the living present; they, of the dead past. We believe in the nobility and royalty of man, independent and erect; they believe the noblest position is his most abject and servile, and the most honorable position before earth and heaven is upon his knees. We believe in man's exercising his true nobility before man; they think it more noble to show his humility before God. We protest against men leading the progressive present with their eyes upon the dead past. We pledge ourselves to labor for the advancement of human and not divine interests; for this world and not for another; for the future and not for the past; to bless all who hav been man's true heroes by being a blessing to humanity. We believe the benediction of the bending heavens is upon those who hav shown us how properly to utilize and enjoy the blessings which surround us. We believe in subjecting the God above us, whom none hath seen, to the God within us, that all can feel, in its divine aspirations for human good.

Indiana on Fire.

It is cheering to observe that all over Indiana a spirit of inquiry is springing up among religious professors and the fires of a true zeal are kindling up among the workers in the Liberal cause. Christian professors, and even preachers, are applying for Liberal books. I hav sold "Sixteen Saviors" and "Bible of Bibles" to eleven preachers, most of whom applied for them. And the most gratifying part of the story is that no less than fourteen preachers in this and other states are reported as being converted to Infidelity by reading one or both of those books. Mr. Rensoner, of Adrian, Mich., has just reported the case of a preacher in that city as being converted to Infidelity by reading the "Bible of Bibles." And thus onward, right onward, is the march of truth. And long and ardently hav I desired to lend a helping hand to the cause, but hav been tied at home for six months, much to my regret, in putting my fourth book through the press. But that labor is now off my hands and I am now ready for field labor. I like the suggestion of that indefatigable laborer, H. L. Green, in the last TRUTH SEEKER, for organizing the states. He proposes that all clubs (and Liberals where there are no clubs) shall report to the chairman of the state committee the names of all Liberals in the state. Do you hear that, ye Liberals of Indiana? Send me the names immediately and I will furnish you a speaker. Several speakers are now ready for business. Next summer we will hold grove meetings, and hav several speakers. But this winter we must kindle fires all over the state. Indiana will be on fire with the truths of Infidelity in less than six months if we will but work. The state committee will soon be organized. M. K. Wilson, of Auburn, Ind., is on that committee. Send in the names of clubs and Liberals to Kersey Graves, Richmond, Ind., Chairman of the State Committee, and he will arrange for a meeting at once in your neighborhood.

A California Letter.

DEAR BENNETT: This world in which we liv is full of life, and in whatever form life manifests itself, from the lowest to the highest form, existence is a struggle, and not to strive is death. As this is true of physical life, so is it true also of mental and moral life.

Happy is the man and woman who can measure, weigh, and classify the events in the great struggle for mental freedom, and thus deduce right motives as the mainsprings for right action and the measure for true manhood.

I hav been pained at the bitterness, and disgusted at the pharisaical pretense of purity on the part of your enemies who hav attacked you with such virulence. An old man in prison for no crime at the hands of an unjust law, suffering, as many hav done before you, to redeem the people from the bondage of ecclesiastical misrule!

Bro. Bennett, your cause is in the hands of the Liberals of the whole country, and you may rest assured that they will weigh well the motives of your enemies who are seeking to destroy the usefulness of THE TRUTH SEEKER, which has attained such a high place for itself in the hearts of our people.

I commend you for your open, manly courage in regard to the letters brought forward to blacken your name and ruin THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is human to go astray, but almost divine to confess one's faults and promise better things.

Had Beecher done so he would hav been forgiven and honored by all right-minded people. But, alas! there are many who hav put their hand to the work of purifying the body social who are whited sepulchers, full of dead men's bones, whose only virtue is the whitewash and concealment of the true motives which inspire them.

I am glad to read the noble sentiments from the pen of Mrs. Wm. Denton. God bless her, and all others who stand for a correct principle, let it lead where it will?

The question at issue is not the letters published by the Religio. They hav been disposed of by most thinking and fair-minded people as irrelevant to the fight Bennett is making for the cause of human freedom.

The dry-rot of conservatism never did do anything for humanity except to forge chains to bind men in bondage to respectable lies.

Every advance up out of the barbarism of the past has not been by compromise, but by radical statement, radical action, and by suffering.

Three great tyrannies curse this world: the eclesiastical, social, and financial. These, like blood-suckers, suck up moral life and mental freedom in the name of God, good government, and religion, and will do so, until more brave men like Bennett defy the law and precipitate the fight, which will bring justice and good order out of anarchy and misrule.

Since I wrote you last I hav made the circuit of Oregon, Washington Territory, and British Columbia, and in less than three months hav spoken about eighty times.

At Portland, Seattle, and Victoria the Liberals and Spiritualists are unanimous in behalf of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and promised to stand by until the smoke of battle has cleared away and humanity lifted a step higher in the scale of freedom.

These people in the North must like THE TRUTH SEEKER because it deals in facts, not fancies; because it is plain and to the point; because, unless forced to do so, it avoids personalities, and fights the common enemy; because its editor is an uncompromising foe of hypocrisy and superstition, and a defender of human rights.

My thanks are due to the friends of Freethought at every point made during my last lecture tour, and especially to Mr. and Mrs. Duck, of Victoria, who made me comfortable in their happy home during my stay in their beautiful city; also to James Fell, a leading merchant in Victoria; and, by the way, I wish you could grasp the hand of this noble specimen of English manhood, a true Spiritualist and quick to grasp the true issue in your fight, and penetrate the [illegible] guise of public weal concealing the base actions of [illegible]s, jealous spirit on the part of your enemies.

an envi[illegible]alker, also of Victoria, is your staunch friend [illegible] your cause. Of such men as Victoria Captain [illegible] and defender [illegible]d to be proud.

affords, you hav ne[illegible]. Winslowe heads the list of warm-

At Port Townsend M[illegible] cause. At Nanaimo, Messrs. hearted supporters of our [illegible]hers, stood close by me in Brunton, Watson, Karth, and [illegible] for which I remember fighting the battle of Freethought, them with kindness.

At Vancouver Mr. Smallwood and Bro[illegible]n, both officials in the land office, are strong friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and did much to make my stay pleasant and profitable.

At Portland my thanks are due to Father Hamilton and Mrs. I. A. Palmer and others for assistance in the work.

This is the fourth course of lectures given at most of the above points during the last six years, and, what seems promising, there is no abatement of audience or interest.

At Forest Grove and North Yamhill you hav many warm sympathizers in the cause for which you are suffering; and of all the Liberals and Spiritualists with whom I had the pleasure of meeting during three months of almost nightly labor, I hav not found a single person who is not friendly to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Index has been sent broadcast in the Northwest with your love letters spread out under the light of unjust and unfavorable comment, and yet the general verdict of the people is that Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER are worthy of our support.

I hav presented the claims of THE TRUTH SEEKER at every point, not by throwing dirt upon the Index or Religio, but by presenting the facts in their proper light; none of these papers can control the people, but are the servants of the people, who reserve the right of verdict. If Spiritualism does not teach a broader charity than Christianity, let us go back to the church at once, and if these biting, stinging editors of the Liberal press are without sin, let them keep on throwing stones—but the people will judge.

I find on my table two copies of Mind and Matter, a sprightly Spiritual paper, printed in Philadelphia. I commend it for a spirit of fairness in THE TRUTH SEEKER case as worthy of support.

I am sure there need be no quarrel between any of these papers. They differ from each other and each has its work to do, and there is need for them all in the great field of reform. It is a mistaken policy, that one may build himself up by pulling another down; besides, by so doing, we open up broad gaps to the common enemy.

As I am a member of the legislature, which meets in January, my address will be at Sacramento, for the next hundred days, after which I will be on the warpath again; and may the angels of peace brood over the troubled waters of our cause and bring gladness to the hearts of all our people, is the prayer of the writer, DR. J. L. YORK.

A Wanton Attack on Mr. D. M. Bennett and Prof. A. L. Rawson.

We had in type an article covering the main facts of this matter, which was crowded out with all other "Outlook" articles from our December number because of the extreme length of our statement regarding the murderous assault on the senior editor of this paper. Probably most of our readers, by this time, who hav taken any interest whatever in the imbroglio between the two wings of the Liberal League, hav learned all the facts. We will not, therefore, take space, at this late day, to enter into a presentation of them in extenso. Suffice it to say that at a meeting of the National Liberal League, at Syracuse, about a year ago, a Boston editor of a Liberal paper seceded and formed another Liberal League. This action was taken on the alleged ground that the National League had been captured by the Bennett party, which favored the repeal of the odious postal laws. Since that day there has been much "mud-throwing," as Mr. Parton expresses it. Some scandalous accusations, affecting the Secretary of the National League and Mr. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, were gathered up by the Boston editor and poured through the columns of his Index, ad infinitum, ad nauseam. From his confinement in prison, where he ought to hav been safe from such wanton attack, Mr. Bennett has made a frank reply which greatly pleases most of his friends. If any are dissatisfied with it they do not seem to come to the front, for THE TRUTH SEEKER teems with letters from all parts of the country, vindicating Mr. Bennett and disapproving of the attack made upon him. Prof. Rawson has replied in a way that ought to silence the toy gun of Boston. That truly clear-sighted and great man, the Hon. Elizur Wright, seems to be entirely satisfied with Prof. Rawson's explanation. Indeed, we know of no one who is not. But when a man like Elizur Wright considers an explanation satisfactory, it counts for a great deal; for we know of no one who seems to understand the meaning of a word, or who uses the English language more forcibly and logically, than this champion of American liberty. Perhaps Mr. Bennett may be thankful that his martyrdom has been made more conspicuous by the attacks of his enemies in the Liberal camp. His enemies outside of the camp had failed to find any thing against him with which to impeach his reputation for virtue and honor. When a man is incarcerated for a principle, it is a common thing for his enemies to call him hard names, as if to vindicate the injury they are inflicting upon him. When old John Brown was lying in a Virginia dungeon awaiting execution, we heard it seriously charged against him that he was a horse thief.

While the war is going on between the National Liberal League and the National Liberal League of America, the former, of which Prof. Rawson is secretary, is rapidly increasing throughout the United States, while the latter, with which the editor of the Index is associated, has, as at its birth, only seven or eight auxiliaries!

Mr. James Parton, who was one of the vice-presidents of the National Liberal League of America, sends his resignation to Mr. Abbot, the president, reminding him that he is a member of the other body, to which Mr. Abbot is hostile. It begins to look very much as if Mr. Abbot and his coadjutors, after getting the gun for the demolition of Bennett and Rawson well loaded with grape, unwittingly got at the wrong end of it when they touched it off. The National Liberal League seems to be getting on prosperously; Bennett is sustained by his friends; Rawson stands even higher in the estimation of those who believe in the emancipation of women; while the detractors of both these men are not visible since the smoke has cleared away.

A Challenge to B. F. Underwood.

B. F. UNDERWOOD, Dear Sir: A copy of the Chicago Inter-Ocean of Dec. 10th has casually been placed in my hands, and in an interview of yourself in that, besides many other things quite as bad, I find the following:

"But," queried the reporter, "was not the Liberal party in sympathy with the outspokenness of Bennett, and did not they endeavor to protect him?'

"That depends," he replied, "on what you mean by the Liberal party. If you class the advocates of Freelovism and the 'tag-rag and bobtail' who are of the negative school of Freethought, the class who merely seek to demolish, and who know and care for nothing which should supplant the old creeds, I suppose it would be correct to say yes. The party I represent, on the other hand, and which is entirely distinct from the before-mentioned, were as utterly opposed to the man, on account of his offense against the laws of decency, as were the most conservative Christians in the country."

I confess I do not know who you mean by the "tag-rag and bobtail who are of the negative school of Freethought," but so far as Freelovism is concerned I take your remarks to myself. I am a Freelover, and you hav, on more than one occasion, misrepresented and insulted me because I believe in the freedom of the affections; even in this paper, in answer to the question, "What union is there between Freelovism and Liberalism?" you say:

"The two are antipodal; there is no connection, either in sympathy or in fact. The Freelovers are generally mere blatant, loud-mouthed, illiterate Radicals. They are represented by such men as Stephen Pearl Andrews, Moses Hull, and E. H. Heywood. The first-named has more scholarship and literary ability than any one else in his party. Knowing the damning results to his ilk by the ill-advised actions of the Freelovers, he keeps comparatively quiet, but it is the stealth of the fox, who only waits the favorable opportunity to show his evil propensity."

Now, I deny that you tell the truth, and I defy you to point me to one Freelover who is not a Liberal. To say nothing of the "blatant, loud-mouthed, illiterate Radicals" whom you mention by name, there are T. C. Leland, A. L. Rawson, Laura Kendrick, and others whom I might mention, all of them Freelovers, and quite as active as either yourself or Mr. Abbot in the Liberal movement.

But when you call such men as Stephen Pearl Andrews, one of the ripest scholars in the world, and E. H. Heywood, a master of arts, graduated at Brown University, "blatant, loud-mouthed, illiterate Radicals," I can forgive many of your sweeping false assertions in the past concerning Freelovers. Let it all go. With those who know the parties whom you call by name, you certainly will lose your credit as a man of truth and veracity.

But to come to the point: You are a public debater of some reputation. You hav taken it upon yourself on many occasions to publicly denounce Freelove, and misrepresent both the character and opinions of those who believe in it. This you did in Paine Hall on at least two occasions.

Now, I invite you to meet me in public discussion on the Freelove question. Let us see whether your grounds for denunciation are just; if not, cease your nefarious work. If they are, convince me, and I will as publicly defend a law and gospel-bound monogamic marriage as I hav attacked it.

The matter is now in your hands, and if you do not accept this I warn you to be careful and not repeat too often and too loudly the falsehoods concerning Freelovers and their families you uttered in Investigator Hall last March.

Controversially yours, MOSES HULL.

A New Magazine.

A new periodical is like a new baby in a large family—no one feels the need of it till it comes, then all wonder how they did without so long. But neither baby nor periodical comes into the world self-supporting, though a few of each are born with silver spoons in their mouths. Of the latter class appears to be the Californian, a new monthly, the first number of which comes to us with the new year, laden with good things. What this new magazine aims to be, and what it will be if it "pans out" according to specimen, is best described in its own words: "The Californian will be thoroughly Western in its character, local to this coast in its flavor, representative and vigorous in its style and method of dealing with questions, and edited for a popular rather than a severely literary constituency. It will not strive to please everybody, but it will reach out for merit in every available direction. It will do faithful prospecting in the range in which it is located. It will deal largely in common sense discussions, and its strongest efforts will be put forth to gradually gather to its list of contributors those hard-headed and practical business men who, in the active pursuit of their several professions and callings, hav literally mined material that, if refined a bit in print, is always valuable, interesting, and marketable."

The initial number contains fourteen prose articles, including an able hard money presentation of the money question, a sensible dissertation on the moral effects of vine culture, and an interesting description of the Pacific Coast Survey. There are also a dozen poems, of varying degrees of merit, and half a dozen short essays.

The A. Roman Publishing Co., of San Francisco, are the publishers. Yearly subscription, $3.; single numbers, 25 cts.

JUST as we are going to press we receive private advices that Mr. James Holmes, the English Republican orator and Vice-President of the National Secular Society of Great Britain, is on his way to this country to undertake a lecturing tour. Mr. Holmes is a co-worker with Mr. Bradlaugh, Mrs. Besant, G. J. Holyoake, and others.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

There is as much evidence, it is said, of mind as of matter; if the latter is indestructible, why not the former? "Matter immortal, and shall spirit die?" exclaims the poet Young. To this we reply that if mind be regarded as an element or combination of elements, its imperishability as such is not to be supposed; but since matter is constantly changing—its forms appearing and disappearing—if we reason from analogy in regard to mind, we must conclude that its individual form is transitory, while the substance alone is without end. So if mind is something diffused throughout space, like the ethereal fire of the Stoics, it is no proof of the immortality of any individual mind. But science does not speak of mind as a substance. It knows only the living, thinking organism, with its activities and aptitudes.

It is frequently said by our Spiritualist friends that, if life commenced on this globe with a speck of protoplasm, and organic forms have been evolved during the ages until the perfection of the human form and the present intellectual condition have been reached, must we not believe that this progress will continue in the future? If death is the end of man is there not an abrupt termination of the chain of existence? "Grant the soul of man eternal, or in man the series ends." But how can the fact of progress in this material world lead to the conclusion that one of the results of this progress—man—will always exist? The only progress suggested by the history of life on this planet is continued progress in this material world. The improvement of organisms will go on, doubtless, while favorable conditions last. Accumulated advantages, which will result by natural selection in the struggles for existence, always insuring the "survival of the fittest," must give us higher and higher organisms, until their environment becomes unfavorable to the higher classes of animals—or, in other words, until the earth undergoes changes making it impossible for the higher forms to subsist. But now, does evolution even intimate the existence of man in a spiritual condition, and that existence immortal?

Man's desires and aspirations, to many, are a strong indication that man will exist forever. It is the old argument:

> "It must be so. Plato, thou reasonest well;
> Else whence this pleasing hope, this fond desire,
> This longing after immortality?"

But how our hopes and desires and longings for continued existence prove its reality I do not understand. We desire and hope for many things we never get; we aspire to many positions we never attain. It is said nature never creates a demand for which she does not provide a supply. Of course it is those things which exist in nature that we desire, for it is those with which we become acquainted, and which contribute to our happiness. We have an appetite for food, and there is food to gratify it. We should not have the appetite if there were no food. Our appetite and our desire are the results of our environments. That is clear enough. Well, it is equally clear that we love life, and in life we have daily the gratification of this love. The desire for endless life is simply a desire for uninterrupted existence; for of an endless existence we can have no conception. The desire for a life that will not cease is no more evidence that we shall have it than the desire for boundless wealth is evidence that we shall possess that. The wish for a continuance of this life beyond the grave is no more evidence of its ultimate realization than the Indian's desire for his bow and arrow, his dog, his pony, and his scalping-knife, after death, is evidence that he will have them there.

The inequalities of this life are pointed to by many Spiritualists, as they are by religionists generally, as an argument for future existence. It is assumed that there must be a state in which the wrongs of this earthly life will be righted. But persons who use this argument suppose a Being possessing the benevolence and love of man without limitation; and then, to make the existence of this supposed Being possible (for infinite power is also ascribed to him), they imagine those who suffer unjustly here will be compensated hereafter. A batch of assumptions. If a God of infinite power and boundless goodness permits injustice and suffering here, why not there? If it be said that that shocks our sense of justice and our feelings of humanity, and that we must not suppose God will do anything wrong or cruel, I reply that we, with our dispositions, would not, if we had the power to prevent it, allow suffering and wrongs here. Perfect justice in some other state cannot be logically inferred from inequality, injustice, and wrong in this state. There is, then, no assurance from the condition of earth that there is what corresponds with our ideas of justice in any other state of being. We have, then, no arguments for a spiritual state in the wrongs of this material world.

Many of the writers and lecturers on Spiritualism still speak of heat, electricity, and magnetism as "refined matter;" and they claim that matter still more refined must exist, and that is spirit. But this is a crude thought in the light of modern science. Heat, electricity, magnetism, etc., are no longer regarded by scientific men as substances in a refined state, but as modes of motion; and of course they presuppose material bodies in motion. Far from being links that connect gross matter with spirit, they are words that represent the conditions of gross bodies like steel and wood, as well as matter in a more rarefied state.

Another metaphysical argument for immortality is founded on memory, which, it is said, shows there is something in man that resists those changes by which, in an ordinary lifetime, the body changes its material several times. Impressions must be made on something that is not subject to mutations like matter. The argument is plausible, and involves the discussion of fine points. We can only reply here that a scar which remains on the body for years, retaining the same form and appearance, seems to show that the particles of the body which leave are replaced by others which serve the same purpose. And this suggests that the new molecules which replace the old ones in the brain may take the same shape and perform the same functions, so far as is necessary to preserve identity, as those which originally received the impressions. How this is done of course we do not profess to explain; but it seems more rational to hold to this view than to imagine inside of the physical brain a something capable of receiving impressions, and yet not admitting of disintegration. And what becomes of the notion that the spiritual part of man is refined matter? How does that tally with the assumption that the mind or soul is something that is exempt from change—from disorganization? How fine must matter become before it ceases to be subject to the laws of matter—integration and disintegration, distribution and redistribution? If spirit is refined, sublimated matter, there is no possibility of immortality, unless at a certain stage of refinement matter ceases to act in accordance with those laws which we now observe in all material operations; which is an absurdity.

To the Materialist, life and intelligence seem to depend upon, in fact to be the combined activities of, organisms. Destroy the organism, and the activities, whether they be those called physical or mental, evidently cease. The substance is changed to other conditions—enters other combinations; the organic forces are converted into other activities corresponding with the material modifications.

What we call mind is evolved with the brain and nervous system. Feeble in infancy, strong in mature life, it declines in old age, and the last symptoms which the mind exhibits are disorder and insensibility, the precursors of annihilation. When we consider that the condition of the brain and nervous system and that of the mind exactly correspond; that any alteration in the one is attended with an alteration in the other; that to all appearances they grow and decay together; that any injury of the brain produces disturbance of the mind, the conclusion seems unavoidable that the dissolution of the body, the destruction of the brain and nervous system, must be followed by extinction of intelligence and thought. Every object with which we are acquainted has a beginning and an end. Aggregation implies segregation; formation implies dissolution. How contrary to analogy, as Hume remarks, to imagine that one single form, seemingly the frailest of any, and subject to the greatest disorders, is immortal and indissoluble! Some of the modern Spiritualists, like those of old, seeing this absurdity, have recourse to the doctrine of pre-existence. But common sense tells us that our mental existence began with our bodies—our existence as conscious, intelligent beings. Can immortality be reconciled with this fact?

Modern Spiritualism, however, claims to have evidence of a direct, experiental character, in unquestionable communications with, and the reappearance of, former inhabitants of the earth. These evidences are by no means new. All the so-called proofs of modern Spiritualism were known to the ancients. This is admitted by intelligent Spiritualists, and the fact by no means makes the evidence either more or less valuable.

The communications from spirits have not made much impression on scientific investigators. They can generally be traced to the minds of the mediums. Have any of them been demonstrated to come from supra-mundane beings? The character of the communications usually makes them very suspicious. We have messages and volumes from Theodore Parker that would reflect no credit on any ordinary mind, while they exhibit none of the distinguishing characteristics of that great man. I have many times received communications from Thomas Paine; but he has been exceedingly unfortunate in his efforts to recall even his place and date of birth and death, the title of his works, or important incidents in his mundane career. It is strange that intelligent men can believe that the communications which we get, and which are ascribed to our departed sages, proceed from those minds which, it is claimed, freed from earthly care and toil, and enriched by their varied and accumulated life-experiences in the body, have in addition enjoyed facilities for intellectual progress unknown to earth! Strange that a world where there is no death, where to the wisdom of earth is added the greater wisdom resulting from centuries of thought, study, and experience in the "Summer Land," is able to impart to the groping and struggling denizens of this world so little—I will not say that is in advance of our discoveries and speculations—but that is worthy the attention of men and women of ordinary intelligence and culture! We have communications from Egyptian priests, Chinese sages, the philosophers of Greece and Rome, and the great minds of modern times, the light of whose genius yet lingers on the earth; but when we read their productions, and consider what they were when they trod our globe, and what they must be now if the communications purporting to come from them are genuine, we find relief in the thought that the great ones whose names are used have not thus degenerated, but are in the quiet, everlasting sleep of death; while these childish thoughts and words ascribed to them are but the productions of undeveloped, ignorant, and abnormal minds among us. I believe that all intelligent and candid Spiritualists will concede that the intellectual emanations from the spirit world are far inferior in point of excellence to the productions of those advocates of Spiritualism among us who have written in a normal state and given us their own thoughts.

A Rousing Sermon by Brother Smith.

A BEAUTIFUL COMMAND.

My beloved sisters and brothers, I has once more had a call from the Lord to 'splain God's word. An' it givs me 'ticular pleasure that the St. Johns School Board am present. An' fur their special benefit I select a text that must satisfy them that as a book of truth the Bible is the most reliable book in our public school, Bob Ingersoll an' Babcock to the contrary notwithstanding.

You'll fine my blessed text in the holy school book, in Exodus xxii, 18. It reads, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." Blessed be God, sisters, only think how if it hadn't a been fur this blessed command to-day our country might be full of witches; an' while you, in the silent midnight hour, was confidingly entwined in the arms of your virtuous an' only husband, a witch might steal your beloved, sisters-ah, an' slip a bridle in his mouth-ah, turn him into a hoss-ah, jump on straddle an' ride all night-ah. An' when the poor man was returned to your loving an' virtuous arms, tired an' hungry, he would get upon his knees an'—still thinking he was a hoss—gnaw the headboard of your best bedstead-ah. Think of it-ah, an' sisters, bless God for giving the just command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." An' thank our school board for keeping in school a book that teaches the doctrine of witches; an' I tell you, always vote fur our school board fur any office, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Secondly: An' think, my beloved sisters-ah, if a witch should turn you into a black cat, an' you should hav to spend the whole night with other cats fighting an' yowling an' dodging stones an' brickbats-ah—I say, my beloved, thank our school board fur this command, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Thirdly: Suppose you was put into a sieve, an' then you would go sailing through the air, an' maybe not very well dressed nuther. Oh horror of horrors! Thank God, my beloved, thank God fur his book of truth an' our school board, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Fourthly: Do you know that in Salem, Massachusetts, this Bible put forty witches in jail at one time. Twenty were hung; an' our blessed God looked down from heaven an' saw those poor, pitiable creatures put to death by his blessed Bible command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." He had the power to save them, but he wouldn't do it, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Fifthly: Five hundred witches were roasted alive at Geneva, one thousand put to death at Cromo, seventeen thousand in Scotland, thirty-nine thousand in England an' France. Oh, horror! what a record of burning and torturing to death has been done by this blessed God's command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv!" fur of such is the kingdom of heaven. Again I say, thank the wisdom of our school board, an' vote fur 'em. They all love office, an' justly expect you to giv 'em your votes, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Sixthly: Some were racked, so as to make 'em confess that they were witches. Let me describe a rack. A rack is a Christian device, something like the bed of a wagon, with a windlass at each end. It was designed as a Christian's last argument to make one change his honest opinion. The witch was placed in it, with his feet chained to one end an' his wrists chained to the other. The man John would turn the crank, and the pious man with the Bible would read to the victim our blessed text, my beloved, "'Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv,' but if you will confess, we will ease up. Will you confess?" "No, I aint a witch," says the man. "John, turn the crank another twist." He turns. The man's limbs are stretched asunder. John sheds tears at the thought of killing the man, an' the other pious man says, "John, lets go to the Bible fur comfort." So he reads our blessed text, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." Oh, blessed book! This is the book fur consolation. Again I say, my friends, vote fur our school board. They love office, an' are good tools in the hands of the church, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

Seventhly: I'll giv you their names, so when you are far away I wish every one as a favor will write to 'em an' thank 'em fur making use of the Bible in school. Also write a kind letter of thanks to Prof. Yntema an' to R. Strickland an' D. G. Hurd, G. W. Barker, Geo. Stevenson, Josiah Upton, an' Charles Grisson, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven-ah

Eighthly : I say, if our press prints another article from that notorious Infidel Babcock, go an' yell, "Stop my paper!" That's the way to choke the press into the traces of God's holy church-ah. "Stop my paper! Stop my paper!"

We now dispose of the witches of old, an' will now talk of the witches of to-day. Last week the Rev. Mr. Bayliss, of Corunna, of our adjoining county, was sent to prison for two and a half years. His only crime was being bewitched by another man's wife. Only three weeks before, Caro, of this state, sent its man of God an' expounder of his word to the same prison fur three years. His crime was being bewitched with another man's wife. Rev. Mr. Rice, of Lansing, had to suffer on account of his being bewitched by another man's wife. Rev. Fisk, of Grand Rapids, and hundreds of others, all good men, ever ready to denounce the Infidel Babcock, all of them pious men of God, hav been bewitched by the beloved sisters of their churches. I tell you, my beloved sisters, there is witches in your eyes. Never, I beseech you, look at your 'spected preacher Bro. Smith with a melting expression. Let me tell how I, too, like to hav been made to suffer. You see this am the buckwheat season, an' one day last week, whilst I was a calling on the sisters, I asked sister Jones would she scratch my back, fur I'd eat buckwheat pancakes fur breakfast. She placed one arm around my waist, an' as she ran her other arm up under my vest an begun to scratch, her eyes, with a melting sort of expression, turned confidingly to mine, an' I must say that I never had any scratcher that seemed to do me so much good. But the Lord came to my relief an' whispered, "Stand firm, Bro. Smith, an' trust in Jesus." So I kissed her sweet lips an' said she must never scratch my back any more. Blessed be God for my rescue from being bewitched on that particular occasion. Brother Jones will now pass the hat, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

I'll preach again in two weeks if the Lord is willing, in three weeks anyhow; an' I'll accept of a donation, an' let it be a rouser, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven. I'll take chickens—yeller-legged—an' almost anything that's good, fur of such is the kingdom of heaven.

An' finally let's bless God fur looking on unmoved at the sight of the one hundred thousand victims who hav been put to death by his command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv." He saw all, had the power to save, but he refused to save. Bless God! he was determined to hav all of the witches killed so you an' I, my friend, might rest in peace.

Woman.—Marriage.—Franchise.—Freelove.—Abbot.—Ingersoll.—Rawson.—Underwood.—Mrs. Denton.—And the Glowing Words of Another Lady Regarding Mr. Bennett and the Situation.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER : Mr. Sothern, the theater-actor, in his renowned play of "Dundreary," while personating an English swell, having been away to attend a club or party, is asked who all were there, and replies, "Aw-a whole lot-a fellows-aw." And now, sir, you will note that I hav got "a whole lot" of people named in the head-lines of this article in connection with some very interesting subjects.

At Aurora, Ill., quite a number of years ago I was attracted to read a handbill upon the street which announced that a Mrs. Emmerson would "hold a meeting" at a given time in one of the large public halls of that place, to which she invited gentlemen only. Her circular was attractive because of its absurd eccentricities. She had placed in raised letters upon it the announcement that the admittance fee to her "meeting" would be fifteen cents for each gentleman, but that those little creatures "that men keep" called women would not be admitted. The great body of those that composed the gentler sex of that little city pronounced her—upon reading her bill—"a good-for-nothing, impudent thing." But her bill of fare "took at sight" with the masculines of the town, and at an early hour the hall was filled to its capacity, while the ladies were generally enraged to think that their husbands would go to hear the "nasty, mean thing." Your correspondent went—of course he did. The audience of gents had become enthusiastic long before she came in; and when she finally came, pressing her way forward through the crowd, wearing a snow-white dress and a blood-red shawl, accompanied by the marshal of the town, the audience gave vent to great applause. She took her seat in a complacent manner upon the forum, the marshal beside her in another chair. She soon arose, and stepped forward to commence her lecture, when the crowd of men became boisterous with pounding, stamping, and cheers, for many in the hall had come there with prejudice against her by reason of the scoldings they had received from their wives. She stood for a moment, but the racket continued, when she turned and said to the marshal beside her, in a mild tone of self-posesssion, "I see, Mr. Marshal, that we are to hav no lecture to-night." She continued, "I hav fifteen cents from each one of these men and I shall keep it, for I am here to fill my engagement." She thereupon took her seat, and immediately the house became as still as need be. She then gave us a noble lecture in behalf of her own sex. She said that often when she approached cities and villages she saw an announcement placarded that a young men's literary society would meet at a given time, but she had failed to notice anything of the kind for the improvement of the minds of the young ladies; that they were left to dabble with frivolities which led to rivalries and jealousies; and that so long as woman was neglected, so long as her mind was not properly and practically educated, man would realize the want of true companionship; that what man wants is her appreciation of his intellectual and practical worth; that he wants her to know what the money cost and where it came from that he furnishes her for her use. She said that man and woman were natural companions; that women do not venerate women while they venerate men, and that men venerate each other.

She made a feeling appeal to the fathers present to be mindful of the daughters as well as the sons; that they should be trained to be self-reliant as well as truly companionable to man.

A change came over the scene. Men of minds became deeply interested—leaned forward as if not to lose a word; and many a father left that hall that night with the resolve that he would do all he could for his daughters, because convinced by the lady's logic, so genially expressed, that the loss to woman in education and practical knowledge was a loss to man and loss to the state.

Mr. Abbot was wonderfully frightened and cried out "free love," because the Liberal Convention at Cincinnati put a plank into the platform for the enfranchisement of woman. While the more noble Prof. Rawson says that he would, under no circumstances, undertake the hopeless job of forcing a woman to love him by a marriage bond if her love had become entirely estranged and she wanted to get released from him.

Mr. Underwood, in his Colorado lecture on woman's political enfranchisement, said that his friend Abbot of Boston was not in favor of the enfranchisement of woman until after the Constitution of the United States is more safely guarded against the encroachments of ecclesiasticism, because of woman's susceptibility to its manipulations; while Mr. Underwood himself would let her vote right away and risk it.

Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll thinks that the old-style marriage is really nice, that upon it rests the salvation of the state; while Mrs. Denton, one of the "vanguard" thinkers among women, speaks of the tying up one man and one woman for life, whether they want to or not, as the "relics of barbarism." And the wife of the writer thinks that the reason Col. Ingersoll holds for the old relic so strong is because he has chanced to obtain a very excellent wife, while she affirms that she has met with hundreds of married people whose separations would be a blessing to themselves and of benefit to the world. Another thinks that the marriage ceremony should be something as follows: "We do pledge our sacred honors to the public, and place our pledge on record, that we will liv true to each other so long as we continue to love each other, and so long as our happiness and well-being is promoted thereby, or so long as evil does not supersede the blessing of our union; and that we, neither of us, will ever neglect or forsake our children, if any are given us by this marriage."

And now, Mr. Editor, I hav these words from my wife, who is absent from me on a tour, and to whom I sent the R.-P. Journal, and afterward Mr. Bennett's noble response from prison. In referring to it she says: "I think more of him than ever before. He is guilty but not tricky. No false oath, no scheming, wily woman renders a man weak. I love the paper and honor the man, sympathize deeply with his wife in her statement, and hate, despise, loathe, and detest the Index and Bundy. I am glad I burned the R.-P. Journal as soon as I read it. A woman that will receive as many letters, knowing as she did that he had a wife, is in no way worthy of credit. I do hope none will desert him. Underwood is selfish and egotistical. He refused to present the petition for signatures for D. M. Bennett's release from prison, in Stark county, Ohio, last summer, and from that time I hav had no faith in him. Bennett is a Socrates. When his friends advised him to evade, he stood like the hero that he is, and, acknowledging, takes the cup and drinks it heartily. Any who desert him now are weak themselves. They should all stand by him in truth. It is enough to be a weak fool, as he acknowledges himself to hav been in a moment when unmanned; but he is a martyr to liberty and free press, and I do hope that there will not be one man or woman calling themselves Liberals that will pay any attention to those letters, but that they will say, Let the noble TRUTH SEEKER liv, and the truthful martyr be more loved and cherished than ever. A woman that would sell herself as did the blackmailer of Mr. Bennett should be condemned by all. It is too often the case that the bright genius of man has been blighted by a tricky woman. This letter shocked me. I looked it over and laid it aside before I gave it a concentrated perusal. I studied the corruptions of church and state, and queried, What dependence hav we if Liberals prove untrue? It sickened me, but the careful reading of it rallied me—made me strong—his honest statement. Man is weak, but the martyr is strong, great, and honest at the core. Do all you can, my husband, to stand by him now at the time that he is passing through the 'Gates of Gethsemane.'" The paper is rightly named THE TRUTH SEEKER. Passion is early awakened in man; and Dr. Childs says, "There is no virtue in a membrane." Man is hedged in by laws and customs. I hav myself been selfish in my love nature, and lived a strictly monogamic life; but something is wrong, and I believe the future will solve and set it right.

AUXILIARY Liberal League No. 150 is located at Springville, Utah, and starts with a goodly number of earnest working members.

Liberal League Work in Iowa.

The Sub-Committee of the National Liberal League for Iowa is now completed, as follows :

E. C. Walker (Chairman), Florence; Col. M. E. Billings, Waverly; Mrs. A. M. Swain, Fort Dodge; Mrs. Bertha M. Lee, Blairstown; H. W. Mercer, Winterset. All of these are earnest, active Liberals, and will do their best to help on the good cause. Shall they be sustained and assisted by the freedom-loving men and women of Iowa?

LOCAL AGENTS.

In accordance with the provisions of the Constitution of the National Liberal League, the Committee is appointing local agents in the various cities and towns of the state. The duties of these agents are, in brief, to assist the Committee in the organization of Local Leagues, distribute documents, circulate petitions, collect funds, report meetings, send in to the Committee names of Liberals, etc. Will the Liberals throughout the state please report to the undersigned immediately the names of persons most fit to act in this capacity? We want none but known Liberals, honest, capable, earnest men and women. Please inclose stamp when writing—the expense of correspondence is considerable. A word right here. Do not depend upon your local agents to do all the work. That would be giving one person too much glory.

AGENTS SO FAR APPOINTED:

Dr. S. W. Moorman, Fort Madison; Albert Leech, Donnellson; Matchen Farrington, Denver; Hon. D. P. Walling, Tripoli; Alex. Risk, Winthrop; Jerome Carter, Randalia; Jerome Dutton, Wheatland, and M. W. St. John, Cedar Falls. Others will be appointed from time to time as fast as suitable names are presented.

TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

Our state legislature holds its biennial session this winter. To it will be presented a petition for the taxation of church property. How many thousand names shall it bear? The answer to this question depends entirely upon how much in earnest are the Freethinkers and secularists of Iowa. Let us advance all along the line. "Storm the fort" of injustice and privilege. Every township should be thoroughly canvassed for signatures. Each citizen should hav an opportunity to sign this most righteous demand. Send on for blank petitions. No time is to be lost. When you send for petitions or write for other purposes, please inclose a few stamps. We want to send a copy of the petition to each paper in the state. Help us and we will help you. Send for petitions.

LOCAL LEAGUES.

How many Leagues shall we hav by the 1st of September? Kansas promises fifty. Why cannot Iowa do as well? Let us resolve that we will? How many shall be represented in the which will convene about the 25th of August and continue in session for five days? And where shall this grand grove meeting be held? Cedar Rapids, Marshalltown, Des Moines, Ottumwa, Waverly, Clear Lake, Fort Dodge? Let us hear from the brothers and sisters all over the state. Send in your ballots before the 1st of March, giving the reasons for you choice, and your committee will act accordingly. Which is the most accessible point? which has the greatest number of attractions? which can giv the most local aid?

FREE AMERICA.

It having been noticed that the attendance at places of amusement in Cincinnati on Sunday was from three to five times as large as at the churches, the mayor determined that reform was necessary and ordered the arrest of all managers of and performers in theaters and concert saloons which were found open on Sunday. Most of the places remained closed, but in a few, the proprietors of which ignored the order. about fifty persons were captured.—New Covenant (Chicago).

The play weekly put upon the boards at the church theater is becoming stale. It does not draw well. So the arm of the civil power is invoked to compel people either to attend church or stay at home. Such is the meaning of this high-handed action upon the part of Cincinnati's mayor. About one year ago the mayor of Keokuk (Iowa) forbade the May-Fiske Blondes to giv an an advertised performance in that city, on the alleged ground that it was an "immoral" show. Then J. Villa Blake, in the Index, applauded this gross usurpation of power on the part of the Keokuk functionary. Will he and F. E. Abbot defend the similar action of the Cincinnati satrap? They should, neither of these officers hav done anything, not sanctioned by the dogma of the Consensus of the Competent. But how long will Americans submit to such foul tyranny? Where is the spirit of '76? Are there no men in Cincinnati that such odious ordinances can be enforced by a mayor, sycophantic slave of the church power? Cincinnati wants such a mob as threw the taxed tea into Boston Harbor. To use the expressive language of the street, that mayor should be "bounced." Bounce him by ballots, if possible, if not, otherwise. Socialists! Germans! Liberals! unite!! Do as did your Newark brethren. Spot that mayor and every man who dares defend his traitorous action. Awake ere it is too late. E. C. WALKER.

NEW HARTFORD, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1879.

DEAR BENNETT : My customary $5.00 herewith inclosed, as a contribution to THE TRUTH SEEKER interest, is somewhat tardy, but I hope to do better next time.

Very respectfully, WM. DUDGEON.

Some Reminiscences and a Kind of Prospectus.

When the New Year is born journalists usually seize the occasion to giv a prospectus. They wait outside the chamber door, as it were, ready to write the name of their paper on the forehead of the infant. We do not think the young year could be better called than TRUTH SEEKER, and if he indeed be a seeker after the truth he will be an improvement on some years that hav passed. And so we are going to write THE TRUTH SEEKER on the brow of our New Year. We hope he will hav a less thorny path than the paper and its editor hav.

Promises for the future hav but little value unless we hav a record of the past to judge whether they are likely to be kept. On the edge of a Western prairie in the summer of 1873 Mr. Bennett was busily engaged in running a seed farm, with probably as little idea of embarking in the publication of a Liberal journal as Anthony Comstock has of ever becoming an honest man. A discussion sprang up between the clergy of Paris, Ill., and a few Freethinkers of the place, of whom Mr. Bennett was one, on religious topics, and while the ministers had the run of the local papers the Liberals were shut out. Not liking this treatment Mr. Bennett determined to hav a publication wherein those holding Liberal views upon theological subjects could express them freely. And THE TRUTH SEEKER was started upon the journey whereon it has never flagged. At first but a small eight-page monthly paper at 50 cents per year it has steadily gone on till we find it at its present proud position of being the largest journal in the world devoted to Liberal or heterodox thought. We find in its first issue this clear cut plank in its platform: "We hav no creed nor dogmas to ask others to subscribe to, but are in favor of independent thought, free inquiry, free speech, and everything that tends to break the chains of mental bondage, ignorance, and superstition."

No paper ever started with a broader platform, a grander purpose, than is outlined in this sentence. It breathes charity, liberality, honesty. It givs at one view an insight into the character of its editor, and those who hav been with him from the beginning can bear witness to how faithfully he has stood upon this platform, even when whirlwinds of slander hav dashed about him. Never for a moment has his integrity, his unflinching devotion to truth, been shaken.

In December of that year, after having issued four numbers in Paris, he removed to New York, and from an eligible point on Broadway the paper was published for over two years—till May, 1876, when Messrs. Henderson & Brown having leased Science Hall for a proposed Liberal headquarters, Mr. Bennett moved his paper to its present place, 141 Eighth street. It would be interesting to trace THE TRUTH SEEKER all through these years, but it would take too long. When the paper came to New York it was enlarged by the addition of eight pages, making it a sixteen page monthly at $1.00 per year. With the commencement of Volume III. the pages were enlarged to their present size, and THE TRUTH SEEKER started off as a weekly. "With a pocketbook extremely flat to begin with; with a very small sum in the bank to our credit; with no capitalist to stand by and see us through; with no corporation of stockholders to send instalments as necessities arose; with no heavy contributors to remit large donations to relieve us, we hav frequently been brought to great straits. More than once hav we reached our last dollar, with no certainty where the money was to come from on Saturday night to pay off our hands and to meet other expenses," are the words in the New Year's Greeting of Volume III. Yet the paper struggled on, relying on its making a warm place in the hearts of its friends by being regarded by "every friend of progress as 'our paper,'" and experience has justified the boldness of the editor. Although, as Mr. Bennett frankly confesses, he saw hard times, he has always paid one hundred cents on the dollar of his debts, and will doubtless be enabled to do so in the future.

While on Broadway Mr. Bennett published his first book, which opened the way to a respectable publishing business. "The Heathens of the Heath," by our very able friend Wm. McDonnell, was the book, since which time there hav gone forth from THE TRUTH SEEKER office over two hundred different books and tracts, ranging in price from one cent to $5.50.

Until the middle of November, 1877, Mr. Bennett quietly pursued his toilsome way, working from twelve to eighteen hours a day to place his paper upon a sure basis. The circulation had been constantly increasing. Hundreds of warm friends all over the country were interested in it. At this time, on Monday, November 12, 1877, Anthony Comstock walked into the office, accompanied by a United States marshal, and arrested him on the charge of sending obscene and blasphemous matter through the mails. The week before he had arrested E. H. Heywood in Boston on a similar charge. Mr. Bennett was taken before Commissioner Shields and held in $1,500 bail to appear to answer. The tracts complained of were "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written by Mr. Bennett, and "How Do Marsupials Propagate their Kind," by Hon. A. B. Bradford, written originally for the Popular Science Monthly. After a great deal of time and money had been spent, this case was dismissed. The District Attorney had instruction, from Washington. This made Comstock very mad, and he told three persons on different occasions that he would "get him yet." Mr. Bennett tried to introduce this at his trial, but it was "ruled" out. Knowing that something was wrong with a law which could be perverted into a persecuting power, Mr. Bennett got out a petition to Congress to hav the law modified or repealed. This was signed by some seventy thousand. The case was argued before the Congressional Committee on Post-Offices, who recommended no action. And so the law stands to-day a trap ready set for those who offend the "Society for the Suppression of Vice," or the Y. M. C. A., which is the same thing.

When Comstock attacked him, Mr. Bennett determined not to be crushed off-hand, and on the first of January following he doubled the number of pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER, making it sixteen pages, and putting the price up to three dollars per year, at which size and price it will remain. Since the enlargement the paper has seen hard times; but so far it has held its own against those who hav tried to suppress it.

In the summer of 1878 the New York State Freethinkers' Association held its annual meeting at Watkins. Mr. Bennett attended, taking along with him a lot of his books. Miss Tilton, Mr. Heywood's sister-in-law, also attended, selling "Cupid's Yokes," for mailing which Heywood had been sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment in Dedham Jail, seven of which he served and was then pardoned by Hayes. Mr. Bennett's and Miss Tilton's bookstands at Watkins adjoined, and one day, while she was away for a moment, a Christian spy asked for a "Cupid's Yokes." Mr. Bennett handed it to him, putting the price into her money-box. He was soon after arrested, in company with Miss Tilton and W. S. Bell, who had voluntarily and gratuitously helped both in disposing of their books. They were placed under bail for trial, and are now; but it is hardly likely the case will ever come up again.

Mr. Bennett returned to New York very indignant. He knew the book was not obscene, and he knew he had a right to sell it. He announced in his paper that he would sell it regardless of Comstock. This was Anthony's chance, and he immediately wrote a decoy letter, ordering that and another work. He had convicted Heywood on it and he felt sure he could Mr. Bennett. The sequel proved him right. Our readers all know of the miserably unfair rulings of the judge, of the impassioned appeals to the prejudices of the jury by the District Attorney, of the weakness of the one juryman who only said guilty that the case might go to a higher court, of the unsuccessful appeal to that court, and the cruel sentence. For seven weeks he stayed in Ludlow-Street Jail while the President was considering his application for pardon made through Colonel Robert G. Ingersoll. Mr. Hayes said the book was not obscene, as good as promised to release him, and then suddenly changed his mind, at the instigation of the ministers and Comstock, who went to Washington for the express purpose of defeating the application. Mr. Bennett was ordered to be taken to Albany, and on July 28th Marshal Kennedy took him to that institution. It was left with us to conduct his business and edit THE TRUTH SEEKER, a task we hav done to the best of our limited ability. Friends all over the country hav been very kind. They hav sent in many trial subscribers, and many generous donations hav been sent to keep the paper from going down. We extend to all our sincerest thanks, and promise that until Mr. Bennett is once more seated in his proper place we shall do our best to render THE TRUTH SEEKER a welcome weekly visitor to its hundreds of friends. As in the few (to us long) months it has been our duty to edit it, we shall strive to make it one of the best Liberal journals printed. It will at all times defend the right and denounce the wrong. It will wage an unceasing warfare upon the shams of the church, and the cruel creeds which bind in chains the minds of hundreds of thousands all over this country. The arrest and conviction of Mr. Bennett were brought about by the enmity and intolerance of religious bigots, and the paper will never cease to oppose a system of religion which resorts to lying, intrigue, and imprisonment to smother honest thought. The Bible contains many times more objectionable matter, judged even by the standard of idiotic prudery, than does "Cupid's Yokes." The entire animus of the prosecution was because THE TRUTH SEEKER persistently and boldly attacked Christianity, one of the greatest frauds ever perpetrated upon the world. But the imprisonment of its editor was not a good way to soften its attacks, and will only result in making it more aggressive than ever. Christianity claims to be a religion founded on the merits of a meek and lowly Jew; but its followers hav been the most arrogant and intolerant of all religions. They hav hunted the good, the true, and the brave; hav dragged to prison the heretic and burnt the Freethinker. They hav built cathedrals and prisons, altars and dungeons; purchased communion tables for the elect of the Lord and racks to lay victims on. Almost every article of worship is accompanied by an instrument of torture; even the loving arms of the so-called mother of God, held wide open to fold to the heart of mercy an erring world, are taken as a model for as horrible a design as man ever invented—the Scavenger's Daughter. Wheels to break the bones, iron boots to crush the feet, glowing pincers and flaming splinters for the flesh, knives, axes, and beheading blocks, hav been the missionaries of the church of Christ. Human sharks, they hav sported in seas of blood.

Because THE TRUTH SEEKER has told these things that the church would like to hide, because its editor fearlessly denied what he believed to be fables; because he sought to remove the basis of superstition on which rests this superstructure which supports such a vast number of priests, he has been made the object of a most unjust and cruel persecution. But THE TRUTH SEEKER will continue to advocate the rights of the Freethinkers—that of being allowed to write and speak their honest thoughts the same as though they sat a few times a week under the instructions of a hired hypocrite or an honestly-deluded preacher. The Constitution of our country guarantees equal religious rights to all citizens, of whatever form of belief, or no belief at all. There is nothing in that document which prevents a man or woman from having one or a million or no god.

To the Liberals of the country, to those who love liberty, those who value free speech, who place honesty above hypocrisy, who prefer the facts of science to the theories of superstition, the thinkable and knowable to the unthinkable and unknowable, reasonable opinions to the ipse dixit of ignorance, neighborly charity to burning bigotry, we appeal for support for the coming year. All we ask is reward according to our merit, and it shall not be our fault if it is not as generous in the future as it has been in the past. We hope that every person interested in the cause of human rights—of liberty for all alike—will do what he can to help along THE TRUTH SEEKER. Let all seek for truth, and when we hav found the jewel in the grass, let us bring another to view it with us. A diamond loses nothing of its lustre by being looked at by the multitude, and the truth will bear the roughest handling. All it asks is a fair field and no favor.

Remember THE TRUTH SEEKER is the largest, boldest, and freest Liberal paper in the world. It will be sent, postage paid,

|---|---|
| One year | $3.00 |
| Six months | 1.50 |
| Three months | .75 |

In order to introduce it, we shall continue to send it to new or trial subscribers three months for 50 cents. We do not make anything on this, and we do it simply to take the stranger by the hand, trusting that he will like it well enough to continue taking it at the regular rates. And while we are talking about the paper, we will ask those in arrears if it is not convenient for them to pay up and renew. Those who hav been on our list as trial subscribers will confer a favor if they will let us know whether they wish it longer or not. We hope none will stop, for we need all the help we can get in the way of subscribers. Money should be remitted to D. M. Bennett, the same as heretofore.

We wish all our friends a new year free from worry and vexation, from financial distress, sickness, and suffering, and trust that in their prosperity they will not forget THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Account of Stock.

We dimly remember an ancient remark to the effect that "as ye sow, so shall ye reap." Now, last year those thrifty yoke-fellows, Abbot and Bundy, put in a late fall crop of what purported to be good sound wheat; but, whatever it was, it must hav fallen on pretty stony ground, for very little of it came up, and what does sprout turns out to be pretty much all tares. As we look over the ground we cannot see it exactly "white to the harvest;" and, if it was, the laborers are the fewest ever bid to a field. As an expert in husbandry, we would not harvest it at the halves, no, nor for the whole of it, especially not so short-handed as the afore-mentioned yeomen seem to be.

But to drop "the parable of the sower" and come to that of the old sore, sore head, or whatever the trouble is thought to be, let us call to mind how these unjust stewards, with such small talents buried in so little napkins, scattered Indexes by the 5,000 all over the land. But behold here a curiosity in culture! In the ordinary run of seed-sowing the plant crops up in the same lot and on the same man's land. We looked to see this plant of 5,000 Indexes come up in the Index office; but behold, they all shoot up vigorously and thickly in THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Page after page of our "Friendlies," and great numbers who do not get into our pages, acknowledge receipt of an Index, two Indexes, three and four Indexes, sowed thinner and thicker in spots, and all hav one tale to tell—that they repudiated the Indexes, returned the Indexes, put the Indexes into the fire, and then proclaimed themselves ten times more the friend, admirer, and upholder of Mr. Bennett than ever before. They also go out and get more subscribers for THE TRUTH SEEKER and not for the Index. This is the crop that THE TRUTH SEEKER reaps, all at the kind expense of the Index. The Index has such winning ways to make everybody hate it. It is very much as if the Index man should shoot his own chickens in his own tomato patch and throw them over on ours under the impression that our chickens were depredating on him. Anyhow, the chickens come home to roost with us and increase our stock of Christmas poultry.

Also the newspapers that were implored to notice, mark, and remark, and send copies to the Index, all but the pious papers, notice, mark, remark, and send copies to THE TRUTH SEEKER office. That is more crop for THE TRUTH SEEKER that, by all the laws of agri, horti, flori, and all other culture, except just "culture," pure and simple, ought to come up in the Index office. We are ever so much obliged, but are more surprised and are dreadfully mixed. We wonder if that is what is meant by that other ancient remark, "He maketh the wrath of man to praise him."

But there is more crop yet. Those five thousand Indexes scattered by the sower and the sore-head, and the head that never was sowed and that nothing ever came up on, were intended to break down the National Liberal League. But the League didn't break. It kept right on gaining new adherents, securing new local affiliations, in the same ratio as before, and never lost one. The concern at Ithica we do not count—it never was loyally one. Those five thousand Indexes were intended to alienate, brow-beat, discourage, and demoralize the leaders. They screamed frantically, "Expel Rawson! turn out Bennett, or Wright must resign!" but nobody was alienated, or discouraged, or frightened, nobody was expelled and nobody resigned, and the League is still officered as efficiently as before, and is going right on as its members always intended to do, whatever designs its putative founder and sometime president had in view—just as though members do not hav as much to do with founding an institution as its first president or leader does.

But the high, supreme keystone in the arch design in all these Religio-Index tactics was to scare away subscribers and break down THE TRUTH SEEKER. This, like all the other kinds of garden "sass" noted, has brought to THE TRUTH SEEKER the biggest kind of crop. The demoralized subscribers who yelled, "Stop my paper," since the Religio exposed and the five thousand Indexes were sown broadcast, amount to the bankrupting number of 3; the new ones added count up to 900. Balance, 897. The entire increase since Mr. Bennett's imprisonment is over 3,000.

This is our inventory and account of stock taken at the beginning of the year—and it really looks as if THE TRUTH SEEKER may survive till week after next, or possibly till the next April Fool. Friends of THE TRUTH SEEKER, this is survival of the fittest with encouragement. You hav all "fit" well. Do not be alarmed. We ain't dead yet (free translation of "we still liv"). Send on more new subscribers, and we will liv still—but that don't imply that we will keep still.

When the explosion first reverberated we of course all rushed to the windows to see what the noise was all about; and we did not know, for the moment, but the roof would crash in on our heads. There was a general hush. Not a leaf stirred.

> "'Twas as the general pulse
> Of life stood still, and nature made a pause:
> An awful pause! prophetic of her end."

But, now that the fruit comes rattling down into our lap, we are reassured. We don't mind earthquakes any more. Indeed we rather enjoy them, and wish they would come often and shake that old apple tree again and again. But poor Abbot, with his best trees so situated that the sweetings and greenings all fall over into our lot, and everything he can do redounding to our increase and to the fat of our land, we should think he would pull up and go West, young man, go West. Bundy very likely would take him in at $7 a week for a while till he could find a pulpit or a congregation to do. Or Underwood might coach him a little and show him how to lecture—if only anybody would ever go to hear him. T. C. L.

A Correction and Disclaimer.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of November 22d was an "Open Letter" addressed to me by Mr. A. L. Rawson, Secretary of the National Liberal League, offering to place his resignation in my hands if I thought it the "just and right thing to do." In my personal reply, which I allowed Mr. Rawson to lay before the public in any channel he should see fit, and which appeared in your columns of November 29th and in the Index of December 4th, I committed two serious errors. First, I inconsiderately signed my letter as President of the League; second, I left my language open to a misconstruction, which, unfortunately, has actually occurred in a quarter where it is important to the interests of the National League that it should not be misunderstood or mistaken for an official utterance.

It was not my constitutional province or duty, as President of the League, to express any opinion in the case or receive Mr. Rawson's resignation unless he peremptorily insisted on resigning. The League itself, so far as its Constitution throws any light on the subject, is the only tribunal competent to act on the case. I ought to hav replied simply to that effect.

Under such circumstances, however, I think any individual member, though an officer, or any local League, has a perfect right, if deeming it expedient, to express an opinion. It was unfortunate and deeply to be regretted that in expressing my own—for which surely no one else is responsible—in view of what I shall always consider an unjustifiable public attack on Mr. Rawson's private character, I left any possibility of inferring from my language that I deny any self-evident truth or undervalue veracity, sincerity, and what I regard as "good moral character," as indispensable qualifications for office in the League. I believe this sentiment prevails throughout the now one hundred and fifty Local Leagues almost to a man. If it prevailed equally throughout the organizations from which the National League asks simple justice, it would hav no reason to exist.

I meant, in my reply to Mr. Rawson, to assert emphatically the equal constitutional eligibility of all members, but by no means to deny the right and duty of the League, in congress assembled, to judge of character, or even reputation, and place in office its most moral, capable, and efficient members. Very deplorable it will be if my shortcoming in expression shall narrow the field from which the League can select the best. I ought to hav asserted, and think I should hav done so but for a habit of brevity and eaving people to find their own brains, that every individual voter in the League is morally bound, in loyalty to his own conscience, to vote for such officers as he thinks or hopes will best promote the objects set forth in our Constitution. There is not in this vast republic a man worthy to be called a man who can deny the justice of any one of our demands. It is only in their corporate, organic, soulless capacity that men make the denial. Hence the attack not on the real objects or demands of the League, but on objects falsely and calumniously imputed to it, and on the private character of its members. The League does not deprecate this; it accepts it as a good reason why every officer's and member's life should be beyond just reproach, but as truth does not become falsehood by passing through the lips of a liar, however its credibility may suffer, so the League has the good sense not to reject the co-operation for its good objects of men whose lives in other respects may be bad. How the aggregate life of the world is to be made better on any other principle is a problem for those to solve who allow their souls in any measure to be enslaved by the corporate interests of those who oppose our demands.

I did disclaim, and I see no reason to disclaim my disclaimer, any right on my part, either as officer or member, to impose my own standard of morals or character—otherwise than by exercising my right of suffrage of course—on any other member of the League, much less on the League itself, through the person of any duly-elected officer. It seems to me that it would be a dereliction of the fundamental principle of the League to call in question the right of any member or auxiliary to express an opinion of the character and conduct of any officer. That right must be conceded, otherwise membership in the League would involve a sacrifice of one's own standard of morals, in case the majority should elect to office a character inconsistent with it.

If, in the present painful emergency brought upon the Liberal cause from within by an attack certainly inexpedient if not unjust, my errors above referred to should lead any member or auxiliary prematurely to sever connection with the National League, to the extent of depriving that body of the ability, in the constitutional way, to repair the wrong and correct the mistake, if any has been committed, I should never forgive myself. Please excuse this excess of words, in view of my previous deficiency.

WHAT BIT IT OFF?

TO A. K. BUTTS, EUGENE MACDONALD, et al: I knew it must come. I hav been warned from the "Hub" and elsewhere that my turn would come. I waited patiently, but it didn't come. I looked to the east and I looked to the west, and yet it didn't come. But it did come. I looked too high for things close by, and did not think there was any Man right here at home who would "peach" on me in that dastardly way. "Man is not a man for a' that." And you, too, Eugene, ain't you ashamed to make THE TRUTH SEEKER a vehicle of his vile "insinuendoes." You might hav told me what was in the wind. I could hav bought up that whole album for fifty cents, and with some help from Liberals I could hav raised the money. Verily, verily, a man's foes are of his own household. It is not fair, either, in you two allied editors to expose an "old hulk" while he is in the land of the free and the home of the brave. Why didn't you wait till he got into jail? and why take a man of your size?

And here's a whole week that all Liberaldom has been standing aghast, with pallid lips, peeled eyes, open mouths, and distended nostrils, snuffing at the obscene gale, trying somehow to make out what this new explosion is all about. They expect an explanation, and I hasten to explain.

Now, see how plain a tale will put you down. Instead of making a butt of ridicule of me, you make a ridicule of Butts. I hav been advised to make a clean breast of it and confess. I havn't any clean breast to confess. I don't want to be an angel; I prefer to be a son of the morning—Lucifer, the light-bearer—and dwell where the good devils be. I am going to brass it out.

I never write poetry nor rhyme; much as I can do to write reason. I never wrote in albums in my life, and hardly ever do now; besides, she thrust her album on me unsought; and what is more I didn't write anything in it—leastways, nothing to speak of. Anyhow, Butts wouldn't giv $300 for it. She agreed to divide if he did; but he didn't and wouldn't; so that put up job fell to the ground, and we didn't make a red cent by it. He said it was rich, and was worth it, and he had the money; but he could get more obscenity for love than he could for money out of the R.-P. Journal and Index; besides, it was too obscene for the columns of Man; if it had been woman he wouldn't mind it; and he said if I would leave out "kiss 'em," and put in "miss 'em," to rhyme with "barbarism," and make it more cultured and high-toned, he would giv $400 for it; but Barbara and I both swore we would not prostitute the Muse to any such base and unholy purpose, bad as we wanted money, and Christmas so near, and no legs for a baby's stockings; and so I didn't write it, and she vowed she never, never, never would "peach" on me, and I believed her. I know she didn't tell, because she never told me. How Butt's got it no fellow can find out, because I didn't write it. When she presented her album and asked me, with one of those irresistibly-persuasive smiles that should always accompany albums, she inspired me with all nine of the Muses, and it wrote itself, and I hav been sitting on the guilt edge ever since—of the album, I mean; and Butts would hav written the same or worse, and so would you, 'Gene, if once she thought you deficient in albumen.

I am not scared by Butts' "expert from Alaska." If he freezes to me I will warm to him, and we will see who will thaw first. Let him examine my hand, and when he opes his mouth let every dog bark. If his word would not be received by every Liberal in America, I know an upper dog that would. I don't know but Under would, particularly if he gets some of the $300. If not, then Elling would. They are a wooden set anyhow, and among them somebody would.

I am much obliged for "Man's" consideration of the "families concerned." Families are almost always concerned. Sometimes a whole neighborhood of families are one concern. I never turn down a corner of Abbot or Bundy or Grundy street but all the families living in it are concerned. Let us always shield the families concerned.

I shall not resign. I own a share in this country. It is good stock to own. It pays ten per cent, and I don't propose to hypothecate (scientific word for pawn). Hayes must go. Besides Barbara can't spare me, and then think of all the other girls with hearts and albums that would ache. When Hayes knows this he will decline my resignation and accept his own. Barbara and I can run this country better than any civilized man.

Anyhow I didn't do it. I will stick to that till the very last "Man" shall the very last woman obey. If I hav done anything I am sorry for I am willing to be forgiven—then I would do it again under more aggravating circumstances.

Now I look to be Duke or Earl under Dictator Grant for my frankness; and, if I am not, "he may kill the next Percy himself."

Now, all ye Competent! come on with your Consensus!

> "Ye prudes in virtue say,
> Say ye severest, what would you hav done?"

Butts need not be so chary of my name. I am not ashamed of it. Its owner is responsible, and hereby subscribes it in full. TEE CEE LEE.

That Interview.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Although a communication that I sent you a month ago in reply to certain references to me which had appeared in THE TRUTH SEEKER is yet unpublished, I send you this letter to say that the report of an interview with me, extracts from which, with comments, appeared in your last issue, does not state accurately what I said. For what I hav actually said or written in regard to Mr. Bennett, for whom, I trust I am not lacking in charity, I hav no apology to offer. I simply do not wish to be judged by what I hav not said or written.

I did mention, as an objection to THE TRUTH SEEKER under Mr. Bennett's management, that it was coarse, that its editor seemed to delight in dwelling on the vices of the clergy, and that it tended to lower the moral tone of Liberalism, but I did not apply to the paper the word "obscene."

I said that Col. Ingersoll and others who petitioned for Mr. Bennett's pardon did so on the ground that "Cupid's Yokes," which he had circulated, was not an obscene book, and that his conviction, therefore, was unjust. I added that the conviction that he was "personally a moral man" strongly influenced Ingersoll and others who had no sympathy with Freelovism, and who thought Bennett had acted foolishly, to make the effort they did for his release. I did not say that Mr. Bennett's character was the ground on which Col. Ingersoll asked for his release, although possibly that was urged as one of the reasons.

Nor did I say Col. Ingersoll had left Mr. Bennett "to his fate." I said I inferred Col. Ingersoll's present disposition toward Bennett only from reports of interviews that had been published, and that I knew nothing as to their correctness. The reporter and another of the party present said there was no doubt that he had stated, as reported, "that if the Bennett letters were genuine, he had given his sympathy to the wrong man."

I mentioned the three persons named as prominent exponents of the Freelove theory, and spoke of Mr. Andrews as the most scholarly among them, but made no reflection on his character.

There are other errors in the report, but I hav neither the time nor inclination to refer to more. I wished to point out only those of a personal nature. The reporter no doubt intended to giv a correct report; but my own remarks are not given in the language I used, and in some cases what I said does not fairly appear.

Perhaps some of the statements which I did make, but which were not given by the reporter, would, if published, be regarded by certain persons quite as objectionable as some of those commented on in the last TRUTH SEEKER which I did not make.

By giving these hurriedly written lines a place in THE TRUTH SEEKER at any early date, you will oblige,

Yours truly, B. F. UNDERWOOD.

"THE National Liberal League—What It Is, and What It Is Not," is the title of an address, by C. J. Herbold, Esq., delivered before the First Auxiliary Liberal League of Cincinnati, which meets every Sunday at 3 P.M., in Odd Fellows' Temple, in that city. It is a plain statement of what its title indicates, and after so much misrepresentation as the League has sustained at the hands of its whilom friends it is a very necessary little work. Published by A. Warren, 219 Central avenue, Cincinnati. The price we should judge would be about fifteen cents.

THE Amateur Universe comes to us from its proprietor, editor, and printer, John Wilson, 7 Ormond Road, Rathmines, Dublin, Ireland. Its six quarto pages are full of good Liberal reading matter. Ireland is a hard place, one would think, for a Liberal paper, and perhaps the locality accounts for the "fewness" of its pages. We wish them success in that priest-ridden isle.

Discussion of the National Financial System.

MORRISON'S SECOND LETTER.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: It seems to hav been a fortunate circumstance for Mr. Truesdell that I referred to the "fiat" of law in the creation of money, and injected a little irony into my last article, else he would hav been hard pushed to hav found something to say; but as it was he got in two columns, but not one word in defense of banks of issue; not a word in defense of the interest on money that our people are and hav been paying. And that leads me to conclude that he too does not wholly indorse our present financial system. I do not reject Webster or Worcester, but acknowledge them as standard lexicographers, whose business it is to arrange in alphabetical order the words of a language, giving their meaning and proper application. But when either of them attempts to fix the theological or financial question for a nation they have overstepped their field of labor. Webster's definition of money was correct in his day; but must his definition of money, like the pope's theological bull, forever bar the road to progress? No, never. The right of humanity will assert itself in spite of dictionaries and popes' edicts. So far Mr. T. has been dodging the arguments advanced. Will you get down to hard work and answer my articles, either by saying what I have advanced is true, or proving them otherwise? If you will stick close to the subject, and meet my arguments rightly belonging to the first four numbers as marked out in my first article, after we hav done with those, then, as before indicated, we will discuss the new monetary unit. So far I hav said but little about our national banking system. It is a fraud of such fascinating appearance, so innocent-looking on its face, claiming to be so essential to the well-being of our people, that the masses fail to see lurking beneath its bland exterior the deadly poison of monarchy—the blasting upas tree, whose branches permeate every neighborhood, laying its industries, its very life and spirit, under tribute. This national banking system is a "monster of so frightful mien, as to be hated needs but to be seen." To be seen it must be understood.

Now, dear reader, remember that money—a circulating medium—is an absolute necessity; it is the life-blood of the nation; of our well-being as a people, as individuals. As nature did not provide man with money it became necessary as civilization advanced to furnish it for himself. As barter was the primitive mode of exchange, so at the present time some think we can not prosper upon any other principle of action except "value for value," which simply means this: to force the people in their exchanges to a gold standard. Under various acts of Congress we hav gold and silver coin, greenbacks, and national bank notes, as money. Though gold does not circulate as a medium among the people, neither does silver only to a limited extent.

National bank notes form the great bulk of our currency. Now let us see upon what does the strength of the national bank currency rest. Without stopping to speak of the corrupting influences brought to bear upon Congress during the memorable years of '62, '63, '64, and '65, I will simply state that five or more men would take say $300,000 to Washington and exchange their money for $300,000 six per cent gold-bearing bonds. They then form a national bank, deposit their bonds, and receive for their bank $270,000 in national currency. They hav now let the government hav $30,000 in currency more than they received for banking purposes, and draw gold interest on $300,000, amounting to $18,000 a year, and exempt from taxation. This $18,000 was derived from the investment of the $30,000 loaned to the government, for they received back from the government the amount invested for the bonds less $30,000. When we take up and carefully scrutinize the various reports of the comptroller of the currency we find that the gains of the national banks hav been enormous. On the 1st of September, 1873, there were in operation in the United States and territories, 1,955 national banks, whose capital amounted to $488,100,951. Surplus, $118,113,848. Net earnings for six months, $33,122,000. At same time their circulation amounted to $353,968,279.

| Bank note circulation furnished by the government, without interest,..... | $353,968,279 |
| Real capital, ..... | $134,132,672 |
| Surplus earnings..... | $118,113,848 |

From the above figures we find that the net earnings for the six months amounted to over 24 per cent, or nearly 50 per cent a year. The above figures cannot be controverted. Such earnings are out of all proportion to that of any industry in our land. These enormous profits operate as a tax on every kind of industry, and more than anything else tend to bring about the periodical contraction of the currency, thus taking money out of the channels of trade and locking it up in the vaults of the banks. If the national banks can only succeed in destroying the greenback they will then have the exclusive control of the issuance of the currency. Thus a huge monopoly will be able to control not only the volume of currency but the rate of interest thereon, as well as the purchasing power of the same. Usurious rates of interest periodically produce inflation and contraction of the currency, thus spreading financial destruction broadcast over a land where want and misery should never be seen. I do declare it wickedly careless—if not insane—for our people to allow a few men to usurp, through class legislation, the control of anything so essential to the well-being, so absolutely indispensable to the needs of civilization, as is money. How long will it take the people to learn that monopolies ever operate for themselves; never for the best good of the many. This national banking monopoly bribed their way into power; they hav never been willing to be governed by the will of the people. This monopoly has an insatiate appetite for untaxed interest-bearing bonds, that will hang like a deadly incubus upon the head and hands of productive industry for all time to come. I now declare that the above arraignment of the national banking system is true, and not all the truth either; then am I not justified in saying that this system is a fraud?

I hav made it plain that the business of the country can not be done with coin of gold and silver alone, on account of the limited supply of those metals, and further on account of their being so easily hid away, and of the danger—in fact, certainty—of their being exported, etc.; that they can not be an honest basis for paper promises to pay money. I hav also shown, in part, wherein our past and present banking system is a fraud; and to make the proof stronger I will now take up No. 4, which affirms usury to be a fraud. And I must be permitted to say that of all the innocent, harmless-looking amusements practiced on this earth that of loaning money for interest is the most deceitful and devilish. Money is held to be so much property, in which it is just as right and proper to trade and speculate as it is in hogs, cattle, iron, or any of the products of labor. (Here now is a chance for friend Truesdell to join issue.) The right to speculate in money has been sanctioned by the ages, by the state; upheld by the church as not only right, but highly honorable. It has become woven into the very warp and woof of our civilization, our religion, and, sad to say, our morals. Napoleon said, "I can conquer a nation but I can not change its literature." So when time, with all the force that time gathers, has established in the minds of the people that a certain thing is right, it takes a long time to educate the minds of the masses out of the hoary-headed error. People forget that money in its uses is wholly unlike any other property (I use the word "property" to represent the common idea); money possesses, or should, the legal power to discharge debts. The value of a dollar loses nothing by time or use; in this sense, lay away $100 for ten years; at the end of that time you have $100. But pay out this $100 for a horse, and at the end of ten years the horse will not bring you $100—the price of horses being the same. Time will wear out and destroy everything but money—and I should hav added debt. And if it is Mr. T.'s kind of money, gold and silver, even it will wear out in time if you can get it to circulate enough. But the idea I wish to convey is that the interest-bearing dollar never wears out. It is a consuming fire that is never quenched, but rolls on and on, gathering new materials silently, unseen, unnoticed, until its accumulations become a mighty torrent sweeping every industry and man's happiness alike to destruction. This has been done about every ten years during the history of our country from 1809. Can Mr. Truesdell giv a sensible reason for those periodical revulsions in business only upon the theory advanced above? If such a condition of things are inherent in nature, and man can not help it, then I say that nature is a fraud. But I do not believe it is inherent. Much has been said about the contraction of the currency, but I believe that usury is the real cause, and the contraction of the currency more of an effect, or a necessary result of usury.

Reader, take the time to examine this question and you will be astonished at the enormous profits derived by the money loaner and broker. It is from three to ten times greater than can be made by productive industry. Reader, let me give you one little fact in history to show the enormous power of interest, as taken from that monument of "truth and soberness," Kellogg's New American Monetary System.

"The assessed property of Massachusetts in 1790 was $44,024,349, and in 1840 it had increased to $299,880,338. The increase of wealth in the state the fifty years was $255,855,989. The legal rate of interest was six per cent. Loan the $44,024,349 for fifty years at the above rate, interest added to the principal every six months, and we hav in interest $885,524,246 multiplied by $44,024,349 equals $929,548,595. The actual increase of wealth in the state during the fifty years was but $255,855,989. Add to this the principal or property of the state in 1790, viz., $44,024,349, and the entire wealth of the state in 1840 amounted to $299,880,338, or not one-third as much as the accumulation by interest on the same would hav been in fifty years at six per cent per annum." "The people of Massachusetts increased their wealth in fifty years $255,855,989, by adding labor and skill to raw material and undeveloped resources. The country has been made so much the richer, but the man who accumulates by usury adds nothing to the world's stock of wealth. He is the wolf of society, robbing industry of her just reward." "Usury, the sum of all villainies, enables the few to liv in splendid luxury and ease upon the blood and muscle of the many. It creates castes, and builds up partition walls in society. It roots out democracy and establishes aristocracy. Its whole tendency is monarchical; the thrones of Europe, to-day, are simply cocoons of usury gathered from the stripped branches of industry. This insatiable worm is devouring the substance of the American people. Its relentless fangs are upon every productive interest, and its teeth are mortgage-clinched to every sod of Columbia's soil. What reward for patriotic sacrifices! What gratitude for a government to encourage the robbery and spoliation of its heroic defenders! What stupidity for a people to be led, party-blind, to their own destruction! Usury must be abolished, root and branch, or it will absorb the life, liberty, and property of the people. It is industry's greatest foe, liberty's most imminent danger, civilization's greatest curse. Now, friend T., stick close to the text.

Respectfully, H. H. MORRISON.

The Postal Laws Perverted.

We hav said that the Comstock postal laws ought to be repealed. Our reasons are, first, that Congress has no right to prohibit any kind of private correspondence through the mails or to create a postal censorship over the press; second, that the laws are grossly perverted in their execution. The first objection can only be obviated by repeal; the second may be met by amendment.

It is hard to convince the public that a law should be abolished if it is apparently a good law. The American people are not apt to look beyond the present. They abhor obscenity, therefore they approve all laws for its suppression. Tell them Congress has no authority to enact such laws, and they reply, "What of that? The laws will help break up this vile business, won't they?" Tell them such laws will gradually lead to similar ones for the suppression of Freethought, and they carelessly reply, "Sufficient unto the day is the evil thereof." But while they cannot, or, in their carelessness, will not, appreciate the difference between a good law, enacted by competent authority, and guarded against abuse, and an apparently well intended and desirable law, enacted by incompetent authority and open to abuse, they can understand, and they will condemn, a perversion of these laws to the injury of free discussion, for the benefit of religious bigotry.

The language of Comstock's postal law, by authority of which most of his operations are conducted, is as follows, so far as it relates to publications other than advertisements:

No obscene, lewd, or lascivious book, pamphlet, picture, paper, print, or other publication of an indecent character . . . shall be carried in the mail; and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery of any of the hereinbefore-mentioned articles or things . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for every offense, be fined not less than $100, nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years, or both.

Assuming for the time that Congress is empowered to control the mails, no law could appear more commendable or innocent than this. When it was first enacted there was, and to some extent there still is, a class of books and pictures clearly within the terms "obscene, lewd, lascivious" and "of an indecent character." No fine-spun legal definitions of these adjectives would be necessary to make the dealers in that class of books and pictures amenable to this law. All such publications are bought and sold in secret; and to be discovered in possession of them is to be disgraced. It was to suppress these, to punish their publishers, and to exterminate the trade, that this law was passed.

Now, how has it been abused? We hav already shown how it was perverted to the oppression of Dr. Foote for belonging to another than the so-called regular school of medicine. In his case he was condemned to pay a heavy fine because his clerk mailed a physiological work of his authorship—a book which did not contain a single lewd expression or sentiment, and which was honestly intended to benefit those who sought his professional advice. Dr. Foote could never hav been convicted but for the sweeping definition of the word "obscene," by which Judge Benedict dragged the jury to a verdict.

We now propose to direct attention to the case of D. M. Bennett, whom Comstock finally drove behind the bars of a prison upon pretense that he had violated these laws, whereas, in fact, he was only guilty of questioning Comstock's religious creed.

D. M. Bennett was a publisher, doing business on Eighth street, opposite the Mercantile Library. He was also the editor of a weekly paper called THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, though certainly not a champion of orthodox piety, was clean in every respect. Most of his publications had an Infidel tendency; he was, therefore, Comstock's natural prey. It was to ruin such men that Comstock laid his plans. The occasional conviction of a dealer in vile stuff—one for whom the law was really intended by Congress—is mere routine work with Comstock; but to destroy Infidel publishers, to suppress Infidel prints, and to shackle Infidel thought, is the principal, though covert, design of his so-called Society for the Suppression of Vice; and to effect this design is the work and aim of Comstock's life. "Obscenity," "indecency," "lewdness"—these are trivial subjects. Infidelity must be stamped out; and this Society is organized to stamp it out. And laws against obscenity will answer the purpose as well as any other so long as there is a pious judge like Benedict to define obscenity. When even the sweep of Benedict's net cannot reach the higher order of Infidel thought and discussion, the law will hav become so fixed in our Federal jurisprudence that a gradual advance—one step at a time—will soon drive from the mails every literary enemy of orthodox religion. This is the real policy of the Society, and it has often been discussed in more than one secret meeting among the more active and aggressive members, at which Comstock himself has been present.

Comstock accordingly visited Bennett's publishing house, and found there two pamphlets which he thought might be brought within the obscenity laws; one was entitled, "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," and the other, "How do Marsupials Propagate their Kind? The first was graced with a title which would naturally shock a tender religious sentiment nourished in the orthodox Christian school; but the letter itself was a vigorous inquiry into the evidences of the divinity of Jesus. The other, though it did not refer specially to, or illustrate its arguments by, the Old Original Bartlett of the Sun, was an honest discussion of a legitimate subject.

That Comstock knew these books were not obscene is evident. Had they been, Bennett's mere possession would hav convicted him of crime in a state court; but the state courts do not countenance Judge Benedict's sweep-net definition of obscenity, and therefore Comstock prepared himself to get Bennett into Judge Benedict's court. Comstock knew that in the opinion of religionists Infidel publications hav a tendency to deprave and corrupt morals, and from inward personal experience he knew that the discussion of some questions in natural history would hav a tendency to excite lustful thoughts in the minds of those open to such influences and into whose hands such publications might fall. He also knew that Judge Benedict would charge a jury that books with such tendencies were obscene. He therefore felt sure of his game when Bennett mailed to Salacious Bender, alias Anthony Comstock, at Squan Village, New Jersey, a copy of each of the pamphlets named.

Let the public remember that Bennett was not a dealer in vile literature; that he claimed these pamplets were morally inoffensive, and proper publications; that he had not been tried, nor had the pamphlets ever been adjudged to be unlawful by any one but Anthony Comstock; that they were property as much entitled to protection from seizure and confiscation as any other property; and that D. M. Bennett was, before the law, at that time, a guiltless man, and then let it be explained whether he was treated as a citizen of a republic or a subject of despotism.

This outrage was brought to the attention of Bob Ingersoll, and, after examining the pamphlets, he went before the postmaster-general, and asked if it was the intention of the department to permit criminal prosecutions for mailing such publications. Comstock was even then growing strong in this department, and he exerted himself to prevent unfavorable official action upon his pet project. The postmaster general would hav given his influence to Comstock had not Bob Ingersoll threatened to defend Bennett before the courts and the country, if Comstock was not checked in this particular kind of persecution. Key was not anxious to rouse Bob to the point of war paint-and tomahawk, and even the youthful Christians of New York subsided perceptibly at the prospects of an overhauling by the Infidel orator. Still the matter gave rise to considerable discussion in official circles at Washington, which was finally terminated by the emphatic orders of the attorney-general to his New York subordinate to discontinue proceedings against Bennett.

In fact Attorney-General Devens is the only federal officer with whom Comstock has official relations that dares be independent.

Bennett was accordingly discharged, but there was a relentless foe of his loose in the world, who soon reaped revenge for the disappointment he suffered in this first attempt.

Mr. Thomson to Col. Ingersoll.

BROTHER INGERSOLL: You are not wholly a stranger to me. I once had the pleasure of hearing you lecture, and hav read some of your works. You hav called out this communication by the following beautiful sentence: "In the night of death hope sees a star, and listening love can hear the rustling of a wing." Are not those mental emotions nature's cords connecting us with a higher life? Are not these conceptions, these aspirations and yearnings for a higher, holier life, nature's product in the human mind? Hav they no sequence? Is this the end? There was no beginning; there can be no end; but rather, Are they not our natural relations with that higher life? Scientists say that all phenomena are the result of matter and force, classed by natural law. Hav not the co-existent laws of demand and supply a natural relation as perpetual as gravitation or evolution? Then how can we conclude that this mental embryo of immortality, that has taken nature cycles of time to produce, is but an abortion of earth? besides, I am not wholly the child of earth; the earth is my mother, the sun is my father. With his potential arms of light and heat he embraces Mother Earth, and impregnates her with all her phenomena of organism. On her lap, with outstretched arms, I yearn for a more intimate acquaintance with my father. My weaning time shall soon come. When I slide from the lap of Mother, may I not go out into the great world of worlds, visit my father, and acquire an intellectual fortune amid a universe of knowledge? This is my demand; this is the demand of earth. I hav but a taste of the joys of knowledge. I require a full meal. I hav a right to ask. My credentials are the universal laws of demand and supply. Evolution! excelsior! We may not be able to understand the exact workings of evolution in all its details until we are promoted to the higher school over there. It may then be our field-glass through which we can see our past tracks, and by following them up establish our identity and comprehend our moorings and future bearings in the onward flow of time. Reason may be our star of hope, but knowledge alone can open to us the consciousness of immortality. But one world at a time. Our present duty is here. Our people are impoverished and hungering for knowledge. I will propose for consideration the following seeming truisms: That social poverty is the twin sister of ignorance and evil; that prosperity is the basis of mental and moral improvement; that the individual has an inherent right to life, liberty, and the fruits of his own labor; all wealth is the product of labor; that all honest money is the true and legal representative of labor by national agreement; that United States money is the creation of national law; that in the composition of money wisdom requires convenience and durability, with the least intrinsic value; that to select a labor product for the composition of money, thereby raising its price above its real worth, is a national act of injustice to labor. I am a worshiper of truth; show me my errors and I will drop them. Truth always givs one something better. With brotherly love, I am

Yours, J. S. THOMSON.

A Republic or a Theocracy?

TO MY FELLOW-CITIZENS OF THE UNITED STATES: This great question now pending hangs over our nation like a huge cloud charged with all the powers of destruction, ready to begin its work of desolation at a touch.

Shall this government remain a republic? or become a theocracy? Shall we acknowledge the supremacy of man? or God? Shall we be governed by the good judgment and progressive tendency of scientific people, or the trembling fears of superstition and the furious vengeance of a supernatural being? Shall we breathe the air of the living present? or of the dead past? or of an unknown future?

An organization known as the National Reform Association devotes itself wholly to the cause of theocracy. The second article of its constitution reads as follows:

The object of this Society shall be to maintain existing Christian features in the American government, and to secure such an amendment to the Constitution of the United States as will indicate that this is a Christian nation, and place all the Christian laws, institutions, and usages of our government on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land.

Let it be understood that this is a government by the people, and for the people, for the Atheist as well as for the Christian; that its glory consists, or ought to consist, in dealing equally and justly with all, irrespective of color or creed, and that it should always remain such. Yet the above-named association would take from the American people the sacred rights to rule themselves and place it in the hands of Jesus Christ, a god who died and turned to dust eighteen hundred years ago. It would make such amendments to the Constitution of the United States as would indicate that this is a Christian nation. It would bring God into the Constitution, and would forever unite church and state. It would disfranchise all who do not possess that precious jewel of fear and ignorance called faith. It would make faith in Jesus a requisite to eligibility. It would introduce into our public schools King James' version of the Bible, and call it "God's letter to man."

A correspondent of the Christian Statesman says: "That the Bible is worthy of being accepted by all as the word of God and the only infallible rule of faith and manners, appears" from five reasons which I will briefly notice.

I. From its adaptation to the human heart. "Food is adapted to the stomach and the stomach to food. So the human heart is adapted to the Bible and the Bible to the human heart."

I deny that the Bible is adapted to the human heart as food is to the stomach. If it was, human beings could not liv without the Bible any more than they could without food. That many hav lived long and happily without the Bible can not be denied. But no one can liv any length of time without food.

II. From its perfect oneness. "The Bible was written by forty-two different men, writing in different styles, in different places, in different languages, and in different generations. And yet, when their writings were put together they made a perfect unit."

2 Sam. vi, 23, says: Michal, the daughter of Saul, had no child unto the day of her death. 2d Sam. xxi, 8, speaks of the five sons of Michal, the daughter of Saul. Is this consistency?

2 Sam. xxiv, 9: And Joab gave up the sum of the number of the people unto the king (David), and there were in Israel eight hundred thousand valiant men that drew the sword; and the men of Judah five hundred thousand men. 1 Chron. xxi, 5: And Joab gave the sum of the number of the people unto David. And all they of Israel were a thousand thousand and a hundred thousand (1,100,000) men that drew sword; and Judah was four hundred three score and ten thousand (470,000) men that drew sword. How is this for oneness?

Matt. xxvii, 5: And he (Judas) cast down the pieces of silver in the temple and departed, and went and hanged himself. Acts i, 18: And falling headlong he (Judas) burst asunder in the midst, and all his bowels gushed out. Is this oneness? Is this perfect oneness?

III. From its majesty and purity. "The purity of the scriptures do not need vindicating. They are holy, just, and good."

Deut. xiv, 21: Ye shall not eat of anything that dieth of itself: thou shalt giv it unto the stranger that is in thy gates, that he may eat it; or thou mayest sell it unto an alien: for thou art an holy people unto the Lord thy God. Thou shalt not seethe a kid in his mother's milk.

Is this purity? Does this need to be vindicated? If not, what about Gen. xxxviii?

IV. From the fulfilment of prophecy. "The Bible is verily God's word. These holy men of old spake as they were moved by the Holy Ghost."

Jer. v, 37: The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests bear rule by their means; and my people love to hav it so: and what will ye do in the end?

Jer. vi, 13: For from the least of them even unto the greatest of them every one is given to covetousness; and from the prophet even unto the priest every one dealeth falsely.

If these statements of the Bible be true, and prophecy has been fulfilled, then has falsehood been fulfilled. If falsehood has not been fulfilled, then are these statements not true, or prophecy has not been fulfilled.

V. From its fruits. "We instinctively trust a man who believes in, and studies, and practices the Bible."

What Bible? King James's Bible, containing sixty-six books, which was translated by forty-seven Church-of England priests? The Roman Catholic Bible, containing seventy-six books? Luther's Bible, which does not contain Revelations? Perhaps the Jewish Bible, which, according to Josephus, contains twenty-two books? But it matters not which; the works and fruits of one are as bloody as those of the rest. Each sanctions almost every species of crime. Each is productive of slavery, misery, and woe. Each has inaugurated revolution and bloodshed. If this were not the case, religious zealots would not be so anxious to hav it based on an undeniable legal basis in the fundamental law of the land. If they were not aware that their God is slowly tottering down to nothing, they would not think of establishing him by law.

Each man's God, if he has any, is his own private property; and we, as American citizens, as a liberty-loving people, as men and women, hav no moral right to use physical force or the shackles of the law, in depriving any one of his God, in putting up another, or in dictating as to his bounden duty to that God. As soon as we acknowledge any God in our Constitution, national reform will begin; but it will be reform back toward the dark ages. This government will then be a theocracy, and the rights of man will be no longer respected. But may such never happen. May our government remain, and, if possible, be made more secular; may church and state remain forever separate institutions; may the five points of Calvanism never be a legal requisite for holding offices of trust; may the people rule supreme, and the Bible be kept from our public schools; may our republic forever remain a government for the people and by the people.

W. M. SCHUWERK.

An Open Letter to Sara A. Underwood.

I received a sample copy of the Index containing a marked letter written by Sara A. Underwood, of Thorndike, Mass., claiming the Bible is not obscene, etc., and condemning "Cupid's Yokes" for its obscenity. I hav never seen nor read "Cupid's Yokes," and cannot say as to the truth of the charges against it; I leave this for those to judge who hav read it; but the Bible I hav read, and I find in it many passages that are too filthy and disgusting to be read in any society, and cannot see how they could be called by any other name than obscenity. I think if you had read the Bible with a clearer perception and unprejudiced mind you could not help but see that it contains such passages. I will only refer you to a few of them. You certainly will pardon me for my audacity, as it is the "Sacred Scriptures" that I am referring to: Ezekiel iv; 2 Samuel xvi, 22; Genesis xxxviii, 9; Job xi, 17; 2 Kings xviii; Isaiah xxvi, 18; Deuteronomy xxv, 1; Judges iii; Leviticus xv, 16.

The polygamists and free-lusters of the day are ever ready to giv an excuse for their libertinism by referring to these so-called "sacred" pages; and in these you claim "there are no impure hints to fire the imagination and unguided passions of youth." I will refer you to the polygamy and Freelovism of Abraham, Jacob, Solomon, and to the command of God to David and Hosea regarding their concubines and the thirty-two thousand young maidens who were distributed among the Israelitish army to suffer a fate worse by far than death—to become the wives and concubines of those who had slaughtered their fathers, mothers, sisters, and brothers, made by the express command of God: "As the Lord spake unto Moses saying, Kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman that hath known man by lying with him, but all the women-children keep alive for yourselves." (Num. xxxi.) You may say that these are only a record of facts of an uncultured race of people; nevertheless hav they not had their influences, and will they not hav, for evil, as long as people believe that such passages are of "divine authority?" Is it not plain that they teach obscenity, polygamy, and Freelovism? You say you would put into the hands of youth a thousand Bibles rather than one copy of "Cupid's Yokes," as far as obscenity and morality are concerned, and that you never dreamed that the Bible was obscene until you read it in scurrilous writings, misnamed "Liberal." You profess to be a Liberal, and censure others for upholding the purity of "Cupid's Yokes" and condemning the Bible for obscenity. We do not wish to uphold either, for this reason: True Liberalism is not founded on the Bible nor "Cupid's Yokes," but upon common sense. What you are condemning others for, the same guilt is applicable to yourself. If you are not whitewashing "Cupid's Yokes" you are the Bible (like many of our professed Christians, who hav as yet learned to see but one side of a question). I am with you, Mrs. Underwood, when you say "Liberalism needs no such false props;" nor can it succeed without sifting the chaff from the wheat. And the sooner this is done the better; we hav already too many orthodox and Catholic Liberals in our ranks professing to be what they are not. We can very readily spare a few of them by placing them where they belong; then and not till then will the cause of true Liberalism prosper. Those who wish to harmonize error with truth, and vice with virtue, had better go back to the church from whence they came, and preach Jesus and him crucified. You seem to regret that such "silly flings" were thrown against the Bible at the Cincinnati Liberal Convention, which "seem to place it on the same footing with 'Cupid's Yokes,'" etc. True Liberalism teaches that obscenity is no better in one book than another, and should be as much abhorred in the Bible as "Cupid's Yokes," or wherever it may really exist; and herein is where the trouble lies. The Pharisee was thankful that he was not as other men. So it is with many that profess Liberalism. They claim, in substance, "I am better than thou." The pure motives of the heart are what constitute true greatness; and wisdom, which should be the governing power, detects error wherever error lies, and adheres to truth wherever found.

Letters from Friends.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find post-office order for forty dollars, which you may apply as follows: Twenty-five dollars as my contribution to sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER during friend Bennett's imprisonment, and the balance for subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880 and the list of books you find inclosed.

To say I hav been mad all summer expresses but a small part of what my feelings hav been in relation to Bennett's imprisonment. I consider it the most dastardly outrage that has been committed in a long time. It only shows what theology would do if it had the power. They will miss their mark in one thing: they will not break down THE TRUTH SEEKER, which was their real object. I like it better every number. I traveled considerably on the Pacific Coast last summer, and know there is no Freethought journal that has half so many friends among the Liberals as it has.

I could not stand the Index any longer, and hav ordered it stopped the 1st of January. Abbot, as a writer, I admire. When he writes on theology I think he has no superior, and I am indebted more to him for my views on that subject than any other man. But I cannot stand his insane jealousy of your paper; there is nothing else the matter with him. I'm sure Mr. Wright told him the truth when he said, "If the Index went down he would hav no one to blame but himself."

I like Mr. Palmer's articles on the "Religion of Humanity" very much; they are just the thing at this time.

Never fear but that THE TRUTH SEEKER will be sustained; it is gaining friends every day, and this last attack of Bundy and Abbot has made it more friends than ever.

I am fifty-three years of age, and cast my first vote for Martin Van Buren on the Free-Soil ticket in 1848, and hav voted the Republican ticket ever since, even up to Hayes, which I am sincerely sorry for. Talk of the "back-bone" of that man, he has not got any, or he would not hav allowed a few ministers to bulldoze him out of pardoning Bennett after two hundred thousand citizens had petitioned for his release, and knowing, as he must hav known, that he was imprisoned wrongfully. The Republican party gets no more votes from me.

Hoping Mr. Bennett may be released soon, I remain yours for the truth, let it be what it may, RUFUS PERKINS.

NORTH BENNINGTON, VT., Dec. 10, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: You will find inclosed five dollars, for which please send me one copy of the "Holy Bible Abridged," one copy of "Behind the Bars," and one copy of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Saviors or None," and the remainder appropriate to the fund that is being contributed for the benefit of D. M. Bennett.

Abbot, Bundy, and their co-workers claim that very many of Mr. Bennett's sympathizers are acting under a delusion in bestowing their benefits upon him, and will regret having done so after they hav fully understood his abandoned private character and the evil influence he exerts upon Christian society as the publisher and editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. But I act understandingly when I express my sympathy for Mr. Bennett and my disregard for his persecutors.

Mr. Abbot, on account of his disappointed ambition in not continuing to be president of the National Liberal League, reminds me of a young man whom I once knew, who at a certain time met a clergyman at an orthodox conference meeting. The clergyman represented to the young man his danger while living under the curse of original sin, and advised him to come to Jesus for salvation; to which the young man replied that he would rather be a king in hell than an underling in heaven. And I believe Mr. Abbot prefers to be a king over the eight Liberal Leagues of America than to hold a minor office in connection with the one hundred and fifty National Liberal Leagues.

I know Col. Bundy through the R.-P. Journal, of which he is editor and publisher, and know him to be a renegade Spiritualist—if he ever was a Spiritualist. Not being content with using his best efforts to vilify and blacken the reputations of the most worthy and reliable spirit mediums in existence he has joined hands with Mr. Abbot in his crusade against Mr. Bennett and others of the worthy Liberals who compose the National Liberal League. Thus much for Abbot and Bundy; and I advise their co-workers to profit by the mistake or misfortune of Mr. Bennett, and not place their affections too strongly upon innocent and confiding young girls of thirty five years of age.

I am a Spiritualist, and consequently my views in a spiritual direction do not harmonize with the Materialistic professions of Mr. Bennett, but I freely concede to Mr. Bennett the same right to promulgate his honest opinions—however much they may differ from mine—that I claim for myself.

Mr. Bennett has largely exposed the fallacies entertained by the orthodox Christian church, and its desire to obtain supreme control of the social, religious, and political conditions of our whole country. And this church, through its machinery, composed of a small clique of disaffected Spiritualists, the Liberal League of America, the Young Men's Christian Association, represented by Anthony Comstock, and a bigoted, prejudiced court and jury, has succeeded in incarcerating Mr. Bennett in the Albany Penitentiary; and I am waiting very impatiently for his release from prison, in order that he may hav an opportunity to meet the charges that are being brought against him by his avowed enemies.

HARVEY HOWES.

FLORENCE, IOWA, Dec. 24, 1879.

THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 20th is a grand number. The articles of Elizur Wright, W. F. Jamieson, Dr. Bentley, T. C. Leland, and the letters of Messrs. Bennett, Campfield, Green, Goddard, and others are all admirable. "The Lady Doth Protest too Much" has some capital hits. The way the paper is now being conducted there is no danger of its losing popularity as compared with its envious and pigmy rivals. Every true Liberal, as he thinks of where D. M. Bennett is and who placed him there, will redouble his labors in the cause of Freethought and Secularism.

E. C. WALKER.

DANVILLE, WIS., Dec. 25, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: For the inclosed three dollars please renew my subscription for another year. I am an earnest searcher after truth, and I know of no surer place to find it than in THE TRUTH SEEKER. Although I like the present management of the paper well, still I will gladly cast my vote for D. M. Bennett to be editor-in-chief of THE TRUTH SEEKER, also for him to be vice-president of the United States, with Col. R. G. Ingersoll for president, in 1884—provided it can't be done sooner.

I think every Liberal ought to follow Mrs. Bennett's praiseworthy example and pardon the truly honest old man for his acknowledged misstep, the only one he ever made in his whole life, and, in my opinion, a very trifling one at that. Yours for fairness, J. W. HARTLEY.

PARIS, ILL., Dec. 25, 1879.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Madam: Inclosed find P. O. order for $10.25, $7.25 of it to apply to remittance for Jan. 1, 1880, and three dollars for one copy of "Analysis of Religious Belief," by Viscount Amberley. Please send the book at the earliest possible time, as I order it for a friend that wants to make a present of it.

Wishing you a merry Christmas and a happy New Year, and regretting that your husband is not at liberty to enjoy it, and hoping that the time will come when it will not be possible to cast a man into prison for sending a book through the mail that is sold openly on the streets of our large cities, I am Respectfully, W. H. GEOHEGAN.

COUDERSPORT, PA., Dec. 16, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find P. O. order for three dollars, which you will please place to my credit on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I commenced taking your paper as a trial subscriber, and my time having run out some time ago I am glad you continued to send. I neglected to send my subscription before, not because I did not like the paper, but through pressure of business. I like the idea of one thousand of Mr. Bennett's friends sending him ten dollars when he is liberated. You can count me in as suggested by Grace L. Parkhurst. I think she struck the key note in last week's TRUTH SEEKER, and hope that when Mr. Bennett regains his liberty his paper will hav the largest circulation of any paper in America. I circulate it around this town, and hope to obtain a few subscribers soon.

Respectfully, W. W. DUNHAM.

CAMARGO, ILL., Dec. 15, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find draft for seven dollars to be used as directed. I don't want THE TRUTH SEEKER to die under any consideration. I sincerely sympathize with you in your present condition. It is enough to hav the Christian church harass you, to say nothing about Abbot, Bundy, and Underwood, pretended or conditional Liberals, hounding you as they hav. There is one thing the Liberals hav not realized as yet, and that is that the Grant and fraud party is not the Republican party which was captured in 1868 by the church and great moneyed monopolies, the former furnishing the pretended moral influence, and the latter the money and votes. The national banks are clamoring for the wiping out of the legal tenders, and substituting national bonds for the same. The two frauds, Hayes and Sherman, in their public documents hav recommended it, but finding they were a little too fast they hav been compelled to call a temporary halt until after the next election. Should they succeed, then farewell legal tender. Anthony Comstock will commence throwing out of the mails all Liberal publications, classing them as obscene. Don't think this is imaginary, for the evidence is staring us in the face. One of our brightest Liberal lights says he has no faith in the Democratic party. He ought to know if he has been there, as I hav not. But I noticed in 1872 when the effort was made to unite church and state that every Republican voted for it, and every Democrat voted against it. I know that every Democrat within my reach would sign a petition for the repeal of the Comstock laws, and no Republicans would except avowed Liberals. I hav had experience in this matter. Hoping that liberty may liv, I remain, Fraternally yours, W. H. PEARCE.

PRATT, ILL., Dec. 10, 1879.

MR. EDITOR: Inclosed please find three dollars to be credited on my subscription. Mr. Bennett wishes an expression as to whether he shall resign as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER or not. I emphatically say no, never, and no "hardly ever" about it. I received a copy of the R.-P. Journal and the Index, containing the howl over Mr. Bennett's letters, and I cannot find words to express the utter contempt I felt for such a mean, contemptible, and cowardly attack upon one who was in prison, with no chance to defend himself, and what makes it all the more contemptible is its coming from those who pretend to be friendly to the Liberal cause. I do not nor cannot believe that the editors of either of those papers hav a particle of honesty in this matter. Why do they not go over to the orthodox side where they belong? There they might extol the merits of the only righteous persons who could be found in Sodom and Gomorrah. They might make it a study to find out where Lot's daughters got their whiskey to get righteous Lot drunk so the whole caboodle could commit incest and in their drunken frolic still retain their righteousness. If these things can be done, and they still retain their righteousness, it seems to me that we might forgive Mr. Bennett for writing some foolish letters, and I think we would if it was not for the crime of trying to lead astray a young, inexperienced girl of the tender age of thirty-five. Good Lord! when I come to think of it, my wife had ten children when she was thirty-five. Perhaps in the city of New York it takes longer to get past the age of innocence than it does in Illinois.

It seems to me as though if every lover of right and justice would do his duty the R.-P. Journal and Index would not hav a subscriber left. I read the copies sent me, wherein were published your letters, then burnt them up so that no one else could see them.

I hav read the facts concerning your trial and conviction, and I must say that if ever there was any rascality perpetrated by law your case was one. I got some signatures to the petition for your release, but think it was wrong, as I believe we should only hav signed a demand. I always voted the Republican ticket until last year, but now I say good-bye forever. I belong to the Greenback-Labor party, and I think the Liberals might utilize this party as they are mostly Liberals.

JAMES M. PRATT.

WHEATLAND, IOWA, Dec. 10, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Send TRUTH SEEKER to a trial subscriber for three months. We must try and increase the circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the best paper now published. I, too, received a sample copy of the Index filled with abuse of Bennett and Rawson, either one of which I believe to be a much better man than the "cultured consensus," and Bundy should not be mentioned in the same letter with either of them.

Tell Bro. Bennett we love him better than ever since his last letter. There has been so much denying of facts by the clergy lately that it seems refreshing to hav our Liberal brother "acknowledge the corn," and he did it in such good style we all know it is true. What a letter that was! If Abbot and Bundy read it I guess they felt as though they had "let a bird go."

I am anxious for his time to expire, so he can again occupy his chair; and then if he does not make it red-hot for somebody, I shall lose my guess; and, in fact, I think Eugene Macdonald makes it decidedly lively for the slanderers. Truly, JEROME DUTTON.

SNOWVILLE, VA.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: I do not know that I can begin the new year with any better or more useful work than that of helping to hold up the hands of one of the most effective, industrious, and indefatigable laborers in the field of universal mental liberty; one who has done more to enlighten the people in regard to the old time-worn superstition of the ages, and the tyrannical deeds of the Christian church, than any other man living. One who, though behind the prison bars, unjustly confined through priestly power and influence, is still writing, printing, and publishing books, tracts, and papers with almost lightning rapidity and speaking bold, brave, fearless words that reach the hearts of thousands and hundreds of thousands, teaching them fact instead of fiction, truth instead of falsehood, and honesty and frankness instead of fraud, hypocrisy, and duplicity.

I send thee as a token of my appreciation of thy labors one dollar for two three months' subscribers, and one dollar as a New Years' gift, only devoutly wishing I had the power as I hav the will to multiply it by tens of thousands; but as this is impossible I hope as many as can of the friends and readers will supplement the amount, and thus show by deeds the sympathy and good will that has been so freely given in words.

Be brave, toil in love,
Whatever troubles harrow;
Learn wisdom from the tiny flowers,
And patience from the spar row.

Yes, toil and trust with all thy might,
And so shall hope resplendent,
With all her sweet, supporting power,
Be ever thy attendant.

— Dr. Henrietta L. Buckner,
EMMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

ALLIANCE, OHIO, Dec. 17, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hope you may continue THE TRUTH SEEKER in the future as you hav so bravely done in the past. I do not wish to interfere in the private business of any one. I think more of Bennett today than ever. His acknowledgment to the correspondence that is troubling Bundy and Abbot to such an extent shows the greatest mark of honesty that I ever heard of. Juliet H. Severance has spoken my mind better in your last issue than I can speak it myself. I think the dressing she has given Peebles just the thing for him. I think it would be well for him to enter some Methodist conference, where he can do justice to his Jesus, and not humbug Spiritualists and Liberals any longer.

How is it that Bundy knows so well what kind of a man it takes to make a libertine? Does he speak from experience? or is he just good at guessing?

With the assurance of my support and sympathy, I am
Yours truly, CARRIE E. SMITH.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Dec. 7, 1879.

MR. EDITOR: I read the defense of Mr. Bennett in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 22d, against his base calumniators. It is a masterpiece of dignity and manliness, and is what I call a Christian confession, and I do not think there is a man in the United States who would make such a confession against himself. Beg Mr. Bennett to continue his paper; otherwise it will be a triumph for his enemies, for this is what they would destroy—his paper. With great respect, I remain Yours truly, TERESA TAYLOR.

READING, PA., Dec. 7, 1879.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend: I hav no doubt but that you are receiving more letters than you can possibly read, but I cannot forbear saying a few more words to you in this your hour of greatest triumph; I say greatest triumph because I am fully persuaded that your last grand letter is the grandest of all the grand letters you hav ever written—no cant, no sniveling hypocrisy, no disposition to evade. I sat down and read it through without stopping. I consider it the manliest, bravest document I ever read. I feel myself honored that I can call a man my friend who could write such a letter. Hav no fear, my dear sir, that the Liberal public will desert you. I do fully believe you will even make friends from the efforts of your enemies to ruin you. As you know, I hav always loved your paper from its birth, and now it becomes a necessity to me, and I am sure thousands feel as I do in the matter. I know of none worthy the name of Liberal who would, for a few paltry mistakes, throw away the labor of so many years. I know not nor do I care what course others may take, but I am for THE TRUTH SEEKER, as it has always been, with D. M. Bennett at its head, bravely demanding the right, always telling the truth, and exposing frauds of all kinds. There are new issues coming up, but I do fully trust you will be equal to the task and fearless in the pursuit of truth. I am honored by signing myself Your friend, L. E. HUGGINS.

BLACK HAWK, COL., Dec. 1, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend: Hav just read your fourth letter from Albany, and as you want all your friends to reply, and regarding myself one of the many, I cheerfully do so. The main points in your splendid letter are, that your health has improved, that half of your time as a prisoner has passed away, and that you had been allowed plenty of paper and plenty of time to say a little in your own defense.

As to the slanders heaped on you, I did not expect anything else, and am prepared to see and hear a great deal more before you will be able to face the powers of darkness. Whatever may come, don't be alarmed about it; your friends are with you. You hav committed no crime, and not been any weaker than others claiming perfection. I, for one, don't claim to be without sin, and hav no stones to throw. Will be pleased to see you released soon and take command again of THE TRUTH SEEKER. As ever, yours truly,

P. C. JOHNSON.

DAVISVILLE, CAL., Dec. 19, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, ESQ., My Dear Friend: Inclosed find post-office money order for $19, for which continue TRUTH SEEKER one year, and send "From Behind the Bars" and "Sixteen Saviors or None." November 14th I sent you post-office order for $25. Don't know that you received it.

I never liked you so well as I hav since reading your confession.

I hold you in my heart as one of the few truly good men. Long may you liv to teach Christians honesty!

Truly yours, G. G. BRIGGS.

MIAMISBURG, O., Nov. 26, 1879.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: So they are not satisfied, yet you need not think Christians alone are your enemies; your very worst foes in the world are Liberals, and why? Because they are jealous of your subscription list. They hate you because you can afford to giv more reading matter for the money than they can, or do at least. It is not because you are a Freethinker, it is not because you wrote a few silly letters to a lady, that they despise you; it is because you know how to run a newspaper better than they, and they are as jealous of you as the devil is of Christ.

But cheer up, old man, and don't let them break your noble old heart while you are in the penitentiary. I am satisfied you can hold them level when you once get out. Who knows what Abbot has done? Who knows what Bundy will do? It makes me mad to hear men condemn one another about women, for I consider one as weak as the other in that respect. It makes no difference to me what you do privately. I know you publish a good paper, and I am going to take it as long as it is published.

Respectfully, GEORGE WEIDEL.

SYRACUSE, N. Y., Dec. 19, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: By all means, if we can find a perfect man or woman, one entirely above all human weakness and folly, let that person be elected vice-president of the National Liberal League and let D. M. Bennett step down and out. Otherwise, I, for one, vote not to accept his resignation. We may possibly get a worse man to fill his place.

I am not a Christian, but I am glad to follow Christian maxims and examples when my reason and judgment approve of them, and I remember that it was said of him whom all Christians worship, "He eateth and drinketh with publicans and sinners."

I inclose three dollars as my contribution to the Parton Fund. Please acknowledge in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Yours for all truth, AURELIA D. F. RAYMOND.

OTTAWA, KAN., Dec. 9, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav twice read your letter of Nov. 16th. Its openness, candor, honesty, are more than I could expect even from an Atheist. Since I hav been a subscriber to THE TRUTH SEEKER I hav always had a great respect for you. I hav more now than ever before. How few there are who dare always tell the truth even "if the heavens should fall" and God drop out.

I sometimes wish there was a God with the same appetite as of old, when he liked burned meat, so well, for now he could get a toothsome morsel of skunk in Boston and Chicago. Hav patience, Bro. Bennett, till your time of imprisonment is out. Though your enemies hav put you in prison and reviled you in such a cowardly manner, still you are not the worst treated man the world has ever seen. Remember they crucified Christ, and many of us think you head and shoulders above him. I am glad to see Dr. Monroe take the noble stand he does. The Doctor is a brick, just a little below the angels.

I hope your health will not be impaired by prison life, and may you liv long as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER.

W. W. FRASER.

URBANA, O., Dec. 25, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send money order for $6.50. I am going to work now for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and would say to D. M. Bennett, Stick to the helm; don't giv up the ship, for you are the Christ of the age, and no man that I know of can fill your place in thought and logic, and I, too, don't think that little episode with a lady in a man's life should disqualify him for doing good. We want you and all the great minds of the age to lead the children out of the wilderness.

I hav been taking the Bundy Journal for nine years, and hav worked for it, and claim to know something of what is called a good spirit, and can't see that in him, for he has turned his masked batteries on his friends from whom he gets his pap. Now that is mean and treacherous and can't be tolerated by the Liberal spirit. He has lost a good many subscribers here. Possibly the Christians will come to his aid and help him out.

I remain your friend and well wisher, W. H. BAXTER.

THE CONTRAST.—MONROE ON THE ONE HAND, BUNDY AND ABBOT ON THE OTHER.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Many if not most readers of the Seymour Times thought the strictures of its editor too severe on the course of Mr. Bennett leading to his imprisonment. None, however, could fail to see the characteristic frankness and sincerity of Dr. Monroe's criticisms. His letter of Nov. 2d, in last TRUTH SEEKER, most happily exemplifies his refined and noble spirit. Let the finer portions of the Bible be searched in vain for specimens of tender sentiment or literary style comparable with this. Long may his noble letter adorn the language and exalt the emotions and principles we love. As Cowper tenderly wrote that he could not enter upon the list of his friends the man who was so wanting in sensibility as needlessly to put his foot upon a worm, so does Dr. Monroe, in his lovely picture of tender sympathy, exhibit, by contrast, the hideous monstrosities of cold-hearted stoicism and venomous envy. Indeed, this fine letter is one of the most admirable chapters in the grand science of sociology. Could prayer avail all the good and wise men in their closets that Bundy and Abbot might be saved from impending, not to say, existing fire, by its earnest, yea, prayerful perusal. As doubtless they hav read it, still we ask them to read it again, when in their happiest mood. Such a letter may well sustain the exhortation, "Line upon line, precept upon precept."

From its consideration one has sadly to turn to the memory of what has been written by the editors in question. The handwriting against the Religio and Index stands upon the wall. Already hav these unhappy men been weighed in the balance of common sense and of honor, and found sadly, inexcusably wanting. Even in the pugilistic days, disgracing my, in other respects, grand state, few would condescend to strike after his antagonist was down. None but the meanest barbarians will murder dependent prisoners. Hence the infamy attaching to the first part of Numbers xxxi. Conceding for a moment that Mr. Bennett did wrong in writing the letters Bundy and Abbot hav published, is it not self-evident to all of moral sense or manly honor that it was mean and cowardly for them to do it, and still worse to manifest their pleasure—their low gratification—therein? If to any this be not self-evident let them consider the lucid, well-tempered letter of Mrs. Denton, in the last TRUTH SEEKER (Nov. 15), and no further doubts can exist. The heart and the head that can—after reading the letters, and indeed many more like them, so justly commended—side with the editorials of the Religio and Index, can never excite the envy of which Mr. Bennett is the exemplary object.

Well may we all, under these wrongs, be consoled to know that truth is mighty and will prevail. For a time it may, as Bryant has finely said, be crushed to earth, but no less sure it will rise again, to bless and comfort its friends. So of all noble, generous deeds, they cannot be lost; like Shakspere's mercy, they are twice blessed. The Doctor's letters, and all of like spirit, will bless him that giveth and him that receiveth, even more than the precious ointment upon the head of Aaron, trickling to his skirts. Besides their lovely spirit, they lead the mind to think into the true and more happy relations of the sexes. Rising above the old fossilized custom, mildewed with superstition, thinkers will inquire, What ought to be, and what, is natural? They must recognize the rights of each and all, many of which are self-evident and inalienable. None can be so blind as not to see the wrongs and the wretchedness of the sexes as they are and hav been for ages past, nor can they ignore the unhappy influences of the Bible in this all-important matter. Much has it had to do in originating these wrong relations, and therefore can never correct them. The marital law of wifely obedience it enjoins, and indeed her inferiority and subjection to her husband, at the same time (O. T.) allowing him unbridled liberties as a bigamist—the hypocrisy of such as profess to receive this as God's word, and at the same time strain over the slightest departure from strict fidelity to monogamy, is no less manifest. Hence we trust this whole discussion will advance a love of pure, practical truth, and the pure unselfish enjoyments of our kind, that will not turn back, but rather move forward, the progress of Liberals for the lasting good of all.

W. PERKINS.

BRUNSWICK, Dec. 13th, 1879.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Please receive my deepest sympathy for our dear friend, D. M. Bennett, abused as he is, not only by religious bigots, but worse than all by Bundy and Abbot. So far as the letters and woman are concerned, I can see no wrong; according to her own showing, the only thing that is most visible to me is, she was mad because Bennett would hav nothing more to do with her after he found who and what she was; that to me covers the whole ground. I think the matter will hav every other effect but to alienate Mr. Bennett's friends from him or THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Inclosed please find P. O. order for $5; $3 for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880, the rest for whichever way best or where it will do most good. WM. TYLER.

EAST DUBUQUE, ILL., Dec. 25, 1879.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, My Dear Friend: This day, by custom, calls to our remembrance those friends whose memory we cherish with emotions of pleasure and admiration for their exalted work and excellence, their value to society, and as brilliant gems in the crown of humanity, and offer tokens of our highest consideration as friends—our wishes for their health and happiness. Prominently among those dear and valued friends stands the person addressed, to whom I inclose a small gift of $5, as a Christmas present, that it may aid me in being remembered as one of your friends. With my kindest regards for your health and happiness, I am truly your friend, D. R. BURT.

Let Bennett stick to his paper. If man never made mistakes or committed blunders, then it might do for him to step down and out. "Let him that is without sin cast the first stone" at Bennett. Regards to him and his.

MARENGO, N. Y., Dec. 24, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed one dollar to apply on my subscription to your paper, and fifteen cents for A. B. Brown's "Essay on Money."

What is the matter with Mr. C. H. Dunning, Chairman of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League of Michigan? From the tone of his letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 13th one might suppose that Bro. Bennett had been found guilty of some crime like robbery or murder. Mr. Dunning says, "We cannot afford to carry such things." Whom does he call "we?" I think he should be a little more courageous, or tender his resignation. The fact is, Bro. Bennett has injured no one? What harm could the letters possibly do Mr. Dunning, or any one else? But you know it is sometimes hard for people, even in Michigan, to understand what concerns them and what does not. It makes me grind my teeth when I think of Mr. Dunning's proposition that Bro. Bennett should resign. We all think more of Bennett every day; and when I say we I mean, C. C. Chase, Nellie Chase, Nora Chase, Jennie Chase, Earnest Chase, Sarah Chase.

Yours truly, C. C. CHASE.

PITTSFORD, N. Y., Dec. 26, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I take leisure of this holiday time to send my subscription—$3 00—to THE TRUTH SEEKER, which, during the hurry of business in this work-day world of ours, I hav so long neglected.

I hav taken your paper from its commencement, and hav thought it well worth its cost. It is not to be expected that in a paper containing so much matter on such a variety of subjects we approve of everything said or done; but taking all things into consideration, I hav generally been well pleased with it, and am quite willing that Bro. Bennett and Eugene Macdonald should continue to edit it, for the paper was never better than at present, and am glad that Bennett has such an able assistant to take charge of it in his absence, who has added much to the value of the paper by the insertion of these valuable articles bearing on the Liberal movement of the age from the leading reviews. I might mention the following as very able: "Materialism and its Lessons," by Maudsley, Goldwin Smith's "Interregnum," and the able reply by dear old Edizur Wright, who has one of the soundest of heads, always to the point; "The Religion of To-Day," and Froude's "Romanism and the Irish Race;" also "The Bible in the Schools," by Frothingham.

I hope you will continue to giv us more of them, or where they are too lengthy, liberal extracts or the cream of them. The lively, scathing fire of T. C. Leland, the manly James Parton, and the ever present Mrs. Slenker, always interesting, add to the value of the paper.

My sympathies for Bro. Bennett were never more than at present, now that he is under a cloud. I hav never doubted his earnestness, honesty, or sincerity, and we hav a proof of this in his owning up to his weakness and folly (and I believe Beecher would stand higher to-day if he had been honest enough to own up to his guilty weaknesses).

I must own that I hav sometimes thought Bennett was too combative and personal in his attacks on opponents, and some of his criticisms and onslaughts on the popular superstitions were a little too coarse and severe, and the exposures of the corruptions and crimes of its teachers were too hard and rough, but then we do not expect such a paper to be edited by a kid-glove editor, and as far as myself was concerned, I did not mind it, but I prefer to hav some regard for the feelings of the dupes of the popular superstition. I think to draw it a little milder, as they say, is more effective. I hope you will publish "Pocket Theology," by Voltaire, in a small volume.

The attacks of Bundy and Abbot are most cowardly. The high-toned Index smells very strong of codfish aristocracy.

Now, with my best wishes for the success of the paper and a happy New Year to its editor and brother and sister Bennett in affliction, I remain yours, SAMUEL CRUMP.

PRAIRIE CITY, OR., Nov. 26, 1879.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: Once more, and for the third time since your incarceration in the Albany Penitentiary, I will attempt to write a few lines to you, in hopes of being able to cheer the monotony of your prison life. I had hoped, and still trust, that the President will yet consider it his duty to perform a simple act of justice toward an unoffending citizen by restoring you to liberty. I am at a loss to know how the President can reconcile his conscience and allow such an unjust, unmerciful, and disgraceful sentence to be executed. How can such a course be justified when examined in the light of the teachings of the "man of sorrows?" he who "spoke as man never spake," to wit, "Blessed are the merciful, for they shall obtain mercy;" "Forgive us our trespasses as we forgive those who trespass against us;" "Father, forgive them, they know not what they do," etc., etc.

I hav frequently tried to express the indignation and sorrow I felt at this act of injustice towards you, inflicted under the guise of law, by a bigoted, intolerant, and misguided set of fanatics, but no language at my command is adequate to do the subject justice. But the meanest, unkindest thrust of all comes from the genius whom "God in his mysterious providence" allows to preside over the columns of the R.-P. Journal, and which the "highly cultured" editor of the Index, parrot-like, reproduces with evident relish. Last week I received a "sample copy" of the Index, (Oct. 30) the first number I ever saw, and I trust it may be the last. Until I saw that, I was an unbeliever in "total depravity." I must confess my ignorance of and ability to believe that a man could be found in the civilized world who was so totally depraved as to take advantage of an old man's imprisonment to befoul his character as these two paragons of perfection hav done. I am from henceforth willing to acknowledge that in regard to "total depravity," the half has not been told. Of all the mean, contemptible acts a man can be guilty of, to "kick a man when he's down" is the meanest. To send a copy of that contemptible sheet to your subscribers (and I judge he has to all) is like adding "insult to injury."

"What legions of friends always bless us
When golden success lights our way!
How they smile as they softly address us,
So cordial, good humored, and gay!
But ah! when the sun of prosperity
Hath set, how quickly they frown,
And cry out in tones of severity,
"Kick the man; don't you see he is down?"

"Oh! giv me the heart that forever
Is free from this world's selfish lust,
And the soul, whose high noble endeavor
Is to raise fallen man from the dust;
And when in adversity's ocean
A victim is likely to drown,
All hail to the friend whose devotion
Will lift a man up when he's down."

My dear friend, be of good cheer, should your health be spared your time will soon expire, when I hope a brighter day will dawn for you. You need hav no fears that the affections of your freinds will be alienated from you by abuse from such an unworthy source. There is not a day, scarcely an hour, that myself and wife do not think of your misfortune; even our two little daughters (one eleven and the other seven), make anxious inquiries very frequently about you. Hoping your affliction may result in lasting benefit to mankind, and with many good wishes that your future may be prosperous and happy, I remain as ever your sincere friend, A. L. THOMPSON.

FROM BEHIND THE BARS is the name of a book made up of letters from the place of his present confinement by D. M. Bennett, which were addressed to the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER through the columns of that paper. They are characterized by all the writer's well known vigor of expression, and are filled with thoughts, reflections, and illustrations such as might be expected to come from a man in like circumstances, and rendered indignant by similar treatment. The book is published by D. M. Bennett at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, New York.—Banner of Light.

Persecution.

BY E. N. KINGSLEY.

Hail, dear brother Bennett, in triumph ascending
From orthodox dungeons to liberty's throne!
The freedom of man while so nobly defending,
The Pharisees cheated thee out of thine own.

Could Christians by arguments truly confound thee,
They'd not persecute thee, and doom thee to dwell
Where fire and brimstone and devils surround thee,
When God who is love will consign thee to hell.

We value thy principles more than all treasures,
Thy love of humanity more than of old.
Thy prison a palace, thy thoughts holy pleasures,
Thy spirit enjoyments more precious than gold.

Alas! that it is the great Christian endeavor
To blast and to ruin the Infidel's fame;
But justice and truth crushed to earth will forever
Arise from the dust, equal rights to proclaim.

The President's word would now save thee from sorrow,
If he loved but his neighbor as well as himself.
Just, merciful actions he leaves till to-morrow.
To-day his religion is laid on the shelf.

Will our Liberal, glorious, grand Constitution
Be truly enforced the oppressed to defend?
'Tis coming! 'tis coming!—a great evolution!
Soon all persecutions from bigots will end.

The Infidel prisoner's fame will be sounded
And wafted triumphant to every shore;
By legions of truth—loving friends—be surrounded,
And treacherous enemies harm thee no more.

Dear victim, be cheerful. The good seed you're sowing
From dark superstition vast millions will save;
Your pages, with truth and philosophy glowing,
Will cheer and illumine man's path to the grave.

The grave cannot shield thee from vile persecution;
They'll follow thee there as they did Thomas Paine.
Take courage, dear brother. Keep good resolutions,
For truth at the last will triumphantly reign.

Be patient, be comforted, dear old truth-seeker;
The history you're making forever will last.
The enemy's forces are still growing weaker;
Your cruel imprisonment soon will be past.

The Odd Old Man.

He lived just a mile from the village,
Out there by the forks of the road;
His farm, by the help of good tillage,
Increased what he planted and sowed.
His dwelling was low and old-fashioned,
The roof was all covered with moss;
But still, by his fixing and patching,
It kept out the rain and the frost.
He lived very peaceful and quiet;
We knew him as Jeremy Todd;
So plain was his dress and his diet,
The neighbors all said he was odd.

The fashions he never would follow,
Nor try to put on any style,
But, owing a dime or a dollar,
He paid it when due with a smile.
His words were few and well chosen,
'Twas clear that he meant what he said;
His temper not heated nor frozen,
And calm was the life that he led.
He did not belong to the meeting,
And said very little of God;
But the orphan was glad at his greeting,
And every one said he was odd.

If ever he offered to sell you
A cow, or an ox, or a horse,
He made it his business to tell you
Each one of the animal's faults.
He hired Bill Peters, the cripple,
To husk out his corn by the day,
And heaped up the grain on the bushel
To measure the wheat for his pay.
His name was not on the subscription
To save the poor heathen abroad;
His neighbors he helped in affliction—
The people all thought he was odd.

He never made any "profession,"
Nor said that he had a "new heart,"
But something he had in possession
Of which many more need a part;
A something that made him so gentle,
So honest, so manly, and true;
And if not church religion, we venture
That Jesus would say, "It will do."
He might in the church hav done better,
And rendered more service to God;
He had more of the "spirit" than "letter"
And that was what made him so odd.

The preacher might say he was godless,
Because he subscribed to no creed;
But still it was part of his oddness
The wretched and hungry to feed.
If Jeremy failed of salvation,
Because he stayed out of the church,
We cannot see how in creation
Professors will shun the lee lurch
Who wear the full garb of the pious,
But love not their neighbors—nor God!
We choose, when our Maker shall try us,
To be like old farmer Todd.

IN cases where the incumbent of an English living is manifestly incapacitated to perform the duty, the bishop insists on his keeping a curate. A case in point is that of the Rev. Wm. Fleetwood, aged near 90, to whom the presence of the bishop-imposed curate is evidently highly distasteful. On November 2, after Mr. Bluck, the curate, had performed the afternoon service, Mr. Fleetwood and his son came to the church, and the former called him a blackguard, and held up his stick threateningly. The curate at once left the church, when Mr. Fleetwood's son followed and knocked him insensible. Before the magistrates, Mr. Fleetwood, Jr., asked the chairman whether, if his footman insulted him, he would not knock him down. The magistrates committed the Fleetwoods for trial, the younger being further bound over to keep the peace.

"From Behind the Bars."

Liberty never quite keeps pace with progress. Every age has its martyrs. We hav one to-day. A volume of 565 page comes to us from the pen of one who is serving a term in the Albany Penitentiary. It is by D. M. Bennett, one of Comstock's victims. His real offense was editing THE TRUTH SEEKER; the constructive charge, obscenity. The work, bearing the above title, contains an epitome of past martyrdoms, a scathing review of the outrages inflicted by the Vice Society and its agent, an interesting account of prison life, etc. The work is issued from the publishing house of D. M. Bennett, No. 141 8th street. Price, $1.50.—Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.

"From Behind the Bars." A series of letters written in prison by D. M. Bennett, editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, imprisoned ostensibly for depositing prohibited matter in the mail, but really for entertaining and speaking his honest convictions. Wide reading, overflowing fertility of thought, irrepressible courage, and intense sincerity of purpose appear through all these 560 pages. The letter to Colgate, address to Judge Benedict, to the press, to President Hayes; the voluminous presentation of historic cases of martyrs to liberty; the crushing indictment of the Bible as compared with "Cupid's Yokes;" the stirring appeals from Albany Penitentiary—learning, wit, wrath, sarcasm, pathos, irresistible enthusiasm, and genuine character here illustrate a memorable phase of the great struggle for mental liberty we are engaged in, and of which Mr. Bennett, in labor, suffering, and achievement, is to be an everlasting exponent. No Freethinker's library will be complete without this book, and its general circulation will greatly serve genuine Liberalism. To possess and diffuse a work of real value, and help keep THE TRUTH SEEKER flag afloat, we hope all our readers will buy it.—The Word.

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good DOCTOR is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

Analysis and full report of case made for $5, independent of any treatment. Packages transmitted free of all expense to the Institution, and stamps for return answers must be inclosed in all cases, or no reply will be made.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Freethinkers' Badge Pin.

The cut shows the design and size of the badge, but not its beauty. The whole badge is intended to signify symbolically that the "world moves," and that "universal mental liberty" is being spread over the world by the "leaves of learning." Badges made of heavy gold plate; price of single badge, package registered and postage paid, $1.25. Club of one dozen or more, ordered to one address, package registered and postage paid, $1.10 each. Remit by P. O. order or registered letter. For fractional parts of a dollar, postage stamps of the denomination of one, three, and ten cents taken. Orders filled in the order of their application. Badges to be had only from the patentee. LUCY L. CHURCHILL,
West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus 'let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

PAGAN self-assertion is one of the elements of human work as well as Christian self-denial.—John Sterling.

THE best rule, in all parts of the world, as in London itself, is to be independent of other men's minds.—Macaulay.

JUSTICE and prudence are virtues which can exist only in a moderate degree, and which change their nature and their name if pushed to excess.—Macaulay.

WELL, suppose life be a desert! There are halting places, and shades, and refreshing waters; let us profit by them to-day We know that we must march on when to-morrow comes and tramp on our destiny onward.—Thackeray.

IF Christianity teaches us to observe the Golden Rule for Christ's sake, Darwinism tells us to obey it for humanity's sake. If the one says, Do it in order to reach heaven hereafter, the other says, Do it in order to make heaven here.—W. H. Spencer.

HONOR to those who hav failed;
And to those whose war-vessels sank in the sea;
And to those who sank themselves in the sea;
And to the numberless unknown heroes equal to the greatest heroes known.
—Walt Whitman.

THOSE unfortunate men who in early life assume the vows and offices of dogmatic religion, whose tenets their minds afterward outgrow, may be likened to young animals captured and caged. At first, kindly nurtured, theirs is a pleasant state; but soon they find the cage a cage, and the ability to get food outside of it is gone.—Anon

THOSE who hav not thoroughly examined to the bottom of their own tenets must confess they are unfit to prescribe to others; and are unreasonable in imposing that as truth on other men's belief which they themselves hav not searched into, nor weighed the arguments of probability on which they should receive or reject it.—Locke.

FROM Lord Gray's I went to visit ——, whom I found unchanged, except that they are become a little more Methodistical. I endeavored in vain to giv them more cheerful ideas of religion; to teach them that God is not a jealous, childish, merciless tyrant; that he is best served by a regular tenor of good actions—not by bad singing, ill-composed prayers, and eternal apprehensions. But the luxury of false religion is to be unhappy.—Sydney Smith.

THE sentence, "Dust thou art, and to dust thou shalt return," may seem a hard one; but as it cannot be reversed or modified, it must be accepted with submission; and in default of another life, the honest man will make the most of the life he has; not necessarily saying with the sensualist, "Let us eat and drink, for to-morrow we die," but with the hero reminding himself that he must "work while it is day, for the night cometh in which no man can work."—O. B. Frothingham.

NEVER giv way to melancholy; nothing encroaches more; I fight against it vigorously. One great remedy is to take short views of life. Are you happy now? Are you likely to remain so till this evening? or next week? or next month? or next year? Then why destroy present happiness by distant misery which may never come at all, or you may never liv to see it? for every substantial grief has twenty shadows, and most of them shadows of your own making.—Sydney Smith.

NEVER teach false morality. How exquisitely absurd it is to tell girls that beauty is of no value, dress of no use! Beauty is of value; her whole prospects and happiness in life may often depend on a new gown or a becoming bonnet, and if she has five grains of common sense she will find it out. The great thing is to teach her their just value, and that there must be something better under the bonnet than a pretty face for real happiness. But never sacrifice truth.—Sydney Smith.

THE idea that women hav a mission and peculiar rights is wrong; but equally wrong, perhaps more foolishly wrong, is the idea that woman is only the shadow and attendant image of her lord, owing him a thoughtless and servile obedience, and supported altogether in her weakness by the pre-eminence of his fortitude. This is the most foolish of all errors respecting her who was to be the helpmate of man. As if he could be helped effectively by a shadow or worthily by a slave!—Ruskin.

'TIS well! from this day forward we shall know
That in ourselves our safety must be sought;
That by our own right hands it must be wrought,
That we must stand unpropped or be laid low.
O dastard, whom such foretaste doth not cheer!
We shall exult, if they who rule the land
Be men who hold its many blessings dear,
Wise, upright, valiant; not a servile band,
Who are to judge the danger which they fear,
And honor which they do not understand,
—Wordsworth.

WHAT most directly and above everything else makes us happy is cheerfulness of mind, for this excellent gift is its own reward. He who is naturally joyous has every reason to be so, for the simple reason that he is as he is. Nothing can compensate like cheerfulness for the lack of other possessions, while in itself it makes up for all others. A man may be young, well favored, rich, honored, happy, but if we would ascertain whether or no he be happy, we must put the question, Is he cheerful? If he is cheerful, then it matters not whether he be young or old, straight or crooked, rich or poor; he is happy.—Schopenhauer.

Odds and Ends

NO CLERGYMAN ever hooked another clergyman's sermon. Though, to be sure, he may hav won them at a church raffle.

THIS is a hard, hard world, is the verdict of every one as he slowly rises from the slippery spot on which he so suddenly sat down.

"NOTHING," says Colonel Forney, "so quickly dries up a woman's tears as a kiss." Ladies who are about to weep will please apply at this office. Consultation free.

"YES, thank you, dear Jamie, 'tis excellen' sherry."
She said: "'tis refreshing and nourishing very;
I never take water, you know, with my dinners
Because, since the flood, it has tasted of sinners."

AN old Scotch lady was told that her minister used notes, but would not believe it. Said one, "Gang into the gallery and see." She did so, and saw the written sermon. After the luckless preacher had concluded his reading on the last page, he said, "But I will not enlarge." The old woman called out from her lofty position, "Ye canna, ye canna, for your paper's gie oot."

MR. LONGFELLOW is at last getting down to every-day subjects, as the latest jewel from his pen shows:

Bessie is swinging in the sunlight,
Singing merrily the while,
And the gleam of her striped stockings
Can be seen about a mile."
—Chicago Tribune.

A YOUNG man, who had just returned from a long journey, clasping his adored one in a loving embrace in a dimly-lighted parlor, was seized with a great terror that, for an instant, paralyzed all his energies. "Oh, my darling," said he, wildly, "why didn't you write me of this? What is it—spinal disease? or hav you dislocated some of your ribs, that you are obliged to wear this broad leather bandage?" "Oh, love," she gently murmured, "this is only my new belt. I would hav got a broader one, but it would not go under my arms."

CONSOLATION.

You may talk of the innocent Eve,
Of the apple, perhaps a persimmon,
Whate'er you would hav me believe,
I've got my opinion of woman.

Just glance over history now,
From creation on down to this minute;
There ne'er was a scandal or row
But woman was some way mixed in it.

Yet here is occasion for mirth,
For a compact the maker has given,
The women are angels on earth,
But men are the angels in heaven!

ONE KIND OF A MIRACLE.

The Deutsche Zeitung prints the following in the report of a village school inspection. The examiner is trying to explain to the fat-headed listeners the character of a miracle. He asks a scholar:

"What is a miracle?"

"I don't know, sir."

"If—all at once—the sun appeared in the heavens at night what would you say it was?"

"The moon."

"But, if you were told it was the sun, what would you say?"

"I'd say it was a lie."

"Now, I never lie. Suppose I told you it was the sun?"

The scholar, after a moment's deep reflection, bobbed his head.

"Please, sir, I'd say you were drunk."

A HARD WINTER.

During the drizzle yesterday afternoon there was a choice crowd of old citizens under the porticoes of the City Hall; and one such group was joined by a threadbare stranger, who scratched his itching back against the carving of one of the pillars, and asked:

"Gentlemen, is this going to be a hard winter?"

"It is," replied every man together.

"Work will be scarce and provisions high, eh?"

"Yes," they replied.

"Weather will be so all-fired cold that water will burst all the water-pipes, I suppose?"

"Yes, it will,"

"Won't be any show for a poor man like me?"

"Not a bit."

"I'd probably freeze to death while looking for a job."

"You would—you would."

"Well, that's what I thought, and I want to arrange to go to the work-house for three months. I don't want to go as a 'vag,' because that's low down. I'd rather be charged with assault and battery. Will one of you gentlemen please let me cuff your hat and then ask the officer to arrest me?"

After some hesitation one citizen with more philanthropy than the others stepped out. His plug hat was jammed clear down to his top vest-button at a blow, he was knocked right and left by cuffs on the head, and, as a climax, was whirled around and given several kicks which weighed forty pounds apiece."

"There," said the stranger, as he shut off steam and slowed up. "That fixes both of us; you'll remember me, and I'll remember you, and you may call an officer."

Some of the group called one out of the corridor, but the officer said he could not make such an arrest unless he saw the fight or had a warrant.

"Very well," replied the stranger, as he moved off, "I am willing to submit to your maturer judgment and experience, and I can't wait here all day. Good-bye, prophets. I think my best way will be to get into Canada and leave your hard old winter to run herself."

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15 00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams. Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the REV. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

THE TRUTHSEEKER

DEVOTED TO SCIENCE, MORALS, FREETHOUGHT AND HUMAN HAPPINESS

Vol. 7. No. 2. {PUBLISHED WEEKLY BY D. M. BENNETT.} New York, Saturday, January 10, 1880. {SCIENCE HALL, 141 8th St., NEAR BROADWAY.} $3 per Year.

Notes and Clippings.

A DEATH-BED repentance is a good thing as a last resort, but for solid comfort it is a little too uncertain.

IN Somerville, Mass., the Broadway Congregational church is quarreling over the alleged heterodoxy of its pastor.

A RELIGIOUS newspaper reports that a clergyman near Pittsburgh has been "afflicted in the death of his father-in-law."

THE Moniteur Universel announces that Alexander Dumas is at work upon a new romance of real life, of a highly anti-clerical type. The principal character is a Jesuit, who plays a disingenuous role in a family circle into which he is introduced.

THE zeal of the St. Louis people has greatly abated in regard to the evangelical services of Moody and Sankey. The throngs are great, but the inquirers are comparatively few. Moody does not know what to make of it, the condition of things is so entirely different from his experiences within the last few years.

SOME statistician has ascertained that Brooklyn has one church for every 1,721 inhabitants; Washington, one for 932; Cleveland, one for every, 1,044; New Orleans, one for every 1,345; Cincinnati, one for every 1,350; Baltimore, one for every 1,412; Boston, one for every 1,166; St. Louis, one for every 1,852; New York, one for every 2,613.

PROF. O. A. PHELPS is engaged to debate the proposition, "The Bible is entirely of human origin; is absurd and unscientific; and teaches a very defective code of morals." The first debate takes place at Cottonwood, Kan., Jan 12th with Rev. Taylor; second at Neosho, Falls, Jan. 24th, opponent not yet named. These debates last for eight days each.

MR. BEECHER'S recent utterances on the Bible hav stirred up quite a respectable ecclesiastical hornet's nest. He is charged by the ministers with giving aid and comfort to the enemy, and they claim that there is no justification for his using words that are "working like the poison of asps." And yet Mr. Beecher still says he told the truth. We think he did.

IN Minneapolis, Minn., Christmas morning at four o'clock, while the thermometer registered 37° below zero, a Swede girl, Grettia Jernstrom by name, got up and went to the Swede mission to attend divine services. When she arrived it was found that her feet were frozen. She sat by the stove all through the service, when some generous Christian gave her street-car fare and sent her to her employer's home.

THE great scandal caused in ritualist circles in England over the presentation of a wafer from the church in Bordesley, in the court of Arches, has been finally settled. The archbishop of Canterbury writes to anxious inquirers that the wafer has been placed in his hands, and he has caused it to be "reverently consumed." He adds that it is plain to him that bread in an illegal form has been administered in the church in Bordesley. Terrible!

'Tis well to walk with a cheerful heart,
Wher'er our duties call,
With a friendly glance and an open hand,
And a gentle word for all.

Since life is a thorny and difficult path,
Where toil is the portion of man,
We all should endeavor while passing along
To make it as smooth as we can.

—Mary J. Penckner.

SINCE the clergymen's agitation against the "mixed marriage" system of the Oneida Community, twenty weddings hav taken place there. These, with twenty-five couples who had become members after wedlock, make forty-five married couples. The population is 299, 57 of whom are children under ten, and 26 young people under twenty. One member is over ninety years of age; five over eighty; 26 over seventy; 57 over sixty; 97 over fifty; 143 over forty; 191 over thirty; and 216 over twenty.

A STATUE of Eve is talked of in San Francisco according to the News Letter, which gives the following report of a woman's meeting on the subject: "They praised up Eve and run down Adam awfully. Adam was mean. He told tales on Eve about that apple. Eve didn't tell on Adam; she was true as steel. When the dreadful day came, and the deputy sheriff ejected them from their homestead, Eve didn't stand there blubbering, but set to work at once and made Adam an ulster of fig leaves and herself a new petticoat. She deserves and must hav a statue."

RELIGION is now treated by its fashionable expositors from the pulpit as a thing more or less apart from the daily life of humanity. It is studied from the artistic point of view, from the scientific, from the mystical. But it is not presented to fashionable congregations as embodying a code of ethical precepts which it is their business to translate into the practice of daily life. The common sense and the right feeling of mankind hav happily often been superior to the doctrines of their spiritual teachers, and the time has gone by when the conduct or the aspirations of humanity were controlled by the dogmatic homiletics of the pulpit.—London World.

IN a Dubuque church, before the opening of the Sunday morning service, a man in a front pew pulled a paper from his pocket and began to read. He became so wholly absorbed that he did not observe the preacher when he arose to read the biblical lesson, nor did he hear the loud and eloquent prayer that was afterward offered. From page to page of the paper the reader glanced, rustling the crisp sheet in his hands until every eye in the church was attracted to him. The preacher was embarrassed and the congregation smiled and scowled, according as they thought the matter funny or sad. Finally the choir struck up a hymn, "Giv Ear, Ye Sinners, to the Call," and the absorbed reader dropped his paper and gave heed.

Kill not—for Pity's sake—and lest ye slay
The meanest thing upon its upward way.

Giv freely and receive, but take from none
By greed, or force, or fraud, what is its own.

Bear not false witness, slander not, nor lie;
Truth is the speech of inward purity.

Shun drugs and drinks which work the wit abuse;
Clear minds, clean bodies, need no Soma juice.

Touch not thy neighbor's wife; neither commit
Sins of the flesh, unlawful or unfit.

These laws would seem to us at least half as good as the Hebrew Decalogue. The wicked would say twice as good.—Argonaut.

A THEOLOGICAL scene of great excitement occurred in Jeffersonville, Ind., recently. The Rev. Mr. Brown had been holding a protracted meeting, and announced that on the evening in question he would preach a sermon to skeptics and Infidels. He also offered a reward of five dollars to any Infidel who would present a contradictory passage of scripture which he could not explain. Dr. Reuben Dailey accepted the challenge. There was a crowded house, but when Dailey rose to refute Brown, the latter ordered the choir to strike up, and when the singing stopped he pronounced the benediction; then the meeting dissolved in admirable disorder. The men gesticulated, the women screamed. Dr. Dailey was arrested for disturbing a religious meeting, and altogether the denouement was anything but favorable to the reverend's fairness. He proved himself a bigot of the bluest kind.

THE REV. DR. SHERWOOD, of Brooklyn, has not a very high opinion of religious editors. "Some of them," he says, "had not the decency to wait until the trial (of Talmage) was ended, but irrespective of evidence and all rules of judicial fairness, acquitted the accused and condemned the prosecution." The Doctor thinks the glory has departed from the religious press and rests upon the secular, and hence he has little or no faith in the conductors of the church newspapers who underrate the conscience and intelligence and good sense and judicial fairness and regard for the good name of religion on the part of the great body of believers when they make such a demand on a question so vital and so sweeping in its relations. The Doctor would despair of the church of the future, he says, if he believed its policy and duty and character were to be mainly shaped and controlled by the organs of religious thought. He shows that they hav been behind instead of being foremost on such moral questions as temperance, slavery, and other reforms of the age.

AT a dance in the Seventh Ward the other night the bishop expressed himself highly displeased with the round dances. He said that it was condemned by the priesthood, and if the saints could not get along without round dances they had better go home. The young people remonstrated with him, but all to no purpose. "If you will waltz, let me show you how to do it," said he, and he got on the floor with a 183-pound blonde. The band struck up the "Blue Danube," and down the hall glided the bishop and the blonde. The tips of her fingers touched his, a cruel cold space between them. This was the church method—the arms-length waltz. Soon there was a slight contraction of the arms and the space between them gradually decreased. Presently one arm encircled the fair form. The blonde was the first to giv way, and her cheek looked like a sunflower in a turnip field as it rested on the shoulder of the bishop. Round and round they went, and the fascinating, weird-like strains floated like heavenly music to his soul. Forgotten was the round-dance dogma of the church, and by the calm smile that stole across his face we knew that theology was defeated and one man at least utterly indifferent to a future punishment.—Salt Lake Tribune.

WE are informed by a correspondent resident of Reno, Pa., of an example of Christian intolerance and discrimination which savors more of religious persecution than anything we hav heard of since the editor of this paper was imprisoned for opinion's sake. It appears that to bolster up a Methodist church and minister, the latter being unable to exist on faith alone, a certain oil company of that place decided to make an assessment of from five to ten dollars per capita upon its employees for the benefit of the said church and minister. The rate of assessment was governed by the amount of piety possessed by the workmen—those having the most faith paying the least money and vice versa, thus literally fulfilling the injunction, "Whomsoever hath not from him shall be taken." Those who refused to pay this outrageous tax, even though they had never attended the church, for whose support they were being mulcted, were threatened by the company with dismissal. This brought most of them to the company's terms. There were, however, two men, Liberals, who had the courage to keep their money in their pockets and their souls in their own keeping. As a result, these two men are at work at three-fourths time, while the church and minister are flourishing at their expense. This is a kind of "vicarious atonement" which should not be encouraged.

THE Langhorne Beacon says: "Dr. Rossvally, the converted Jew, who is so well known in the vicinity of Langhorne, and who recently "done" up the churches in this place, is just now receiving a great deal of attention in the newspapers, the articles being copied from a paper published at Cincinnati. He is charged with being a "fraud." It is said that he came to this country from Germany on account of a larceny there; that he was an assistant surgeon in the rebel army and was court-martialed and drummed out of camp; afterwards came North and engaged in counterfeiting, and was confined in the New York State Prison at Auburn, where he received a pardon from the Governor on account of his alleged conversion through the efforts of Moody, the evangelist, and since that time he has been engaged in running camp-meetings, etc., on his own account and is said to be making money at it. At last accounts he was "lecturing" at Plainfield, New Jersey." This is the man who run a Methodist camp-meeting at Langhorne last August, and who took particular delight in telling his audience if they attended the Spiritualists' camp-meeting, which was being held at Neshaminy Falls, about two miles away, they would get further in hell in an hour than he could take them out in six years. He lectured in the churches of Doylestown, Pa., about three weeks ago. The most noted part of his discourse was that against rum, which he stole from Robert G. Ingersoll's address to a jury. He has succeeded pretty well in bleeding the good shepherds of the flock he oined at Auburn.

Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint.

BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.—CONCLUDED.

Observe, further, the contradictory character of these communications. One spirit will tell you one thing and another something diametrically opposite; and this in regard to matters of fact, and not simply concerning speculative points. For instance, it is still debated among Spiritualists and mediums whether there are brutes in the spirit world, because some spirits say yes, while others as positively say no. And yet we are on the very "boundaries of another world" and in daily conversation with its inhabitants. If two persons claim to have been to Europe, and one reports that there are no horses there, and the other that they are there just as they are here; and if we extend our inquiries, and ask hundreds and thousands the same question, and we find that they answer yes or no, as they are fond of or dislike the animal, what should we think if such a thing were possible? And yet thousands of pretended spirits, claiming to be in many cases relatives and friends, say that all the animals of earth continue to exist, as individuals, after death, with dispositions and proclivities such as they possessed on earth—that they see them every day just as they see the spirits of their own race. Other thousands, just as intelligent, and apparently with equal sincerity, say that there are no brutes in the spirit world. Some of our pretended invisible friends and teachers tells us that, animals losing their identity at death, their spirits are resolved into "elementary primates," and afford food for the spirits of human beings. Other spirits solemnly declare "through the mediums" that no food is used or needed in that invisible world. I once heard a distinguished trance-speaker say that the relation of the sexes is continued after death; that human beings are there begotten, and ushered into existence, and pass through the stages of infancy, childhood, adolescence, and manhood and womanhood, as they do here. Other communications—one from Socrates, and another from Lord Bacon among the many—assure me that the notion of births in the world of spirits is false, and must have come from some lying, mischievous spirits. Appealing to men and women of common sense, I ask, is it not evident that these utterances and messages about the land of spirits are simply the vagaries of the mediums' own brains?

The common explanation that—the instruments which the spirits employ being defective—the control is imperfect, and that these contradictions and inanities are due largely to that cause, was never satisfactory to me. If a medium has defective or diseased organs of speech, I can understand that a spirit might have difficulty in speaking through the medium, for it has to use these organs to speak; but since a spirit does not depend (so we are told) on the brain of a medium for its thought, its knowledge, its wisdom, why should the imperfection of the medium's brain, or the ignorance of the medium's mind, be urged in behalf of Cicero and Webster, when they have spoken fluently, without let or hindrance, for a full hour, and talked only transcendental fustian of the cheapest quality? Why should this be offered in excuse and apology for Thomas Paine and Theodore Parker when they have controlled a medium to write rapidly whole pages without giving one strong, vigorous sentence, without attempting to demonstrate any proposition, or to put together a series of sensible statements having a perceptible connection with one another?

Clairvoyance is often appealed to by Spiritualists in support of their theory. My investigations have never brought to my view one genuine case of clairvoyance. I do not deny the reality of the condition; but of the scores of clairvoyants I have tested, I have never yet found one person who has given me any evidence of his or her ability to see objects at a distance. I do not believe there is one in Boston who can stand on one end of this platform and tell me four words, written on a paper, that I may hold in my hand at the opposite end. But it is possible that there are rare instances of vision without the direct use of the eyes, and medical journals contain accounts of such cases in diseased persons. But, if true, does clairvoyance prove the existence of spirits? Some electricians have suggested the possibility of communications between two batteries, placed at elevated positions, without the use of wires? It may yet be realized. And possibly two living galvanic batteries, human brains, may, in certain states and under exceptional and peculiar conditions, have communications when at a distance. I do not affirm this; I say its possibility, supposing clairvoyance real, should make us cautious in drawing the conclusion that spirits are concerned in the phenomenon.

It is said persons see spirits. Some see them in daylight, and with eyes wide open. I have talked with many such persons. I believe they are generally honest, and my conviction is quite as strong that they are in a state of chronic mental aberration. Quite a large class of persons see spirits in the dark, generally in circles; or when they are in an abnormal state of mind; whether self-induced, as in the case of trance speakers, or mesmerized, as we have seen persons under the influence of Grimes and other experienced manipulators. Are the visions of persons generally diseased in body and mind, in these abnormal states, to be taken for sober realities? If so, we may as well prepare to believe anything and everything that is fanciful, strange, and wild.

The strangest and most talked-of manifestations just now are the so-called materializations, accounts of which from different places come to us thick and fast. Concerning those which I have seen, it may be justly said that "distance lends enchantment to the view." They never come up to the expectations which are raised by the published accounts. I have never been at one of these materializations when the conditions were such as to preclude the possiblity of fraud. On the contrary, they are such as to prevent rigid scrutiny and thorough investigation, and to create strong doubts as to the fair and honorable character of the performances. Without the time or the money to visit all the places advertised, I have to form my opinion of these "manifestations" generally from those which I have seen. Of these I am obliged to say that the conditions were to some extent such conditions as would be imposed if fraud were to be practiced; and in the absence of evidence of the appearance of spirits, I must decline to believe that the faces I saw were the faces of persons who had passed from earth, or were faces manufactured by spirits to make themselves visible to the dull eyes of mundane beings. If these materializations are, as I believe, fraudulent performances, they will be so conducted that visitors will not be afforded an opportunity to expose them. The conditions will be such as to favor concealment and fraud. Ninety-nine out of a hundred must go away astounded by the exhibitions, as they do from those of Anderson, or the Japanese performers. Must one, therefore, be charged with obstinacy if he can neither believe that these peformances are by spirits, nor understand how they are produced? We are frequently told of the performances in the presence of Prof. Crookes. No doubt they were ingenious. Those attested to solemnly by the truthful and noble, but unfortunate, Robert Dale Owen would be regarded as quite as satisfactory but for the discovery which led to the exposure of the medium who practiced the deception. Crookes' name carries weight as a scientist; but we may be permitted to believe he is fallible, and that, if the facts were known, it would appear that he was as much deceived as Mr. Owen. "In theology," some one has said, "we balance authorities; in science, we weigh facts."

Making an allowance for deception and fraud, I do not question that there are unexplained phenomena under the name of Spiritualism. There are some which I have witnessed that I have never seen satisfactorily explained. Some of the explanations are as difficult to accept as the theory of spiritual agency. But although I have attended circles, and witnessed the usual doings which are ascribed to spirits, in many states of this Union, I have never seen any satisfactory proofs that invisible intelligent beings, once inhabitants of this earth, now exist, and have the power of manifesting themselves to us.

One of the bad features of Spiritualism is that it encourages and develops marvelousness. People come to delight in ghost stories; and the more strange and extraordinary, the more important and interesting they are. The tendency of ghostly literature is to destroy the desire for substantial intellectual food. The doings of spirits become, to the mind, more important than the concerns of earth. That the tendency of some of the teachings and performances of Spiritualism is to develop insanity, when there is a predisposition thereto, does not, I think, admit of doubt. A spiritual circle, with real or imaginary invisible beings prowling about in the dark, communicating in whispers, or producing strange souuds, is not just the place for an individual whose mind is in an unhealthful condition. I do not urge this against the truth of Spiritualism, but I mention it as one of its tendencies, which ought not to be ignored by Spiritualists themselves. Many cases of insanity have been attributed to Spiritualism, when the persons had a tendency to insanity from their birth. It would be truer to say that there are some things in Spiritualism for which persons with predispositions to insanity have an affinity, and to which they are attracted.

Spiritualism is frequently charged with having produced a vast amount of domestic discord, and encouraged licentious views and practices. I have no doubt that thousands have been led to separate from their partners for the reason that pretended spirits have advised them to look elsewhere for their "affinities." Thousands who have been brought up to believe in the authority of a book, on becoming Spiritualists, have but transferred their reverence and their allegiance to spirit guides, whose word and advice with them is the highest authority. Taking advantage of this weakness, mediums, some of them honestly and others dishonestly, have been able to exert an influence that cannot be fully appreciated. While I do not see anything in the philosophy of Spiritualism that interferes with the domestic relation, it must be admitted that the teachings of a large class of pretended spirits, and the importance and authority attached to their views and counsels by multitudes of people, have had no good effect on our social condition.

I only say, I am sure, what candid Spiritualists know and deplore, when I say that Spiritualism is accompanied by fraud of the worst kind, and to a lamentable extent. Thousands live on the sick and the credulous under various names, with no claims to confidence whatever. By flaming advertisements many are induced to send their dollars to heartless persons who are too lazy to work, and too shrewd to rob in the usual way. Fortune-telling is carried on by persons who in some places are prominently identified with Spiritualism. Their cards crowd the columns of the Spiritual journals, whose editorial silence would seem to indicate either that they acknowledge their claims, or they do not think it policy to question them. And so thousands are systematically swindled. Dark circles are held nightly in our cities by persons recognized as cheats and humbugs by the better class of Spiritualists; and these same persons make themselves prominent at the Spiritualist meetings, where they distribute their cards, and advertise their nefarious business. Nobody utters a public protest, although the honest Spiritualists in private confess and lament the fact. If a fraud is exposed, there are almost everywhere accomplices or unscrupulous friends to come out in defense of the medium, who gets advertised thereby, and in the end comes to be regarded as a victim of malice and bigotry. For these, and other reasons which could be stated, and which are not less creditable to Spiritualists, there are large numbers who accept the philosophy, standing aloof from it, who will not attend Spiritualist meetings, nor have anything to do with the public demonstration. Some of my statements may be thought severe, but their severity is in their truth. I am not prejudiced against Spiritualism, nor have I any disposition to speak harshly of its adherents. In as far as Spiritualists oppose the superstitions and follies of the church, they have my cordial sympathy; and their peculiar views in regard to the existence and communicative powers of supra-mundane beings have ever received from me respectful consideration, although I am unable to accept them. But when dishonesty and fraud appear under the name of Spiritualism, I should be untrue to myself if I failed to denounce such impositions as freely as if practiced by those connected with the church. Spiritualism has suffered less from its open enemies than by the knavery of some and the credulity of others within its ranks, and by the machinery which it furnishes unscrupulous men and women for swindling the ignorant and the superstitious.

Much can be said in favor of modern Spiritualism. No doubt, like other systems, it is a source of comfort to multitudes that no longer rely on the teachings of the churches in which they were brought up. I know many who are happy in the belief that their loved ones are around them, and ready to welcome them beyond the portals of death. Without doubt, Spiritualism has assisted very largely to destroy faith in the authortative character of the Bible. Many have been emancipated from the thraldom of the orthodox superstition who could have escaped in no other way. They found in Spiritualism a field for the exercise of that marvelousness which before was fed by the fables of the Bible; and while the pleasant belief in immortal life was increased, it was divested of the horrors of the old faith. Spiritualism has gone among a class that Materialism could not reach, and done a work that Materialism could not do, except by a long period of education and experience. It could be shown that modern Spiritualism, by destroying old standards, and familiarizing the people with the discussion of sacred subjects, has encouraged freedom of thought and liberality of sentiment.

I can only add in conclusion that while I am no Spiritualist, I think that Spiritualism in the present transitional stage of thought is doing a work that is much needed, the value of which, however, would be increased, if through its press and its influential advocates it could be brought to oppose with "righteous indignation" the frauds and corruptions which now have protection under its wing. There is so much in the theory and history of modern Spiritualism that it is in marked contrast to the popular theology; its teachings in many respects are so far in advance of those of the churches; its literature so much more liberal and in keeping with the spirit of the century; its press and its platform so comparatively free, and the intelligent and informed among its adherents so much more courteous and generous in the treatment of its opponents, that it has required from me something of a sacrifice of personal feeling to offer the criticisms which I have uttered, and which I believe justice and impartiality demand.

PROPOSITION.—"The Christian religion and the Bible tend to immorality and the injury of society."

MR. JAMIESON'S SPEECH.—CONTINUED.

My good friend appears to be disturbed, and even imbittered, to-night. Didn't you sleep well? I never felt more serene, thank you! and the longer I debate the better I feel; hence, I asked for this extra night. Perhaps our good-natured wordy war has not gone to suit you. My dear, reverend friend intimates that I am so tantalizing. Oh, well now, don't take it to heart; like some peoples' prayers, I mean nothing bad. Toward my friend I feel kind as a kitten. Why should I not? My opponent was so generous a gentleman that in the early part of this debate he handed over to me the best brains of the Christian church, and labeled them "Infidel." They were all Infidels. He had no use for them. I might hav them! Then he began to berate them, from Theodore Parker down. Draper is befogged, he says. Lyell was a Darwinian, the son of an ape. Tyndall not to be relied on. Huxley hasn't traveled. Darwin as foolish as if he had not. Haeckel is a nobody. And these men hav done nothing for the world, he says. "These Infidels," he shouts, "do not know what truth is." "Draper," says he, "there is no truth in him; he is an Infidel;" and then right away quotes him to prove that Infidelity is vile, immoral, full of iniquity; and when we look into Draper we find no such thing. It is my friend's dogmatizing—the construction he puts on Draper. Zell, Martin Luther, Dr. Dick, are nothing, in the estimation of my friend, compared with Rev. Dr. Ditzler. "Martin Luther," he says, "wasn't posted." Cyclopedias are of little account when brought near the great light of Rev. Dr. Ditzler's original researches. Seldom hav I met with an opponent—excuse me!—who has made such a pedantic display as my very pleasant, affable friend.

no, I will skip it. You hav sent all the way to Kentucky for the great Doctor to tell you such things. Our Methodist friends established a boarding-house, with grist-mill attachment. The boarders are assembled, with Elder Greene at the head of the table. One after another complains of the fare. They were promised pure, white bread; but, instead, there is a sodden, soggy mess. The Elder examines the flour bags, and finds that instead of flour they hav been treated to nothing but screenings. "Ah!" exclaims the Elder, "has it come to this? We had proposed to show the public how superior our fare is to Infidel hash, but lo and beheld! after sending all the way to Kentucky—well, it's just my luck. I might hav expected it, for I hav 'sent a boy to the mill.'" Great glorification we hav had about the victory which our Methodist friends expected to achieve over Infidelity. The promises were large, the performance meagre. Still, my talented opponent has done as well as most men could. The facts are against him. He says: "I giv you facts; I do not consult Zell about it." Wonder if he gave us facts when he said there were 300,000 active ministers in the United States? I think it would do him no harm to consult somebody besides himself!

My genial friend admitted, in the first question, that the world's great scientists are Infidels; but in his last night's camp-meeting-Methodistic-exhortation he said "no Infidel wrote anything, or did anything of value to the world." This is a fair specimen of his average style of reasoning. He crosses and re-crosses his own track. I take down his words in shorthand character, and thus prove to you that he ties his own tongue with his own words. He now claims science and the world's greatest scientists. He advances, retreats, makes sweeping statements, then modifies and qualifies, when I reply, until there is nothing left of his original positions. His guns are more dangerous at the breech than the muzzle. He now says that "Shakspere, Burns, and all the greatest poets, in all departments, were firm believers in Christianity." Shakspere was a play actor. By what process do you claim him? Because he believed in God? Did not Theodore Parker? Yet you rejected such as he as not Christians. When it suits Christians they hand over Robert Burns as an Infidel, and at the same time remind us that he would get stupidly drunk, and was in many ways very immoral. But when it serves their convenience to claim the Scottish bard as a Christian, then they grow eloquent over his beautiful Christian (?) poetry. And this is my opponent's fast-and-loose method all through this debate. Your illogical positions hav driven you to the wall in despair.

I quoted President White and Draper to prove that nearly all the greatest leaders of Protestantism were not only advocates of persecution, but persecutors. Melancthon himself commended the burning of Michael Servetus. I quoted histories that are unimpeachable for every statement I made. About the only way my friend has met these crushing facts against his system is to say, "They are Infidels!" or, "They are guilty of wilful falsehood." "Deliberate falsehood!" shouts my noisy Methodist friend. I, Rev. Dr. Ditzler, say so; and that is proof enough! I understand seventeen languages! When I reminded him that Noah Webster had twenty-two, that staggered him a little, but he soon rallied, and wanted to know what a dictionary maker knew about theology?

When Draper stated what my friend, on his own authority, says is a deliberate falsehood, that "the Christian believed there was no such thing as law in the government of the world," it is not Draper who utters the falsehood. My friend Ditzler, as usual, makes another of his bad mistakes. Draper is right and Ditzler is wrong. The Christian writers he named, Paley, Butler, Origen, Tertullian, did not believe in the government of the universe by immutable law. They believed and taught that all nature is subject to the capricious acts of a God. Yet my friend says I give no proofs! I give for every historical fact I quote, the historian's name, the book, the chapter, the page. He himself acknowleges that I do, for, in several instances, he calls the historians liars; Buckle, Draper, Lecky are all demolished in one breath by my very learned friend. He tells us that he expected a great deal of science in this debate. I gave you more than you have met. I discover that the clergy do not understand science. Your turning and twisting about the Bible-flood not covering the whole earth, when your book plainly says it did, shows that you put a meaning into the texts which is not warranted. The difficulty with you gentlemen is that science has cornered you. I told you that "infant damnation" was based by John Calvin on the Bible. He distorts my statement. Watts bases his hymns on the Bible too.

He "explained" that when God said he would sell people into slavery he only suffered it to be done. Either way it makes your God responsible. But your book says God would sell them. Says Mr. Ditzler, "I refuted all his charges about the Bible teaching, as he said, polygamy." You refuted not one, and when you said God rebuked polygamy, I called upon you to give me chapter and verse. You could not do it. Is this the way you Christians have met Infidelity? "defeating the foe in all cases." It is lucky that you mention it, for nobody would have mistrusted it. It is where you say God honored David when he reformed, when your Bible says he was a man after God's own heart, did right in the eyes of the Lord all the days of his life, except in adultery with a living man's wife, and murdering the man. I never had the pleasure of debating with a gentleman who makes so many blunders in history, in science, and in the Bible. According to his own Bible we have proved that his God is the author of all the evil in the world, which fact takes the stiffening out of all my friend's fierce fulminations against the evil (?) of Infidelity. God was the author of the evil, and wherever the Bible is found, and Christianity, there is the seething, simmering stew of vice and crime that my friend has sweltered over so much. Who are the rich defaulters? Christians. Who are the forgers? Pious Christians. Who are the bank officers that rob widows and orphans? Christians. Who plunder the poor on earth and expect Jesus in heaven to forgive them? Christians. Where were our Winslows and Spencers? In the Christian church. Where are nearly all of our bad congressmen found? In the Christian church, and supporting it. The whisky rings, the swindlers, the wealthy and "respectable" supporters of public plunder, are not Infidels, as you know, and he knows, but are pillars of the church. Deny this until you are hoarse, and the fact remains that modern, fashionable, time-serving Christianity offers a premium for crime. I would not have twitted my opponent with these unpleasant facts if he had not commenced the usual tirade of abuse of Infidels, and never even attempted to prove his charges true, while I have proved all of mine. Any Christian who wants a good, square debate with me, free from personalities, can have it; but I do not propose to be abused, or have my friends abused, without hurling your brick-bats back, to let you know what a flimsy, easily-shivered, glass house you are living in. Brace up and take your own medicine. "All real Freelovers are Infidels," are they? There are several thousand clerical Freelovers that you forget to count. Men who have been brought up in the "nurture and admonition of the Lord." Perhaps that is what is the matter with them. Oh, no, "our cause needs no such defense!" I am conscious of the fact that I am killing this thing too dead; but I am not quite done with it yet.

MR. CHARLES HERBOLD has just published an address of his delivered before the First Auxiliary Liberal League of Cincinnati, entitled, "The National Liberal League, What It Is and What It Is Not," that should hav a very large circulation. ## Lotteries.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I am surprised to see persons sound on other vital issues of the day sometimes sustaining the action of the Postmaster-General in his late edict for the suppression of lotteries. If legislation against lotteries were the only thing involved it would be a comparatively trifling matter; but we hav always supposed that free speech, a free press, and consequently free mails, were what made us essentially a free people; and when, for a simple wrong thing, we go to work and violate the principles which make the liberty we supposed was secured to us, it is entirely another matter. When, on any pretext, we allow an espionage of the written communication of our citizens, one to the other—a thing hitherto always held sacred—where is the freedom of our speech once thus invaded? There is but one answer: Gone forever! unless we rise in our might and hurl back the usurper—whether the Y. M. C. A. or somebody else—unless he is, in turn, suppressed in the name of liberty.

Legislating against lotteries, when we stand as a people guilty of almost every crime under heaven, covered up by law and popular whitewash! Every intelligent person ought to know that any act in the name of morality against gambling is only one excuse for a larger matter, which amounts to the invasion of the rights of those who do not train under "our ecclesiastical influence."

Do not understand me as either in their favor or interest. Is so, I could not say a word against church gambling, which is now the last and almost universal practice to keep up the finances of a decaying religious system. Gambling, whether by Christian or Infidel, is an act of injustice in that the aim is to get something without rendering to the giver a full equivalent; and it is just as wrong in lotteries, trade, speculation, politics, or any other place or phase of human life.

The folly of such legislation among an inventive and intelligent people is more than evident. A public act so startling as the invasion of the private rights of a citizen is of itself an immense advertisement of the lottery idea. Where, before, the public mind slumbered, it is now alive and entertaining it most profoundly. No legislation can prevent giving away a prize, nor can it hinder the determining of who shall be by chance its recipient, no more than it can stop the playing of cards. At the present time there is in this section a lottery, with a $15 000 prize, stirring up an unhealthy interest over many communities. It is not affected by the present law in any possible way, and so it will always be. The real effect of such legislation will be to popularize gambling in many other forms evasive of the law till the life shall be as effectually sapped out of the nation for healthy business action as it is in Mexico. When lotteries were principally confined to special localities, with their notices buried among a mass of advertising matter, their patrons were exceptional. With the pushing of it in people's faces by this aggressive action, every newspaper and every available avenue of advertising will be used evasive of the law in localities where it was before unknown. If any one has anything to sell, a way will be found that will involve the principle of the game of chance, and buyers or investors in small sums will be plenty.

Like the imprisonment of a Bennett on a false "Cupid's Yokes" charge, this action on lotteries means something deeper than is on the surface apparent. But for the advance action of the Oneida Christians, another chapter would there hav been written. The same cause is now writing another in anti-Mormon legislation. In the end they all tell that an immense religious power sees its coming dawn in the increase of intelligence and the growth of humanity; as a last resort it goes back to its old method of brutal force, and if, entirely outside of their ways, you desire, in the highest sense of the word, to be a man, its clutch will be on your throat to put you down.

Truth seekers! all who love justice and right, work vigilantly for the time when man will be led to do right, not under the brutality of the iron rod, but naturally and gently under the sway of reason and intelligence, with the advantages of being better born than were the monsters that hav disfigured the history of the past. H. W. BOOZER.

A Short Sermon.

BY W. F. JAMIESON.

"Gospel according" to H. L. Green. Text: I hav learned by experience that there is little use in trying to organize Liberalism where none of our periodicals are taken. Therefore allow me to urge it upon our speakers, our Liberal Leagues, and individual Freethinkers everywhere, to labor constantly to get subscribers for the Liberal papers."—H. L. Green in T. S.

No truer words were ever written. I hav observed for many years that, although the lecturer can succeed without the recommendation of any paper in building up a Liberal sentiment, in nearly every community he or she visits, if possessed of personal magnetism and common sense, yet when the week's lectures close the enthusiasm is allowed to die out for the lack of fuel to keep it alive.

The Liberal paper is the cheapest and best fuel that can be used. It cannot take the place of the human voice, nor can the latter do the work of the former. They can get along each without the support of the other; but, united, they increase each other's efficiency. The Liberal paper holds every inch of vantage ground won by whatever agency.

I dedicate myself anew, with the beginning of the new year, to the good work of securing subscribers to THE TRUTH SEEKER and the staunch old Investigator, which has so nobly stood by THE TRUTH SEEKER in its time of trouble. I will do what I can toward making the fiftieth year of the Boston Investigator a jubilee year in fact.

Planetary Life and Death.

THAT TIME "WHEN THE OLD HULK WE TREAD SHALL BE A WRECK, A SLAG, A CINDER, DRIFTING IN SPACE WITHOUT ITS CREW OF FOOLS."

Prof. Richard A. Proctor lectured Saturday afternoon, Jan. 3d, before the Teachers' Association of New York on "The Life and the Death of a World." He said:

We hav to consider the various members of the solar system as representing for us youth, middle age, and so on to old age. The earth on which we liv, and the solar system of which it forms a part, hav arrived at their present condition by processes analogous to growth—the processes commonly called evolution. These processes are still going on, as they hav been during periods of time which seem to grow longer and longer the more we study their evidences. It is falling short of the truth to say that one hundred million years must hav elapsed during which the frame of the earth must hav been very much as it is at present, and during which processes bringing it to its present stage hav been going on. From the length of time consumed in achieving certain definite results upon the earth's crust by those processes within the knowledge of man, we can estimate what has been required to effect other results which we see. The further study of the earth's crust shows us clearly that before she became what she is now there was a time when she was far too hot for the existence of animal life, and the period of her cooling, estimating it by her bulk, could not hav been less than three hundred million years. Preceding that there must hav been a period in which she was in a vaporous stage, and the evidence patent to science allots one hundred million years as the time for her changing from the vaporous to the solid condition. This givs us in all five hundred million years as the time in which the earth was arriving at a condition fit for the habitation of human beings.

The only escape from this conclusion is in the supposition that all the signs afforded by the crust of the earth, all the evidence we glean from the earth and from other members of the solar system, demonstrating those processes of development, hav only misled us, and that all was created at once just as we see it now. But why should we do this violence to our reason? Where we cannot but admit growth and development on a small scale, we should be prepared to admit them on a large scale, and not reject evidence so clear to our reason. But, after all, it matters very little whether we take a longer or a shorter period of time. We are concerned not with periods of time, but with the amount of development in the past, from over which we hav to look, and what we hav to expect in the future. We hav to consider whether some of the various members of the solar system represent the remote past of our own earth and others our remote future.

I am going to adopt the principle that the larger an orb is, the longer will be the various stages of its growth. This is based on the fact that the process of cooling requires more time for large masses than for small ones. For instance, Jupiter, with a diameter seven times as great as that of the earth, if his volume was of the same density as that of the earth, would require seven times as long in cooling, or 3,500,000,000 years. So, supposing they started at the same time, Jupiter would hav to wait 3,000,000,000 years longer than the earth before arriving at the same stage of development. On the other hand, take a small orb like our own moon. It is a mass only 1·81 of the size of the earth, with a surface 1·13 that of the earth. It will readily be seen that the heat of our own earth would last six times as long. Therefore, we get for the cooling stage of the moon only about 80,000,000 years, and, supposing they started at the same time, the moon would hav arrived 420,000,000 years ago at the stage of development or growth of the earth to-day.

The sun can tell us something of the past of a planet's life. He was probably formed, as all were, in a state of vapor, and probably yet remains, in great part at least, in a vaporous state. He is the youngest of all the planets of our solar system, and may justly be so regarded simply because he is so much greater than all the others in mass. Thirty-five thousand millions of years would be required to bring him to the condition of our earth to day.

The spots upon the sun's luminous surface, which seem to be great openings in the bright clouds of the sun, are as yet unexplained, but they seem to hav recurrent periods of appearances and disappearances every eleven years. A theory concerning them well worthy of consideration is that of Prof. Kirkwood, who suggests that they owe their existence to great meteors from some comet falling into the sun at regular intervals. One of these spots which has been photographed [and here reproduced] is three times the extent of the surface of the earth. The heat of the sun is estimated at 5,300 times greater than that of molten iron, and from this arises the luminous flames of glowing hydrogen, and, without doubt, the accompanying eruptions of other matter, which made the flame-like projections on the borders of the photographs of the sun in eclipse by the moon. Those eruptions threw their matter to an estimated height of 250,000 miles from the surface, from which it is impossible that it should ever hav returned, but is still traveling through space at the rate of 500 miles per second. [The pictures of the sun were among the most brilliant and beautiful that were exhibited. They were succeeded by others illustrative of Jupiter and Saturn, in which the cloud masses surrounding the latter in the form of belts were displayed with marvelous effect, as was also the body of Jupiter, which was shown to be greatly magnified in apparent size by its cloud masses.] That Jupiter possesses great heat of its own is demonstrated by the existence of these clouds. It receives but 1·27 of the degree of the sun's heat that reaches the earth, and consequently could not hav clouds formed from that source, but by the working of its own forces. In the youth of all planets, the waters that are to form their oceans are raised in the form of clouds surrounding them. The moons of Jupiter, receiving light and heat from that planet, may be the abodes of life, and the smallest of them has two hundred million square miles of surface.

Our moon will tell us most of the earth's future, unless we are altogether astray in reading the evidence that seems to be offered us. Venus shows the possession of a watery atmosphere, and is doubtless fit for habitation under conditions similar to those upon the earth. Mars shows not only divisions into sea and land in about equal proportions, but accumulations of what seems to be ice and snow at its poles, which decrease and increase apparently in the seasons of summer and winter. But the moon has no water. Her seas hav disappeared. Did she ever hav water? Did she ever pass through such stages as our earth has gone through? Was this cold and dead world ever warmed with life like our earth? We cannot doubt it when we see in her vast and numerous volcanic craters the evidences of the heat she once possessed. She, too, must hav passed through her cooling stage. Her clouds were condensed into oceans, of which we see the traces still in her dark depressions of surface. It is believed that as a planet becomes old its waters disappear from the surface, are sucked in through crevices made in the crust of the cooling orb until they entirely disappear. That is a German theory. Four times as much water as is now upon the surface of our globe can be, it is estimated, contained in its interior. [One of the views illustrating this part of the lecture was a photograph of a portion of the moon's surface, dazzlingly brilliant, startlingly sharp in its details, with a background of black, unclouded sky, dotted with stars—the picture of a lifeless world without an atmosphere.] This, the lecturer said, would be the probable fate of the earth; this what the earth might be expected to be in twenty-five hundred millions of years.

[From Dr. Foote's Health Monthly.]

Heresy.—Sedition.—Obscenity.—Fraud.

Not long ago we read somewhere of an Irish Orangeman who was arrested in some part of Ireland for having played on his flute one of the favorite airs of the Orangemen in public. He was charged with uttering an obscene libel. This occurrence strikingly illustrates how words and phrases may be stretched and construed to meet the needs of popular prejudice. In the middle ages the charge of heresy was brought against any advanced scientist who was trying to enlighten his fellows with a new idea or discovery. Not long ago, in England, the charge of sedition was brought against all political and social reformers who were trying to introduce governmental or social reform. To-day the charge of obscenity is brought against well-meaning individuals who are trying to direct public attention to important facts in physiology, questions of population, the marriage system, etc. And now we hav before Congress a bill to still further tinker the postal laws on the pretext of protecting the people from schemes of "fraud." If this new bill is passed, the word "fraud" will probably hav a meaning which it never had before. The term will be stretched to cover a multitude of offenses against conservative prejudices.

Whatever legislation may be necessary for the protection of the public against obscenity and fraud, it is good Jeffersonian doctrine to say that they should be state measures rather than federal; municipal enactments rather than postal regulations. It is over a year since Mr. T. B. Wakeman's arguments showing the unconstitutionality of such postal laws were published, and up to this day they remain unanswered. Members of Congress, if they hav not looked into this subject, ought to do so before voting upon any such measures. We would commend to their attention the pamphlet containing Mr. Wakeman's argument, which can be had, probably for the asking, of Prof. A. L. Rawson, President of the National Defense Association, No. 34 Bond street, New York.

Nothing is more absurd than the attempt to make of the post-office department a detective and police force. If one stops to think of it a moment he will see at once how a precedent of this kind established threatens the liberties of the people.

One of the oldest religious papers published in New York city—the Methodist—some three years ago published an editorial upon the subject, in which it was said that all manner of communications were sent throught the post-office. Incendiarism, murder, seduction, and all descriptions of crime were planned and appointed under the conveniences of the mail facilities; but, said the editor, better suffer all these evils than introduce a greater one. The liberty of speech, press, and mails must be preserved.

So far as obscenity, fraud, and such like offenses are concerned, they are as old as civilization itself, and in the old countries are dealt with without the aid of postal laws. In no country under the sun, excepting Russia, could such outrages be perpetrated as those which are being inflicted in the United States at this moment under the postal laws. This peculiar legal wedge, so new to our institutions, was driven in at midnight at the close of the Forty-Second Congress. It is now proposed to drive this wedge in further. It is to be hoped that those who are sent to Washington for the purpose of guarding the liberties of the people and preserving to us the institutions which were established by Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, and other far-seeing statesmen of 1776, will not allow themselves to be led into traps set for them by mercenary hands, aided by short-sighted enthusiasts in the name of morality and religion.

Abolitionist vs. Freelover.

In the communication from Moses Hull last week, among several persons named as Freelovers, he mentions me. Mr. Benjamin F. Tucker and others hav made similar reference to my position on the great sex question. I cannot let the inclusion pass without a qualification and definition.

Some six years ago I wrote and published the following article, which will show the water-mark of my thinking at that remote age of the world:

DEFINITIONS.

QUINCY, ILL., Oct. 20, 1874.

Turning over the leaves of an old scrap-book to-day, I came across a curious and rather flat-footed statement of what was required to make an Abolitionist of the olden time.

As I lived in those days and suffered some part of the odium of their glory, I take a keen interest in this definition.

For nearly thirty years it has been a question in this country as to what constitutes an Abolitionist. It will be a satisfaction to many to hav the question settled, and we accordingly take pleasure in copying the following authentic definition of the term from the Southern Literary Messenger, a respectable Richmond magazine:

"An Abolitionist is any man who does not love slavery for its own sake as a divine institution; who does not worship it as the corner-stone of civil liberty; who does not adore it as the only possible social condition on which a permanent republican government can be erected, and who does not, in his inmost soul, desire to see it extended and perpetuated over the whole earth as a means of human reformation second in dignity, importance, and sacredness alone to the Christian religion. He who does not love African slavery with this love is an Abolitionist."

Now, there are many parallels between civilized or Christian marriage and the late system of African slavery. Marriage is often spoken of as a system of slavery. The above definition set me to thinking of as uncompromising a definition of marriage. As an old-time stickler for true blue marriage, I insist on the real, original article or none; no wings, nor modifications, nor side-issues, if it is to be marriage and called marriage at all. I heard the late Dr. Bethune once exclaim, on this very question of Abolition, in opposition to toning down a troublesome church anti-slavery resolution, "If I've got to take the toast, I want to take it dry!" So I'll take mine plain, without milk or sweetning, if you please. There may be others who are bigger and better walking dictionaries and more expert in defining terms, but anyhow, as I hav the above exquisite model before me, here goes:

A Freelover is any man or any woman (the slaveocrat fellow left woman out) who does not love marriage for its own sake as a divine institution; who does not worship it as the corner-stone of love and the foundation of both individual and conjugal liberty; who does not adore it as the only possible social condition and sexual relation on which a free, just, and permanent family government can be erected; who does not believe in it as the perennial fount of the most rigorous morals; as the purest well spring of politeness and good manners; as the inspired origin of exalted sentiment, esteem, and affection; who does not enjoy it as the highest heaven of sexual charm; the dearest dalliance that lovers can ever know; the supreme ecstacy that never cloys; who does not approve it for its unchanging durability as the one long-continued courtship, pursuing the even tenor of its way unspotted and undimmed, from the blushing spring days of first and earliest love to the declining autumn of the sere and yellow leaf; who does not know it from tradition all the way down the ages as well as from experience as the one, sweet, spontaneous, reciprocal relation, equally yoked and equally burdened, wherein indulgence is always temperate, health always resultant, and woman always respected in her ever-varying moods, left free to accept or decline attentions as she is attracted or repelled, and carefully environed with the best conditions for fœtal growth, embryonic development, and safe nativity of offspring; who does not, in his inmost soul, desire to see it extended and perpetuated over the whole earth as a means of building the best brains and developing, elevating, and perfecting the human race, second in dignity, importance, and sacredness alone to the Christian religion. He who does not love Christian marriage—the marriage of one man to one woman for life; monogamic marriage by priest or magistrate—with this love is a Freelover.

Say, Barry, Hull, Chase, Andrews, Victoria, and the rest of the free elect—how is that for high, exact, relentless definition?

You see the old standard of Christian morals is fixed and rigid. Here is no margin for free play. You can't be hanged for a sheep, and not quite so hanged for a lamb. You must go the entire animal, or you are a goner yourself. It won't do to select a "rib" from the "critter" and then indulge in tenderloin elsewhere.

One and one only is the rigorous command. Poor Beecher, you know, just for being the object of affections thrust on him unsought, was placed on the sharp and ragged edge of anxiety and despair—guilt edge, of course, or else it would not hav been sharp and ragged. So, monogamists on the one hand and Freelovers on the other, draw your chalk-mark somewhere and then toe it.

Since that article was written social evolution has made some progress. Comstock and Abbot hav arisen, curiously enough working together for evil which turns into good, and each in his own way bringing the sex question up for a wide discussion. Opposed to these worthies, a great, grand force has grown up known as the National Liberal League, working together for good, especially since expelling the aforesaid Abbot, its first president, as an incapable leader, although a good writer of Platforms, Demands, and Ethical Laws. The "Nine Demands of Liberalism," especially the eighth, mark a long step in social progress. Before the formulation of the Eighth Demand very few Liberals made any distinction between Christian and Natural morality, and even now it is difficult to make many Liberals see any theoretical and still more any practical difference. The "Seven Ethical Laws of Rationalism" mark another great step.

The Eighth Demand, including, as it must, the morals that grow out of sex, and repudiating as it does Christian laws concerning morals, and demanding Natural laws for their regulation, places Mr. Abbot, the author, high on the roll of theoretical Freelovers, according to the above rigorous definition, notwithstanding his cordial co-operation with Comstock in his character of liar, inquisitor, and decoy. Still further the first three of his seven Ethical Laws very fairly formulate the principle of the "sovereignty of the individual"—a principle which, carried out to its logical and legitimate conclusions in social life, would burst marriage as it is into ten thousand flinders, and replace it with relations based on science and human nature—a system infinitely better. This places Mr. Abbot still higher on the roll of honor among Freelovers.

Since 1874 Mr. Beecher has been tried for accepting a love "thrust upon him unsought." He denied it, the court acquitted, and his church forgave him. This trial greatly educated the people. Mr. Bennett also was arrested three times over, tried once, and imprisoned. He also thrust some love unsought; but he confessed it, and was as cordially forgiven as the other fellow was who denied it. Men who thrust love unsought, or, at all events, unencouraged, are not Freelovers. Mr. Bennett and Mr. Beecher are not nearly so high on the roll as Mr. Abbot. All the persecutions, trials, petitions, and the general literature developed by the Comstock laws and the corruptionist Comstock himself, hav been another means of greatly educating the people on the subject of Natural morals.

Mrs. Denton, in view of her late letter conceding that marriage, having come down to us from savagery through barbarism, is not perfect, and will undoubtedly improve, is, according to the above definition, a manifest Freelover. Mrs. Lucy Stone, in her repudiation of her husband's name, and the irregular way in which she was married, and for her criticisms of marriage, evidently does not love marriage for its own sake, and is a Freelover. Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, for her many criticisms of marriage, is another. Ralph Waldo Emerson, in whom the best culture of New England centers, also the one man whom the Index people write notices of and sonnets to, and otherwise worship, for his many exaltations of love and his many declarations of the impossibility of the existence of love in bonds, is a Freelover.

> The lover watched his graceful maid
> As 'mid the virgin train she strayed,
> Nor knew her beauty's best attire
> Was woven still by the snow-white choir.
> At last she came to his hermitage,
> Like the bird from the woodlands to the cage—
> The gay enchantment was undone,
> A gentle wife, but fairy none.

Now many people of the Index stripe do not understand all the subtle meanings of the poems of Emerson. For such persons, people of mere culture on a ground of not very strong common sense, Emerson should always be translated. Now what does this passage mean? The lover watched his graceful maid for what? He was looking for a creature of grace and beauty whom he could love. He saw that she was beautiful, but he did not observe that a large part of her beauty was due to her setting, was contributed by her environment, was reflected from her beautiful companions. At last he took her home and—mark the characteristic simile—"like the bird from the woodlands to the cage." As soon as he placed her safely in his cage, still the supposed fairy with all the beauty which had enchanted him while "'mid the virgin train she strayed," the enchantment was undone, the illusion vanished. He discovered at once that she was no fairy that he had sought, no creature to love, no companion for his inmost soul, but had deteriorated and relapsed into a wife. In the poet's regard a wife is evidently inferior to a fairy, and the disappointment of the lover on being disenchanted is justified. Now what is a wife that this Hey Presto! changed her into? Why, a creature to watch at the window for the coming of her lord, open the door for him, take his hat and coat, place his easy chair and slippers, and follow him like a shadow wherever he goes. A wife is an upper servant to oversee or actually do the duties of his bed-chamber, his laundry, his pots and kettles in the cage that is his. In the struggle with these very tangible realisms no fairy can stand the strain. No wonder she collapses and becomes just simply the wife. Under marriage as it is, most lovers when this first enchantment is undone swear that they won't submit to such a cheat. They go right out to find another virgin train and snow-white choir. But this time they are not so easily fooled, and when they find a graceful maid they do not take her to the hermitage and get her best attire all bedraggled and ruined in her cage.

Emerson's poems are full of passages to this same purport. Some readers will perhaps remember my analysis of his "Giv all to Love," about a year ago in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Were I asked to giv a direct positive definition of Freelove, as the above quoted is a negative one, I should say, with the little light that I hav, that Freelove is the free and full concession to woman of her sovereignty in the domain of love, the enthronement of woman as queen in all affairs of the heart. This will install her as the maker and administrator of all laws concerning the relations of sex as well as all the minor codes of etiquette, politeness, style, fashion, and social manners. This involves on the part of all men the abandonment of every form of force to gain her smile of approval, involves the cessation of even urgency to win her heart. In short, it involves turning gentlemen and becoming her loyal subjects in all the concerns of love.

Under the rigorous logic of the above definitions and the illustrious utterances of great men and women we are all included None can escape. We are all Freelovers—all but Benjamin and Sara. She loves slavery for its own sake. With a husband absent three-fourths of the time, prying into other people's private letters, she finds the yoke of marriage easy and its burden light. She hugs her chains.

Now, in view of these great names, sponsors for Freelove, I almost tremble to accept the high place among the honorable company to which Moses Hull assigns me. I feel myself quite de trop, and hardly up to the high calling of the makers of Ethical Laws and the editors of Women's Journals, and Presidents of National Women's Rights Associations, and renowned Poets. If Moses has not made a "mistake," and is really authorized to bid me to the assembly of such just men and women made perfect, if I can get over my trepidation and conclude to accept at all, reminding all concerned of the above definition of what constitutes an Abolitionist, and what makes a Freelover, I shall humbly take my place on the lowest seat of the synagogue and learn Freelove from the wise rabbis and poets and doctors of laws above me,

T. C. LELAND.

Asking Advice.

BY F. F. FOLLET.

[TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The following essay was written to be read at a sociable of the Temple of Honor at Rockford, Ill., on the evening of Dec. 29, 1879]

There is an old saying that advice is cheap. There never was a greater mistake. And this, like hundreds of other similar so-called aphorisms, has done more to injure the human race than can ever be estimated. And this and many similar old saws, which are repeatedly and thoughtlessly uttered, hav done and are doing far more to retard the progress and development of the noble and generous qualities there are in mankind than you or I hav any idea of.

Many a word of advice carelessly, inconsiderately, or perchance stupidly uttered here in this world will for aught we know bud or blossom in time to bear fruit in eternity.

There are comparatively few people who are capable of giving good advice. In proof of this statement I hav only to say, look at the condition of our country to-day. Read the daily and weekly press. See the inquiry that is being made for men—men who are capable of giving good advice, men who are qualified to make good and wholesome laws for the governance of the people, men to send to our halls of state and national legislation; and, most of all, a man—where shall we find him?—a man capable of judging what are good, sound, and just laws.

Such an one is very much looked for and inquired after, to fill the executive chair of this nation for the next four or eight years.

Now, this which is so plainly and conspicuously true in regard to our state and national affairs is equally true, only on a diminished scale, in all the humble walks of life. How truthfully has it been said that we are fearfully and wonderfully made! The creator has given us two ears and two eyes, and but one tongue. He has given us five senses, and but one set of vocal organs, therefore we should hear and see, feel and think, before giving utterance to our thoughts.

There is a young man or a young woman just sprouting into manhood or budding into womanhood. They are full of bright hopes and pleasant prospects. They start out in life. They mark out a course in life to pursue. Their road through life seems to look clear and bright. They hav placed marks along their path, which they are expecting to reach at certain times as they progress. And they hav placed at the end, almost in sight of their imaginative vision, a goal. They strike out on this road with buoyant hope and elastic step. Everything seems bright and joyous.

They rush on. But all unwittingly they come to a cross-road, or, perchance, it may but guy to one side of the path they had marked out, just a little. In their haste to reach the goal they had set they inadvertently take the wrong path, and thoughtlessly they hurry on. But ere they are aware of it their path is growing more difficult; it is getting narrow and rough. They stop and begin to look around them, and they find themselves in a labyrinth of difficulties. They try to peer into the path ahead, to get, if possible, a glimpse of their goal. They find that they are hedged in. Then they begin to look about for some of the marks that, in their imagination, they had placed along their path as guide-posts, and to their astonishment they find that they hav lost their "blaze." And gradually the conviction comes over them that they hav taken the wrong road. My kind hearers, hav any of you ever been in such a fix?

If you hav, you know what it is to feel the need of a friend—some wise counselor; one in whose judgment and truthfulness you could trust. And more precious to you at that moment was good advice than all of the gems of India.

History preserves the record of but comparatively few great and truly wise counselors. Yet every nation in every clime has had its men of wisdom, its grand and noble counselors. China had its Confucius and its Mencius, or Meng-Tae; Hindoostan, its Menu and its Buddah, or Sakia-Muni; Persia, its Zoroaster; India, its Christna; Turkey, its Mohammed.

Most of these men were poor in purse but rich in wisdom. All of these men were loved and honored by the generations in which they lived; and in generations which followed they were deified and worshiped for their wise counsels, their words of wisdom and sympathy, the good advice they had left to the world.

Greece and Rome had their wise men also, some of whom I shall mention; for instance, a Hesiod, a Lycurgus, an Æsop, an Aristocles, an Aristotle, a Zeno, a Socrates, a Plato, a Plutarch, two Plinys, and many other lesser lights too numerous to mention.

All of these learned sages were loved and honored in their day, and their names to-day shine on the pages of history with a bright luster in comparison with the names of their time who deluged the world in blood for their own selfish ends and to establish their glory, as the bright glow of the noonday sun eclipses the rays of the twilight moon. And their grand and noble utterances of words of advice, wisdom, and sympathy are more precious to the student of antiquity than the most costly pearls of the ocean.

In contrast with these, where are the names of the men who built the Roman Forum or the Egyptian pyramids? Their names are but faintly preserved on the immense piles of stone they are supposed to hav erected.

Egypt furnished the world no sages, and what is Egypt to-day? And where does she stand in the sisterhood of the nations of the earth? Egypt in the days of her glory was all pomp and show. Her people were low down in the scale of humanity, worshiping cats and other domestic animals. And even her crowned heads were so ignorant of the laws of sociology that they compelled, by edicts, their sons and daughters to intermarry. And her most renowned and beautiful queen, who is said to hav dined on pearls worth fifty thousand pounds apiece, and who by her dazzling beauty and gorgeous display of pomp and wealth turned the head of the mighty and powerful Cæsar, and brought suppliantly kneeling at her feet two of the otherwise noble triumviri of the great Roman empire, is to-day but a hissing and a by-word in the pages of history.

Had Egypt, with her fertile soil and salubrious climate, been blessed with a few wise sages she might hav stood foremost in the ranks of nations to-day.

But, my hearers, why should I prolong the recital of the names of noble men who hav uttered wise and grand words of advice and wisdom in the past? If in this short though perhaps tedious essay I hav touched but one chord of tender sympathy for poor, fallen, degraded humanity I shall feel amply repaid.

Then let us never be heard to say again advice is cheap or sympathy is cheap. For when they are truly, candidly, and considerately uttered or given, from a full and honest heart, they are always precious. They are like "apples of gold in pictures of silver." "Yea, more to be desired than much fine gold."

> "I count these things to be grandly true,
> That a noble deed is a step towards God,
> Lifting the soul from the common sod
> To a purer air and a broader view."

What Will You Do about It?

This question is addressed to each individual reader in regard to the facts embodied in the selection in THE TRUTH SEEKER of Dec. 6th, headed, "Romanism and the Irish Race," an article from the North American Review, by James Anthony Froude, containing the most important statistical realities connected with our future for the consideration of Liberals that hav appeared in any one article in the secular press for years.

The facts are simply these: By propagation and emigration the Catholic power is now numerically stronger than any other sect in this country, and is augmenting in proportionate ratio as time goes by. Though declining in some portions of the Old World, it is increasing with most alarming rapidity here, and the usurpation of the reins of power is only a question of time.

Our government is founded on the principle that the majority shall rule, and is working might and main toward universal suffrage.

The question comes home at once—Can we save ourselves from the coming doom in the near future in any other way than by going back on principles, perfectly safe for our Puritan forefathers, but wholly unadapted to the present mighty problem connected with the Catholics and Chinese? Should we admit to citizenship any one who cannot swear entire allegiance to the fundamental principles that underlie our government? Can we admit those already foresworn and bound by every tie of their lives to undermine and destroy it, for the avowed purpose of putting a religious despotism in its place, whose past history has always been one of brutal authority and bloody conquest, the enslavement of all that ennobles humanity? It would seem wiser to call on the savages that roam among our western lands to come over the border and deposit their votes, than to admit to citizenship the foresworn enemies of the fundamental principles that underlie our political institutions.

Spiritualists who may read this, I wish to call your attention to the fact that General Roberts in his Mind and Matter has been the first editor of a journal of this kind who has made a specialty of this work of combating our most real and imminent danger. While he has had the foresight to perceive this and go to work in time, the superficial hav called him a visionary and lunatic. His penetrative foresight and love of the right being as incomprehensible to duller minds as materializations would be to the average Materialist. In the present and future history of your ism please make note of this.

Consumptive Wine.

Let me call attention to the advertisement of Dr. M. C. White printed last week. Having had some experience with her medicines and found them efficacious, I recommended her to advertise them in THE TRUTH SEEKER. A friend of mine, with one of his lungs affected, which gave him great anxiety, has been greatly relieved by taking the "Consumptive Wine." Along with the direct benefit to the lung his weight has increased, cheeks filled out, circulation more rapid, and good healthy color of the skin has returned. The change is so marked that I am justified in speaking of it. The medicine is not properly a "wine," but a nutritive food. It seems to hav the effect of removing the old and building up the new. It acts slowly, as, with disease of long standing, it ought to do. I recommend any one affected with lung trouble to try it.

MR JAMES E. EMERSON, of Beaver Falls, will address the Pittsburgh Liberal League in K. of P. Hall, 76 Fifth avenue, on Sunday, January 18, 1880; subject, "Progressive Life"—man's intellectual, moral, social, religious, and political development. We hope all our readers of Pittsburgh will attend.

Mrs. Denton Replies to Bundy.

[The following was sent to the R.-P Journal, but the editor "respectfully declined to publish" it. After his attack on Mrs. Denton, it does not speak very well for his sense of fairness.]

WELLESLEY, MASS, Dec. 14, 1879.

EDITOR R.-P. Journal, Dear Sir: I had no doubt of the Journal's responsibility for the attack in its columns on Mr. Bennett. But what right had I to treat your "special agent" merely as a mark behind which the Journal was pleased to hide?

You say, "The government has not thrust any question upon our attention." I answer, When a government instituted by the people, for the avowed purpose of securing to the governed the blessings of liberty, and an equality of rights and privileges, some in cases where liberty has been forfeited by crime—when such a government so far forgets the source of its authority and the object of its own existence as to thwart that purpose by its legislation, and to sustain its courts in a sytematic disregard of such rights, I maintain that it raises a question, and a very grave question, as to the duty of every citizen who contributes either means or influence to its support. If our government has not done this by its legislation in connection with the obscenity law—by sustaining the unjust decisions of its courts in the attempt to execute that law, and by permitting its agents to resort to falsehood and crime, and to the vulgar tricks of the most abandoned and vicious, in the effort to destroy its intended victims without arousing the indignation of the civilized world—then words hav no meaning, and governments are irresponsible.

You say the United States courts decided that Mr. Heywood's "was an obscene pamphlet;" that Mr. Bennett "knowing that, defied the government to prosecute him by sending it through the mails;" that "he knew the penalty and took the risk." But do you forget that that same United States court decided, first, that the intent of an author is not be considered in determining as to the decency or indecency of his productions? and, second, that the name of Mr. Heywood's pamphlet, and hence the term by which you hav designated it, is indecent? Or, hav you also, "knowing that, defied the government to prosecute" you "by sending it through the mails?" Senseless as such a decision may appear, I cannot write the name of that pamphlet in this letter and send it to you through the post-office without rendering myself—as you hav already rendered yourself—liable to prosecution and a term in the penitentiary for the same offense, in law, as that which sent Messrs. Heywood and Bennett there. So of Mrs. Underwood and the Index, notwithstanding their vehement disclaimers against all sympathizers with the outraged victims of this insane attempt to put down Freethought by law. Recollect, "the intent of the author," declares the United States court, through his honor, Judge Clarke, has nothing to do with his guilt or innocence. And yet you say, "The government has not 'thrust' any question upon our attention."

You might as well tell us that the government did not thrust any question upon our attention by the passage of the Fugitive Slave law, because the United States courts decided that law constitutional; and because by giving "aid and comfort" to the victims of the lash the Abolitionists "defied the government to prosecute" them. They, too, "knew the penalty and took the risk." But the government that legislates against certain and unspecified practices of the people, and leaves the catalogue of those practices to be made up by each and every court under its jurisdiction as the cases are brought before it, and as the passions and prejudices of each may decide, as effectually robs the people of the rights of freemen as it could do were it to sell the nation to the Czar of the Russias. And this is precisely what our government has done in the matter of "indecent pulications." It has forbidden us to send indecent publications through the mails, but it has failed or refused to tell us what is and what is not indecent in literature. We hav not even a common standard by which to measure and distinguish such as may and such as may not be sent, while there are vast multitudes concerning the decency and indecency of which opinions may and do honestly differ. Without a commen standard and without a definition of the "obscene or indecent" to which the law is intended to apply, the dicision of the court is simply an expression of the private opinion of the man; and the government that authorizes its agents to drag men and women to prison for disregard of such private opinion is sowing the wind and must expect to reep the whirlwind in due time.

Surely you load "the people's teachers" with a frightful responsibility. They "alone hav it in their power to pollute or purify the mental and moral fountain from which the republic draws life." As if the people hav no wisdom of their own, nor any mother wit with which to measure the ideas presented them. Alas! poor things! What right hav they to choose their own teachers, or to select their own studies? "The Consensus of the Competent," and the "keepers of the fountain of public purity," "these and these alone hav it in their power to pollute or purify." Strange, however, is it not, that "the fountain of public" purity" should hav been committed to the keeping of persons who are proverbial for lives of impurity?

Permit me to ask if you intentionally indorse Mr. Heywood's gravest charge against our present marriage system? Mr. Heywood charges that it is a deadly enemy to the natural relation of the sexes. You make no effort to show us that this is an error, but, if I understand your language, you advance and maintain the same theory. Surely this ought not to be. Granting that the charge is true, however, can we hope that a human institution may thus defy nature with impunity? It is a fact, well recognized in scientific research, that, if we would work successfully for the accomplishment of a given purpose, we must work in harmony with, and not in opposition to, nature and her laws.

I by no means accept your definition of "the natural relation of the sexes" in its highest and purest sense; and I challenge you to prove it correct. Is it not enough that they who believe in "salvation by grace" should thus revile nature for her methods in this her holiest of all temples, and at the fountain of her richest life.

You say I am "indignant." I grant it. I am indignant that a journal professing to hold fraud in abhorrence should attempt to palm off upon those less favored with opportunities for judging correctly the portrait it has drawn for us—and apparently so much admires—as that of a true woman, or rather that of a guiltless young girl. By doing so, however, it either confesses itself unacquainted with true womanhood, or it offers an unblushing insult to every true and pure woman among its readers.

I wish it distinctly understood that I do not judge that woman as the Journal represents. That I hav judged the portraits presented us by the Journal I am ready to admit. And the woman who does not scorn the slanderous insinuation it involves against the character of her sex can hav little conception of the moral turpitude it implies.

I am not discussing persons, except in so far as they represent measures and principles; and, hence, I hav not the slightest care to contradict your charge of "defection," on my part, "from the good of the social relation," whatever that may mean—an expression, let me add, which in itself goes far towards discovering the want on the part of its author of a clear understanding of the important questions at issue.

Sincerely, etc., ELIZABETH M. F. DENTON.

P. S.—Since writing the above I hav seen Mr. Denton for a short time only. He is quite too much occupied with other matters to write you at present, and he therefore wishes me to say that the idea conveyed by your statement concerning his refusal "to speak on a platform that welcomed Freelovers" is a mistaken one. He did refuse, some years since, to speak on a platform that welcomed Freelovers, it is true—not because the persons were Freelovers, however, but because certain of those welcomed were, he was assured, guilty of flagrantly immoral and unjust practices. With sincerest regret that the R.-P. Journal should hav assumed its present attitude in regard to this whole matter, I again subscribe myself, Sincerely yours, etc., E. M. F. D.

A Snub Given to a S

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In the National Reformer of London, dated December the 7th, is the following answer in the column devoted "to Correspondents: "F. E. Abbot, Boston. We hav your letter marked 'strictly private and confidential.' We are precluded by your indorsement from printing it, and we hav no wish to write to you privately now on a matter in which you first addressed us publicly, and without any private intimations."

The reader of this paper may remember that editor Abbot requested editor Bradlaugh to exchange papers; that after the Index ceased to be sent Mr. Abbot published an open letter to Mr. Bradlaugh, which he must hav known Mr. Bradlaugh would not see unless some friend would send him the paper. A friend did send him the Index; and now Mr. Abbot addresses Mr. Bradlaugh privately and confidentially on the same subject—the Bennett, Rawson, and Wright imbroglio,

For so small a man in stature we seldom meet with so great a man in arrogance and presumption as Mr. Abbot is. No pope ever sat on his spiritual throne who was more of a despot. When his jealousy of Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER led him to sympathize with Comstock he immediately mounted his high horse, and determined to ride down all opposition to his supreme will. He nominated himself for re-election as president of the League, laid down his platform, nominated also his associates, and then assailed the action of the League. When the members saw fit to vote for Elizur Wright, Mr. Abbot, instead of gracefully submitting to the will of the majority, went off with old Judge Hurlbut at his heels into a secession, and has shown ever since that his ambition is to rule or ruin the League. As he cannot rule, he is determined, if he can, to ruin. Like the jackal which scents putrefying corpses in the grave, and likes the smell, he digs up old scores and endeavors to turn them to account against the men who had the audacity to question his right to rule. And he does this with a remorselessness which reminds us of the bloody days of church persecution. Does any one imagine that if the League at Syracuse had unanimously re-elected Mr. Abbot as president, and voted for his half-way measures in the matter of the Comstock laws, he would ever hav raked the records against Bennett and Rawson? Not a bit of it. He has given overwhelming proof that his main object in getting up the Liberal League was to form a society in which he should be the chief man whose will should be law to all his admiring followers.

But, judging from the complexion of the Index, which seems now to hav gone back to the work of perfecting human nature by the instrumentality of Free Religion, Mr. Abbott has learned that neither he by his treason to the cause, nor Bennett and Rawson by their unfortunate blunders, nor the death or defection of any hundred of our leading men can do anything more than temporarily hinder the cause of Freethought. The deliverance of mankind from the yoke of superstition is the mission of science, not theological controversy. Controversy begins its fight at the top of the great temple of superstition, and has been at it for ages; but science, with its corps of sappers and miners, silently and surely, by its underground work, lets down the whole fabric into promiscuous ruin. Hence, the church, in contemplating the present and the future, is more discouraged than she has ever been. By the popularization of science the men in the pews say to the men in the pulpit: "Sirs, what you teach us about God and man is not true. It is false, proved to be so by facts indubitable. Nothing good can ever come of falsehood, and therefore we bid you a final farewell, and worship henceforth in the temple of nature." By the principle of co-operation we can all help, more or less, in advancing the interests of the Freethought movement, but the idea is ridiculous that we can stop it—that we can roll back the Niagara upon the waters of Lake Erie. Then, let us drop a tear over the defection of the Index and its editor, as our Revolutionary fathers did over the treason of Arnold, and shoulder arms for further strife. The R.-P. Journal, of Chicago, is already crying, "Help me, Cassius, or I sink;" and the Index, having its finger knocked off, retires from the battle-field, and devotes itself henceforth to the work of realizing the theory of the perfectibility of human nature. We must go on simplifying knowledge and scattering it on the wings of every wind, so that it may be borne into and bless every man's habitation. FAIR PLAY.

P. S.—During George Holyoake's visit to this country, Mr. Abbot seems to hav thought that he could flatter him into a coalescence with the Boston clique of Simon Pures; and, without much doubt, his "strictly private and confidential" letter to Mr. Bradlaugh was an attempt to do the same thing with him, else why discuss secretly a subject on which he had written an "open letter?" What was the secret fact he wished to communicate the knowledge of to Mr. Bradlaugh? or what the secret plan that he wished him to assist in carrying out? Of course the receiver of the letter is too honorable a man to do as Abbot and Bundy did in publishing to the world, without leave of the writer, letters that, in their very nature, were "strictly private and confidential;" but we are at liberty to put this to that, and opine what Mr. Abbot's letter contained or proposed.

But Mr. Bradlaugh cannot be induced by flattery or frowns to impeach the decency of one hundred and fifty Leagues, composed of intelligent American citizens, and their loyalty to the cause of Freethought, in order to propitiate reform and bask in the smiles of a little squad of eight Leagues, of which Mr. Abbot is the corporal, and at the head of which he proposed, at Syracuse, to march over "all America," conquering and to conquer. Mr. Bradlaugh understands that all this prudish zeal against "Freelove," whether in England or this country, is a puritanical sham and pretense; and we know that during Mr. Abbot's most death-like fainting fits over the impurity of the "pirates" whom he charged with boarding his craft at Syracuse, he was publishing articles in the Index which were written by notorious Freelovers, not only in theory but practice. This zeal is of the same character as Comstock's piety and chastity, which allowed him to bribe a fallen woman in Greene street to expose her naked person, and to gaze upon her for an hour, not with the admiration of an artist at the beauty of the divine handiwork, but to feed his lecherous imagination, and then carry her off to prison. ## The Bible Proved to Be a Book of Science.

BY BROTHER SMITH, OF THE M. E. CHURCH.

MY BELOVED SISTERS AND BROTHERS: Inasmuch as our beloved preacher has not arrived, owing to causes best known to himself and the Lord, I concluded to talk to you myself. As I see some of the members of the school board present, for their benefit I'll select a text from God's everlasting truth touching upon the subject of astronomy, so that you may know that as a book of science the Holy Bible is unsurpassed by any other book in our public school, the Infidel Babcock to the contrary notwithstanding.

"And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth" (Rev. xii, 4). This text, my beloved, am a very important text, and well calculated to teach an important lesson. Some of the school books on the subject of 'stronomy says the stars am biger'n this world and that they am millions of miles apart. Glory to God! brethren, for this confession, for, if true, it only teaches us how great and glorious am God's works. For in order to drag so many stars an' knock 'em out of heaven that tail would hav had to be ten millions of miles in length an' about forty-two thousand miles through at the butt. Only think, sisters, ah, an' brethren, ah, how glorious, ah, grand, an' magnificent must be the sight of such a tail, ah, wagging gently to an' fro in God's kingdom, with a flag a thousand miles long tied to the little end, on which could be read in letters of gold "Hosanna to the Most High," an' every motion keeping time to the tune that's playin' on the harp of a thousand strings, ah!

Let us thank our school board for their wisdom in taking the book which teaches this important lesson that to-day we hav one-third less stars in heaven than there were before they were dragged to the earth by the tail of the great heavenly dragon. The text says, "And his tail drew the third part of the stars of heaven and did cast them to the earth," and the third verse says that he had "ten horns and seven heads," ah. An' I suppose that the heads an' horns was strung along "the tail so as to enable him to see the end of his great tail," an' when he hooked each horn into a star he dragged 'em to the earth, ah. God didn't furnish the great red dragon with a telescope so he could see his tail, ah, but the Good Book tells us that he furnished him with seven heads which enabled him to see what his tail was a doing, an' I tell you, brethren, that when he struck at a star it had to start for the earth, ah. O ye fools! why will you spend your hard-earned money to go to the circus and shows whose best animal's tail is but as a grain of sand on the sea-shore in comparison to the tails that are in heaven, ah? Save your money an' put it in the hat for the support of the gospel, ah, for of such is the kingdom of heaven an' the teaching of this important lesson upon the subject of 'stronomy, ah. Again, let's thank the school board of St. Johns for keeping the Bible—a book that can never lie—in our school, ah. An' may we all, brothers and sisters, finally reach that happy land, where, free of charge, we can feast our eyes on the big things that are in heaven. Bro. Jones will pass the hat. Amen.

Col. Robert G. Ingersoll at Columbus, Ohio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: While the memory of Col. Ingersoll's lecture at Columbus, on December 19th, is still fresh I will giv you as much of it as I can, but of course it must be at second hand.

Some ten days ago the country around Columbus was greatly worked up over the coming of General Grant. At present I am some fifteen miles from Columbus, and through this place there ran an excursion train, carrying off the surplus of our population to see that personage. The gathering upon that occasion was very large, 'tis true, but, let me ask, what was it for? Can any one of the many who went dissect that noisy reception, and, upon a serious reflection, feel other than disgusted with himself when he thinks of the utter vanity of all such man-worship? I would like to say more upon this subject, but must make my application of its use and proceed to the lecture.

I did not attend the Grant reception, for reasons I considered excellent; but Colonel Ingersoll was coming, with the announcement that he would lecture, and though there was no excursion train to carry with ease and return with convenience, I resolved at once to attend, as I had never had the good fortune to hear him. I believed there was something of use to be gotten there, sufficient even to overcome the obstacle of waiting till after midnight at a distant depot and coming home on a coal train, which would consume most of the night.

At eight o'clock of the aforesaid evening Comstock's Opera House was pretty well filled. The Colonel appeared upon the stage, welcomed with applause from the audience, and began at once upon his subject, which was "Hell."

He began by saying that if there was such a place of everlasting torment for the damned, provided by God, it was nothing more than justice to expect that the founder of that place should hav notified his people who were liable to terminate this existence with an introduction into that country; and it was no more than was due from him that he should tell his people how they could avoid it.

It was the right of his people, and his duty towards them. He then said that instead of such an understanding between God and his people, there nowhere appeared in the Old Testament any such revelation from God. When the first pair was created they were simply told that they should surely die at the moment they ate of the fruit. Not a word about any hell; and Mr. Adam, from all accounts, was totally ignorant of the existence of any such place. After a while Cain killed his brother, and not a breath about hell. After a while God gets sick of the man and woman business, and drowns all save eight from the face of the earth, and still nothing about hell. Now he starts again, and I hav always thought, said Colonel Ingersoll, it would hav been better to hav started right from this point in the first place. It would hav saved countless lives, and hav dispensed with an infamous act on the part of God Almighty.

He then took up the New Testament, and said there is the place we find out about hell. He discoursed at length upon what that part of the Bible said in reference to it, and then took up the vicarious atonement, which he handled with such skill and unanswerable logic that it brought conviction of the truth of his statements to the breast of every hearer, if the responses by way of applause can be relied upon as any proof. He dwelt upon the Christian requisites as passports to that delightful heaven, and portrayed in indescribable power what infamous wretches could locate in heaven by taking advantage of the bankruptcy court of heaven, and what noble, self-sacrificing beings should go to hell if they died without complying with the Christian scheme of salvation. He drew the picture of a man in the hot, parching sands of the desert, overcome, exhausted, when, with lips cracked and swollen, tongue protruding from his mouth, dying for water, along comes another man, who, having a few drops of water in his canteen, and knowing it may be death to part with it, yet heroically pours it down the throat of the famished man, who thereupon revives, pushes onward, reaches an oasis, where he drinks till renewed strength can carry him home to his wife and family. Afterwards he accepts the scheme of salvation, and with his wife lands safely in the land of harps and engages in that business. But the poor fellow who gave the water puts himself in the shoes of the dying man, and by his noble, unselfish conduct dies unconnected with any church, and goes to hell. By and by, when all concerned in this tragedy are gone from the earth, the man who was so saved takes his wife and walks over to hell and says to her, "Do you see that thin, vapory spirit over there?" "Yes," she says. "Well," says he, "that's the fellow that gave me the water on the desert. If he hadn't done that I never could hav lived to be baptized and through that means reach heaven and enjoy its happiness and blessings." Do you think, said Colonel Ingersoll, that such a heartless wretch can take precedence over the noble hero who gave his life to save the dying man's? Could you be happy, be contented, in heaven, with father, mother, brother, sister, wife, or child in a place of endless torment? I denounce such a doctrine and the gods who instituted it as infamous and damnable.

No matter, continued the speaker, how much misery or harm any one does, by the Christian method, if you get in at quarter to twelve—in the eleventh hour—you are saved.

He defined what a sin was; that it was something done that decreased the sum of human happiness, that injured another; then he showed most clearly how impossible it is for any human to sin against the infinite creator for the reason that he could not affect him, and he said, Suppose a god should create a man and women and tell them, when he had endowed them with every quality of health and excellence, that they could hav just such children as they wanted, and thereupon the created one would proceed to bring two or three idiots into the world, then the same number of rascals, and some drunken wretches, and finally one smart fellow. What, he said, would you think of such people? And this is, according to the Christian faith, just what the orthodox God is doing to-day. Continued the speaker, Why don't he quit turning out such jobs? And again, those who stood the best chance to get into heaven were those who did not hav sense enough to know that there was any such means of saving souls, and this class embraced all the idiots. Next to this came the heathen. To know anything of the Bible and reject it was certain and everlasting hell. He said that the character of the tenants of heaven were usually such as were very questionable while here on earth; that if a man was accused of a murder he was arrested, and if found guity, was convicted and sentenced to explate his crime by death; next he endeavored to procure a new trial; that overruled, he made application to the governor for a pardon; that denied, he never failed to get religion and be sure of going straight to heaven. The speaker illustrated this by giving an account of a murder, where the convicted man was sentenced to die, and followed out the foregoing order. The murderer was hung in San Francisco while he was there, and had taken the life of a girl in the most brutal manner. On the day of his execution he said he was so happy, he was going right to heaven, he was happy in Christ, and he only regretted that the sweet form he had slain died without religion and had to go to hell. This, he said, was the pattern of a man that went to heaven; and for himself, if the Christian doctrine is true, he chose to go to hell where he would find decent society and some sympathy and humanity.

A short time since a young man who had just been converted came to him and made an effort to turn him from his wicked ways, and, said the speaker, young converts are like bumblebees, always largest when they are just hatched. He asked the young man this question, If your mother should die without the church do you think she would go to hell? Yes, said he. Now do you think you could be happy in heaven and your mother in hell? He made answer by saying that God knew best, and if that was the case he could be happy. He said he was astonished at the declaration, and for himself he had but to say that if his wife and children should go to hell that is where he wanted to be, right by their side. They had made him happy here, and he loved them too much to be happy in heaven with them in hell. He said further, that he had always noticed that those who had the most selfish, contemptible souls made the biggest fuss about having them saved.

Another strange thing about it all was that God could grant no pardon for offenses after death; it was all put into the hands of his priests on earth to attend to for him. And if it was all true, and only the good Christians got to heaven, it would be one of the most thinly settled countries eyes were ever cast upon.

He said that he had been asked by overzealous persons if he pretended to know more than the scores of dead men who had given their lives and exertions to the study of the Bible and had died in the faith. Certainly, said he, I know more than they, for I hav had their lives and researches to look at, as well as a riper age to liv in, and I should know more. This he styled the argument of the cemetery, and said also that if a man is to be taken for authority on religion he ought also to be authority in other matters, and answered those persons who produced the argument of the cemetery by declaring such to be the case, and adduced Lord Bacon as an example who was approved by the Christians in religious matters, where he was considered as authority; but, said he, Lord Bacon did not believe in the Copernican system of astronomy and a lot of that. He wanted a man who was nearer to the truth in other matters to be any guide in religion for him.

To hear those talk of hell who pretended to know all about the place, Col. Ingersoll said he had never yet heard any one admit that any of their own folks had gone there; it had always been some one that was not of their immediate family. The first he ever heard of going there was Swedenborg, and the report of his going there was very gratifying, for he said the first person he there met with was John Calvin, and he (the speaker) had always felt obliged to Swedenborg for the information.

His comparison of John Wesley and Thomas Paine was such a panegyric of the latter that the audience took it from his lips in a loud burst of applause, which increased in volume under the catching enthusiasm of the moment, till the building fairly shook with the approbation of the audience. The feeling to right the traduced character of one who so nobly labored for his fellow-men was then shown to be awaking and but for whom, and other worthy names equally execrated under Protestant misrule, our eloquent champion would fare as they did, instead of being worn in the hearts of many true men and women, as liberty is proud to acknowledge. John Wesley, said the speaker, wrote against the independence of the American colonies; Thomas Paine wrote for it.

Col. Ingersoll alluded to the inconsistency of orthodox people, and referred to the late civil war as an instance, saying that Christians were sure of going to heaven when they died, and of course the sooner they died the sooner they reached the shining shore; but instead of periling their lives in battles, when the draft came on those that could procured substitutes and, too, without even ascertaining whether said substitute was a professor of religion, when at the same time believing that if he was not, and was shot, he would surely go to hell.

He claimed that this was the dawning of the age of reformation, that it would supersede the expiring one of worthless Christianity; that the time was fast approaching when prisons and penitentiaries would be done away with on earth, but that, according to the Christian theology, God was to hav a penitentiary up there where the convicts were to wear the stripes of hell. He spoke earnestly upon the the good that was to supplant the existing bad. He emphatically said that but for the hypocrites in the church he would not be allowed to speak as he does.

He closed with a thrilling appeal to the audience never to giv, in any way, a dollar for the support of such infamous doctrines as are taught and preached from the pulpit.

This is but a poor and meager report of his lecture, as anything on paper, however well reported, that comes from him must be like viewing the dead body after the spirit has flown, but a faint conception can be had from this which is necessarily brief. He was frequently and loudly applauded, which showed the audience was in full sympathy with him, and encourages all lovers of truth and haters of lies and enslavers of conscience. Yours, etc., Homespun.

A Good Word for a Good Doctor.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Will you kindly allow me a little of the precious and valuable space in our dear Truth Seeker in which to say to thy readers that as we hav in the Liberal ranks some excellent physicians for the diseases of the body, as well as those of the mind, it is our duty, as it should be our pleasure, to, as far as practicable, patronize these friends of universal liberty and progressive thought in preference to employing the "old-time," bigoted, fogyish class of "regulars" who remain in the same old ruts year after year and are just as much opposed to individual, independent thinkers in the science of medicine as in the school of theology, and then work against all innovators upon their "time-honored institution" just as bitterly, persistently, and spitefully as do the priesthood against the teachers of real facts and exposers of supernatural delusions?

Do you for a moment suppose that Dr. Foote would hav been Comstocked had he been one of the regular school of medicine, any more than Bennett would hav been penitentiaried had he been a doctor of divinity and mailed "Cupid's Yokes?"

I hav been led to make these remarks in view of bringing more closely to your attention the merits and claims of Dr. R. P. Fellows, whom I believe to be an honest, conscientious, pains-taking physician, and who is probably as well skilled in the truly benevolent art of making sick folks well as any other medical doctor in the country.

Mr. Slenker has been under his care for some months—is being treated by him for partial deafness and chronic catarrh, both of which infirmities seem gradually yielding to the doctor's remedies, and we hope in time a permanent cure will be effected. But in bodily ailments, as well as mental crookedness, if the disease is of long standing, the cure must naturally require longer time to perfect itself.

There is no warmer friend to progress and mental freedom among all the readers of our beloved Truth Seeker than Dr. Fellows, or one who is a greater admirer of those who speak bold, brave, earnest words for truth and human rights.

A sound mind in a healthy body is one of the most desirable of all the goods of life, and if you are afflicted with any of the thousand ills flesh is heir to, I hope yon will, one and all, giv our Liberal friend an opportunity to make you whole again—to render the physical casket a fit receptacle for the jewel of the mind, which is the all that makes us what we are, and renders us worthy of the love, admiration, and respect of our kind. Respectfully, Elmina D. Slenker.

Snowville, Va., Nov. 30, 1879.

Queries.

To The Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Will you tolerate my queries? If so, and I deem you a real Liberal and an unselfish friend to Mr. Bennett and a humanitarian in the best sense of the word, then I answer that Jesus Christ was an Essene; that there were three sects in religion among the Jews at the time of Jesus—the Pharisees, the Saducees, and the Essenes. The Essenes had existed as a sect for about three hundred years. Their sect was a commune, a community. They lived all in common, hence the words, "take no thought for the morrow." They cared for each other. Their faith, that the word would become flesh, is a correct doctrine according to "hereditary descent." One Joshua (Jesus) was born to them imbued with all their peculiar doctrine of faith. His influence was so great that all was lost in him, as were the disciples in Alexander Campbell. The Essenes became Christians, and the Christians became Roman Catholics. They destroyed the sciences and brought on the dark ages.

Your communicator wishes to say to all Liberals and all investigators after truth, that he thinks that more convincing knowledge of the past history of the Jewish and all other religions may be derived from Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors" and his "Bible of Bibles" than all other books.

Who was Kersey Graves? He was born in the society of Friends, as Jesus was in the society of Essenes, and he was trained to be a Quaker preacher in that sect that never persecuted. But instead, he became a discerner of human character and one of the most convincing writers on oriental history extant. His wife was a relative of the immortal Lincoln's Secretary of War, Stanton, and she is his able helpmate in his noble historic writings. Their address is Richmond, Ind., and D. M. Bennett's printing house has their grand works on sale. T. S. Andrews, M.D.

The Bible and Education

Is the title of an attack on Freethinkers in a Kansas paper, and purports to be a review and refutation of former attacks in the same paper on the Bible. We hav rarely seen more sophistry, false statements, and prejudice done up in so small a package as in this article, which we are assured was written by a minister. He claims that the Bible is the very embodiment of morality, that is, social purity and inspired refinement. He quotes several authors to the effect that the Bible is the book of all books for children to study in schools in order to become possessed of pure morals. It may be so. It may be that children can read accounts of rapes and adulteries, stories of men gaining heaven by lying and stealing, and avoiding hell by murdering babes and butchering animals, but it seems to us that if what they read has any effect on youthful minds, it must be directly contrary to the interests of morality, honesty, and kindness. We are not so old that we forget the effect Bible reading had upon us in school. Carefully did the teacher skip these parts, and try to confine the scholars to the New Testament, which is the cleanest part, but without success. They wanted to know what "an eunuch" was, and queried what "knowing her not" could mean. The New Testament introduced the boys to the "harlot" and the girls to the "whoremongers." "Take a little wine for thy stomach's sake" has been quoted by boys in justification of their youthful sprees.

When the lessons were learned, how often hav we seen the Bible picked up and, hid behind an atlas stood on end, perused by the scholars. Investigation used to catch them reading the tabooed parts, rendered attractive by the very fact that they were forbidden to read them. Had they not been forbidden, had they been explained as the crude records of a barbarous people, they would hav turned from them as uninteresting. But the secrecy and the filth combined were very powerful attractions to inquisitive youth.

This minister speaks of Ingersoll's writings as but the "rehash of the vile, abusive language of Thomas Paine which all scholarly, decent skeptics hav discarded long ago." That shows how carefully the man of God has read Ingersoll, and how much he knows about Paine. There is not in the language more brilliant, witty, original sayings than these found in the speeches and writings of Col. R. G. Ingersoll; and the man who says they are a rehash of any body, even of so good a writer as Paine, simply shows his own ignorance. But calling Paine's "Age of Reason" vile and abusive does not lessen the force of his argument. Every one who has read them knows they are neither vile, nor abusive, and every unprejudiced person must admit their unanswerable logic. Paine was plain but never vile, and his works are more eagerly read now than at any previous time since he wrote them. The minister uses the old and oft exploded story that Franklin tried to dissuade Paine from pulishing his "Age of Reason." There is a letter in Spark's "Life of Franklin" on which this assertion is based, but there is one thing which would go to show that if Franklin ever wrote it it must hav been about some other book and to some other man. Paine's "Age of Reason" was published in 1795, Franklin died in 1790. Paine had not finished the first part more than a few hours before he was thrown into a French prison. As Franklin had been dead several years before the first part of the "Age of Reason" was finished it can hardly be probable that Franklin read the manuscript. If he did not, and we hav shown that he could not, the sentence "I read your manuscript with attention," must hav been written about some other book and the letter to some other person. It is not beyond the range of possibilities that this letter was a forgery. Its author may hav been like Grant Thorburn, a literary thief. Thorburn was one of those on whom the N. Y. Observer relied to prove that Paine died "like a beast," and whom James Parton detected in copying and trying to pass as his own an article from a newspaper. Perhaps some latter-day Eusebius insinuated his handiwork into Spark's "Life of Franklin." It is hardly likely that Franklin would labor to prevent the publication of the "Age of Reason" when he was a disbeliever in the inspiration of the scriptures and a skeptic in regard to Christianity.

The minister quotes several other persons upon the value of the Bible; but as he givs no references to where these speeches can be found, we must conclude that he would not like to hav us inquire too closely into these little matters. "If the glory of God hath more abounded through my lie, why am I also judged a sinner?" or words to that effect.

Our Christian friend observes that the writers to whom he is replying "hav charged upon Christianity and the church all the sins and evils of fallen, wicked men, as though that were the cause, instead of being as it is, the restraining influence, morally and religiously, when accepted and practiced, the removal of the cause."

This is refreshing. We hav not seen what it is these very terrible writers hav charged the church with doing, and Christianity as being the cause, but we venture to assert that the church has committed more murders in the name of God than any other system of religion—and some of them hav killed a few—or than hav perished in any war waged by temporal rulers. And we furthermore say that Christianity has been the cause, and that the Bible has been the book from which they justified themselves. The more truly men hav believed in the Bible, the more they hav persecuted. Torquemada was a very zealous Christian; Henry the Eighth attended church regularly; Philip the Second said his prayers with great unction; Charles the Fifth went to mass several more times a year than was absolutely indispensable to save his soul; John Calvin, Matthew Hopkins, and all the other Christian worthies who hav stained the leaves of history with their bloody deeds, were very jealous in matters connected with their souls. And why should not zealous Christians persecute when the founder of the system—whom this man would hav us believe was the "purest among the mighty; the mightiest among the pure"—says distinctly, "If any man come to me, and hate not his father, and mother, and wife, and children, and brethren, and sisters, yea, and his own life also, he cannot be my disciple?" Would they not be justified to "fulfill the scripture," which says, "He that believeth not shall be damned," in resorting to almost every device to save souls; that is, if they really believed Christ meant what he said? If they did not believe him, they would hardly take the trouble to build inquisitions, with all their soul-saving appliances, to make heretics say they believed what they themselves doubted.

We could fill pages of THE TRUTH SEEKER with Bible obscenity. Four volumes as large as the New York City Directory could be filled with the lists of people the church has murdered. The accounts of the adulteries and crimes of the churchmen would take weeks to enumerate. And we do not see why they should not if they believe that God and his chosen people are examples to be followed. We find all these crimes committed by the Lord's favorites and by his command. We find in the Bible incidents that to us appear obscene and unfit to be placed before school children or before the "children of a larger growth." We should not commend our sons to follow the example of Absalom, nor our daughters that of Potiphar's wife. Confucius was a little purer than David; and by the side of Solomon Socrates does not show to disadvantage. Lot's daughters are not paragons of virtue, and the old man himself would be called a beast in these times. Abraham and Jephthah had a counterpart in Freeman, but he is in jail charged with being a lunatic and a murderer. To say, as this man does, that "the Bible is the best of books, and Christ is the best of men," is putting it very strong. The Bible is both voluptuous and vulgar, and some of Christ's precepts are far from perfect. "Take no thought for the morrow" is not the best way to get along in this world; and if you hav got to hate all your relations, including your wife, to be his disciple, we shall not follow him into his neighbor's cornfield.

Our remarkably fair friend says that the Freethinkers denounce the Bible in toto without knowing what it approves or disapproves. We disagree with him. We think Freethinkers know fully as much about the Bible as Christians. Their opposition to it is founded on knowledge of its contents and teachings. It approves of slavery, and the Infidels of the world are certainly opposed to that. It commands, as we hav said, all varieties of crime, and Freethinkers are universally opposed to state-prison morals.

The Bible is as familiar to Liberals in general as any other historical book, and is regarded by them in precisely the same light. They see its errors and its beauties; they acknowledge the good and denounce the bad. Were it not held up as a revelation from a divine being they would find no fault with it. It would simply be accepted as an imperfect chronicle of a barbarous people, and would be regarded as any other historical work. If a book is set up as perfect it must be above criticism. That the Bible is not is tolerably fair evidence in itself that it is not a perfect work from a perfect being. When such men as the writer of the article referred to will admit that the Bible is the work of men, imperfect and fallible, we think Freethinkers will be the first to not only recognize whatever of merit it may contain, but to excuse the faults which now so prominently obtrude themselves upon even a casual reader. The Bible may hav its place, but it is certainly not in the public schools. It takes a mature mind to withstand the temptations held out in its pages.

Col. Ingersoll to Lecture in Rochester.

The Opera House, Rochester, N. Y., has been secured for the evening of the 16th, when Colonel Ingersoll will deliver his famous lecture on "Human Rights." The lecture cannot be told too often nor to too many people.

Liberal Club Lectures.

Henry Appleton occupied the platform of the Manhattan Liberal Club on Friday evening, Jan. 2d. His subject was, "The True Inwardness of the Land Question in Ireland."

Mr. Appleton, in his usual earnest and thorough style, sifted the nature of property itself, depicted the scandalous abuses of landlordism in Ireland, and then went into an analysis of the various systems in vogue among reformers to get at better social conditions. He maintained that until the Socialists eliminated the idea of profits, as now understood, their efforts simply contemplated multiplying the number of thieves without stamping out the theft involved in usury.

This called forth very stirring criticisms at the close of his lecture; and on the whole the audience enjoyed, as the Methodists would say, "a very refreshing season."

His Lectureship and the League.

Joe Cook would be funny if he were not malicious. His statements in regard to Liberalism are the best specimens of falsification we hav seen. He says he reads the Liberal papers, and so he must be informed upon subjects about which he lies with unblushing brazenness. Most ministers really are ignorant of what the League is or proposes to do, but Cook is not entitled to even so much charity as we would allow the little ministers who do not know any better. His latest tirade upon the League and Mr. Bennett is too rich to keep. He has evidently drawn his facts from the very fountain-head of purity, otherwise known as the Index—to the liars' paradise. We take it from the Boston Advertiser:

Mr. Cook returned to the Old South church yesterday noon and took with him, notwithstanding the storm, a large audience, composed mostly of men. The subject of his prelude was, "Is American Infidelity Liberalism or Libertinism?" A cool recital of facts, he said, authenticated by official documents, is all that is needed now to run a red-hot, zigzag thunderbolt through American Infidelity.

1. On May 31, 1873, a committee of Congress, in reply to a petition from R. G. Ingersoll and others for the repeal of certain of the national postal laws, used this language: "In the opinion of your committee, the post-office was not established to carry instruments of vice or obscene writings, indecent pictures, or lewd books."

2. The indisputable historical authority of this document, containing R. G. Ingersoll's name, shows that he and others asked for free mails, and what was meant by this request in the opinion of a congressional committee, and why that request was not granted by Congress.

3. The same fathomless infamous request which this congressional document holds up to public execration was made by a majority of the Infidel Liberal Leagues at a meeting in Syracuse in 1878.

4. A minority of the Leagues seceded from that convention because of the infamy of this demand, and hav since denounced with vigor the majority as representatives of libertinism rather than Liberalism.

5. Notwithstanding this secession and denunciation, the majority of the Infidel Liberal Leagues, in a convention at Cincinnati, in September, 1879, renewed their demand of 1878 concerning the repeal of certain national postal laws.

6 A convicted cancer planter, now in Albany Penitentiary for the violation of these laws, was made the hero of this convention and the object of a resolution of defense and sympathy, offered by R. G. Ingersoll, and declaring that he committed "no offense whatever against any law of this country."

7. On account of the refusal of the President of the United States to pardon out of the penitentiary this convicted poisoner of youth, R. G. Ingersoll has left the Republican party, and the Cincinnati Convention of Infidel Liberal Leagues has resolved to cast its political influence only in favor of candidates of its own principles as to the secularization of the government.

8. The secretary of the Cincinnati Infidel Convention and of the Infidel political party has been shown by legal documents as quoted in a Boston Infidel paper (see the Index for Oct. 30, 1879), to be a convicted bigamist. The felon in the Albany Penitentiary has been exposed by the same paper, and by the R.-P. Journal, of Chicago, as guilty of enormous social crimes, and the cancer planter has himself confessed the authorship of certain infamous letters which hav been published to establish his guilt.

9. In spite of these scathing exposures of the character of its chief hero and of its secretary, the party represented by the majority of Infidel Leagues continues to uphold both these men, and to emphasize its demand for the repeal of certain measurelessly important postal laws of the nation.

10. The minority is the unimpeachable witness against the majority of American Infidels.

11. The organization of the minority, however, has in it many officers who are also officers of the organization of the majority.

12. The minority contains only eight auxiliary leagues, the majority 117.

13. It is evidence, therefore, that American Infidelity, as a mass, means not so much Liberalism as libertinism.

On this table I hav a mass of knotted adders; that is, Infidel newspapers; defending the poisoners of youth, and, without naming any of those sheets, I propose to show you a few of the fangs of the vipers. Here I pull out of the knotted mass an adder born in Boston, and it contains the resolutions of the Cincinnati Convention. I solemnly believe that it is the purpose of the framers of these resolutions, and of those who demand the repeal of the present postal laws, to cheat the public, if they can, by pretending to be against the distribution of infamous publications through the mails. It is a very curious fact that only Infidels in this country should complain against these restrictive laws and that nobody is pinched by them except Infidels and some Free Religionists who sympathize with the Syracuse and Cincinnati Conventions. Here is a resolution which declares that they are in favor of such postal laws as will allow the free distribution of irreligious news through the mails, and of the repeal of the restrictive laws. This calls for something in the way of legislation. But this other resolution is merely the expression of opinion. It does not say they are in favor of any laws against the dissemination of obscene literature. We are utterly opposed to the dissemination through the mails of such literature, they say; but are you in favor of any laws to prevent the dissemination through the mail of such literature? If you are you don't say so. The first resolution is a glittering stiletto, the second is a silken handkerchief, in the folds of which the murderous weapon is partially concealed.

I claim that the second resolution has an enormous and most significant omission in it. It does not call for any laws whatever against the dissemination of infamous matter through the mails, while the first resolution does call for the repeal of such laws. I profess to be utterly candid in this matter. I hav been long enough before the enemy to know that I must not go into the battle with a broken sword and spear if I mean to giv hard blows as I certainly do. If anything was necessary to rouse me to a white heat on this subject it occurred when in the New York courthouse I saw O. B. Frothingham and Alexander Davis seated cheek by jowl with D. M. Bennett [Hisses]. Who hisses there? Is there a friend here of the Albany felon? If so let him contradict me. Speak out. The Old South has had interruptions before to-day. We hav had stormy meetings here, and we will hav them again if American law is not honored. But the head of this viperous Liberalistic body is under the heel, of what? Of the majority of cultured Infidels in the United States. Do I think there is weight enough in that heel to crush the head of the viper? An editor who set the dragon's teeth has endeavored to draw under his wing the Liberal Leagues which hav sprung from his instructions. I lift up his paper (the Index) and find a list of eight such Leagues. But when I turn to the stripes of this adder, I find a whole column in fine print taken up with the names of 117 towns where the auxiliary Leagues, representing the majority of Infidels in this country, hav their seats. You ask me what the church can do—what honest men can effect in opposition to this subterranean conspiracy of the black angels in American civilization. A petition was circulated in New England, and it received the signatures of most of our sound public men against the pardon of this felon in the Albany Penitentiary. There is in New York city, there is in this city, a society for the detection of vice; and single-handed, alone, the secretary of that society is fighting the ghouls and ogres of the slums of our great towns all the way across the continent to San Francisco. He is the authorized agent of the United States for the detection of crime under these postal laws and for the prosecution of the criminals. He has strong friends, otherwise he, before now, would hav been crushed by slander. There is on his cheek a heavy scar incurred in the defense of your homes, your schools, your sons, your daughters. One hundred and seventeen American Infidel Leagues lock hands with the assassin that drew that stiletto, and the same Leagues lift up a demand for the transformation of our national postal laws into a gigantic sickle, to mow down, as the youth does the tops of the thistles, the precociousness of youth. We need more than prayers. We need watchfulness, we need the linked thunderbolts of Almighty God to purge our legislation, not only of these lax laws, and to purge civilization itself in this country of men and women who can talk, as men and women did at Cincinnati, in favor of the "loathsome places called homes in America."

Comment is almost superfluous upon this piece of balderdash. Maliciousness and a desire to round out the sentences are its chief characteristics. For truth the lecturer seems to care nothing. We would like to see the "official documents" of the League which demand the repeal of the Comstock laws. At both Congresses the resolutions were laid over, and Joe Cook, or F. E. Abbot, simply lies when he says the League, as a League, demanded their repeal. We think the League, as the representative body of Freethought, ought to hav done so, but it did not.

Col. Ingersoll's declaration that Mr. Bennett had "committed no crime whatever against any law of the country" is strictly true. Even Mr. Bennett's worst enemies admit that he is unjustly deprived of his liberty. Devens, Parton, Wright, Frothingham, Davis, Denton, Pillsbury, and a host of others, hav said that "Cupid's Yokes" is not an obscene book. Even the jury that convicted him did not agree. If the League wants to cheat the country by disguising their sentiments in regard to obscene books, why did they unanimously adopt this resolution offered by Col. Ingersoll?

Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to the dissemination, through the mails or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether "inspired" or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt its authors and disseminators.

We must regard that as the sentiment of the League till some one better authorized to speak for it than Joe Cook tells us differently.

Mr. Parton's Usual.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: I inclose my usual, wishing all the truth seekers, in all lands and climes, a happy New Year, but particularly all who assist in the production, improvement, and circulation of THE TRUTH SEEKER of Science Hall. Your circulation must double this year. You are one of the few papers that speak the real thoughts of thinking men. Some of your correspondence lately has been very suggestive and valuable. I trust Mr. Courtlandt Palmer will not long remain silent.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

Omro, Jan. 2, 1880.

DR. MONROE'S paper comes to us this week doubled in number of pages and advertising, but still we cannot see what he expects to gain by spelling Satan S-a-t-h-a-n. We are glad to see this evidence of prosperity on the part of the eccentric doctor and his sprightly paper, and we hope he will wrestle with Christianity and the barbarisms of orthodox spelling till he conquers them. If he can subdue Christ and Webster he deserves the thanks of mankind. He must not forget, however, that THE TRUTH SEEKER was in this war of words before he had his philological eyes opened by running short of "sorts." The doctor prides himself that next to THE TRUTH SEEKER his new sized paper is the largest Liberal journal. We congratulate him on his success in filling so much of his space with advertisements.

Be Careful.

We hav on hand several letters, the most of which contained money, which we can do nothing with because the writers forget to name their town or state, and in three instances omitted to sign their names. We get blamed when we do not fill the orders, yet it is impossible to do so. One man has written us three times in regard to his paper, and every time forgot to name the state. If a person is on our list, we can sometimes, by searching through all the states, and with a diligent use of the Postal Guide, find him, but many times we hav not even that slender clue to go on. All we can do then is to wait till the writer "gets mad" at our delay and writes again. We would say, Friends, be careful.

MRS. COLBY lectured at Buffalo, N. Y., on Dec. 28th to a large house. She is accompanied by Miss Olive K. Smith, vocal and instrumental musician. Mrs. Colby is noted for her eloquence and radical views on religion and politics. She should be kept busy.

Is Church-Going Advisable?

What an immense amount of time and money was wasted in the churches of this city yesterday! What an immense amount of rubbish and nonsense was spoken. Verily, what commonplace, ignorant men are the vast majority of the ministers in our temples of worship. The present religious system is entirely one of hero worship, or at least personality. The minister governs, leads, or hoodwinks his flock by virtue either of his bland ways, eloquence, or social position. The worship of God has little to do with it. Who thinks of saying, "Let us go to such a church and pray the Almighty to giv us prosperity, health, and happiness?" None! It is, "Let us go and hear Beecher, Chapin, Talmage, Hall"—some sensationalist who sells eloquence at so much a yard. God is made the excuse. The world, the flesh, and the devil are the outcome. There are many churches in this city—particularly among the Methodists—which are little better than places of immoral appointments. The number of women who hav met their ruin by attending church is beyond computation. Many church choirs are the fountain-head of the grossest licentiousness. As we write, six divorce suits and one criminal abortion suggest themselves to our mind as the result of attendance in church choirs. We should advise any husband who values his wife's honor, any father who values his daughter's reputation, never to permit either to attend regularly at church choirs.

It is trite to go over the subject of church-wardens, deacons, members, and ministers, who are constantly proving themselves scoundrels. It would be unfair to put this down to the influence of Christianity. But it is, we insist, directly attributable to the flippant, easy manner in which Christianity is conducted in our churches.

Will any Christian deny the personal responsibility of ministers? If a constant attendant at Dr. Hall's, for instance, goes wrong, is not Dr. Hall directly to blame for it? His Sunday words are neatly balanced so as to press not too hard upon his congregation, for, if they did, the pews might not rent for so much next year. Everything is made easy for rich sinners, and the gate of paradise is opened wide (if Dr. Hall is to be believed) to all those who pay more than $100 a year for pews. The chances of a happy hereafter are not so good for members who pay anything under that sum. Dr. Hall, for instance, made $10,000 last year by the marriages he performed. What time has Dr. Hall to giv to poor sinners? In his round of fashionable amusements, can he ever turn his smug face toward the poor, can he ever put out his white, soft mottled hand to anything so vulgar as saving a brand from the burning?

This man Hall we adduce only as an example of the rest. Take one like Morgan, the Episcopalian. Shiny, well kept, self-satisfied; puffed up with the fat of the land. Let us ask how many hours a week he devotes to practical religion, and if the bad sermons filled with platitudes, which he preaches each week, are worth $10,000 a year.

The amazing ignorance of ministers, generally, the sameness of their views, the tedious, everlasting exposition of one subject, is beginning to cause a vast reaction even among people who do not accept Christianity as a failure. Nor is it a failure. If the lowly, sweet-minded man of Nazareth were on earth to see how his precepts are being carried out, he would himself despair.

It is owing to these causes, to this shameless perversion of religion, that Protestantism is losing ground everywhere, while Catholicism is gaining disciples in multitudes. The Catholic revival in England is making immense strides. The wonderful discipline and untiring energy of the church of Rome keeps on, while the spirit of Martin Luther, the spirit that brought about the Reformation, has died out. If we find it at all, it is in out-of-the-way places, not in large cities.

Few young men of ability join the church in these days. The profession of the ministry, considered purely in a business light, is overstocked, particularly with fools. Men of talent cannot wait to obtain promotion at the hands of some retrograde bishop who discourages nineteenth century ideas. And thus we hav men like Hall and Morgan leading the ministry. People go to their churches precisely as they go to theaters—to see and be seen, and to be amused. To many fashionable women it is the hour of triumph of the whole week. To such, what is religion? And what is it to their husbands, who go down town and cheat, swindle, and rob next day? Nothing.

Under such circumstances, it is questionable whether church-going is to be commended. If the money spent in building and maintaining churches and paying ministers' salaries were given systematically to the poor, should we not hav less crime, and would the world be any worse than it is?

What is the Soul?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I find an article in your paper of November 29th, from the pen of Wm. M. Ridinger. In his article he asks a question for all to answer? "What is the soul composed of, that after death it is in danger of suffering or capable of enjoying happiness?" His argument, if it can be called an argument, shows that he is a Materialist from the crown of his head to the soles of his feet. He seems to think an organized body in which exist certain inherent qualities, such as the five senses, is the alpha and omega of man's existence; that at the dissolution of the body, all the mental faculties, the ego or "I am" of the man, are lost forever, and that he no more exists as a conscious being. Right here let me ask my friend Ridinger a question: Did intelligence, which is a faculty of the soul, giv form and the five senses to the body, or did a senseless body giv or produce life and sensation to the soul? My friend will admit, as a true Materialist, that there is nothing in the broad universe but what is composed of matter, and that matter eternally existed and will eternally exist in some form. In this last statement my friend and I agree.

My friend again asks to hav some one inform him what the soul is, and thinks this question was never properly answered. In reply to this question I will giv him my views with regard to the soul. My friend will follow me down through all gradations of matter to the ego or soul entity, which is an infinitesimal atom. Each soul atom is a microcosm of all that exists in the unbounded universe of matter; and all forms, whether bodies or worlds, are made up from atoms. Each atom has within its eternal and divine nature all the possibilities of any other atom; there is no aristocracy or God existing within the atoms; all are parts of the whole divine confederacy by the affinitizing elements of each one's nature. As each atom develops from within itself, it has its own atmosphere to revolve in. There can be no danger of ever being so attracted by forming a confederacy that there could not be separation of each atomic entity. Bodies, then, can be formed and dissolved without loss to each divine atom. The soul essence, then, is the power that can enter any organized body and dissolve its connection, and it has, while unfolding its own inherent nature, the power to attract the less developed entities to form a body-guard for its own protection. The progressed soul has lived in all progressive forms of life from the atom up to man. And we will continue to liv in all progressive forms in the eternal future.

All particles of matter hav within themslves both elements, male and female. All germs of life exist in the soul atom of all aggregated bodies. This can be seen in all seeds that are put in the earth; the germ bursts the shell and comes forth in new garments of life. The shell does not burst the germ, as my friends would have it, and die. When once it begins to unfold, nature never stops its progressive course until it accomplishes its purpose, and nature never repeats itself. There are no two things exactly alike in the universe of matter. Every thing that exists has within itself the soul germ of eternal life. It cannot be destroyed, for there is no such place or locality as nothing. The ego or "I am" of you my brother, is a part, of eternal life; your body will be dissolved, but the soul never. Active life needs rest for recuperation in what is change or death. Unconscious sleep, or death, will follow active life through the cycles of eternal existence, for it is an eternal law in nature that every positive must have its negative.

Yours for all truth, M. S. SHERMAN, M. D.

Soils—Not Those Connected with Agriculture, but with Human Society.

Can we really afford to throw dirt at anybody? If we must, let us do it under protest, as we would kill a man in self-defense, and because self-preservation is the first law of life. If we speak ill of our neighbor let us first always be obliged as a necessity, that we may get at some good not otherwise attainable, as the lesser of two evils from which circumstances oblige us to choose.

A man may be ever so contemptible and deserving of bad treatment, yet the fact is conspicuous that as soon as we raise a hand to throw dirt, we, being the active party, make ourselves the figurehead of the world's observation, and almost invariably hurt ourselves more than the person assailed. It is also human nature to take sides with the supposed weaker party without knowledge of the case. And so we take upon ourselves a great task whenever we go into the pollution business.

In view of it can we afford to injure ourselves by using filth on our neighbor? Whatever he may be, the fact remains that he is, like ourselves, human; and in this connection the noblest thing that we can hav is an everpresent sense of the sacredness of and the love for humanity. We hate error and falsehood because they are its oppressors, and we do battle with wrong and ignorance because they are the causes of its past and present misery. It adds to us a splendid dignity and nobility to treat one who is unworthy and inferior in such a way that the real excellence of our own character is the most of all things apparent.

Let us discuss principles always, but never descend into the dark realm of personalities; speak well of individuals or keep silent.

I hav thought there was profound philosophy in the action of "Uncle Toby," who, after long-continued suffering and irritation, caught carefully the insignificant mischief-maker, and, placing him safely outside the door, shut it, saying, "Go, poor fly; the world is big enough for me and thee!" H. W. BOOZER.

Stories as Told by Col. Ingersoll.

THE HERMIT.

An Eastern monarch said to a hermit, "Come with me and I will giv you power."

"I hav all the power that I know how to use," replied the hermit.

"Come," said the king, "I will giv you wealth."

"I hav no want that money can supply."

"I will giv you honor."

"Ah! honor cannot be given, it must be earned."

"Come," said the king, making a last appeal, "and I will giv you happiness."

"No," said the man of solitude; "there is no happiness without liberty, and he who follows cannot be free."

"You shall hav liberty too!"

"Then I will stay," and all the king's courtiers thought the hermit a fool.—Arraignment of the Church.

THE EXAMINATION.

There is a book put in my hands. They say that it is the Koran; that it was written by inspiration; read it. I read it; chapter seven, entitled "The Cow;" chapter nine, entitled "The Bee," and so on. I read it. When I got through with it, suppose I think in my heart and in my brain, "I don't believe a word of it," and yet you ask me, "What do you think of it?" Now, admitting that I liv in Turkey and hav a chance to get an office, what should I say? Should I make a clean breast of it, and say, "Upon my honor, I don't believe it?" Then is it right for men to say, That fellow will steal, that fellow is a dangerous man, he is a robber? Now suppose I read the Bible. . . . I think I will stand higher at the judgment day, if there is one, and stand with as good a chance to get my case dismissed without costs, as a man who sneaks through life pretending he believes what he does not?—Liberty of Man, Woman, and Child.

CONSCIENCE.

Are men restrained by superstition? Are men restrained by what you call religion? I used to think they were not; now I admit they are. No man has ever been restrained from the commission of a real crime, but from an artificial one he has. There was a man who committed murder. They got the evidence, but he confessed that he did it.

"What did you do it for?"

"Money."

"Did you get any money?"

"Yes."

"How much?"

"Fifteen cents."

"What kind of a man was he?"

"A laboring man I killed."

"What did you do with the money?"

"I bought liquor with it."

"Did he hav anything else?"

"I think he had some meat and bread."

"What did you do with that?"

"I ate the bread and threw away the meat; it was Friday."

So you see it can restrain in some things!

A HOUSE ON FIRE.

A house is on fire and there is seen at a window the frightened face of a woman with a babe in her arms, appealing for help; humanity cries, out, "Will some one go to the rescue?" They do not ask for a Methodist, a Baptist, or a Catholic; they ask for a man. All at once there starts from the crowd one that nobody ever suspected of being a saint, one, maybe, with a bad reputation; but he goes up the ladder and is lost in the smoke and flame, and a moment after he emerges, the great circles of flame hissing around him; in another moment, with the woman and child in his arms he reaches the ground and givs his fainting burden to the bystanders, and the people all stand hushed for a moment, as they always do at such times, and then the air is rent with acclamations. Tell me that that man is going to be sent to hell, to eternal flames, who is willing to risk his life rather than that a woman and child should suffer from the fire one moment. I despise that doctrine of hell!

THE CRIPPLE AND HIS CRUTCHES.

The mind necessarily clings to the old ideas until prepared for the new. The moment we comprehend the truth, all erroneous ideas are of necessity cast aside. A surgeon once called upon a poor cripple and kindly offered to render him any assistance in his power. The surgeon began to discourse very learnedly upon the nature and origin of disease; of the curative properties of certain medicines; of the advantages of air, exercise, and light, and of the various ways in which health and strength could be restored. These remarks were so full of good sense and discovered so much profound thought and accurate knowledge that the cripple, becoming thoroughly alarmed, cried out, "Do not, I pray you, take away my crutches. They are my only support, and without them I should be miserable indeed."

"I am not going," said the surgeon, "to take away your crutches; I am going to cure you, and then you will throw away the crutches yourself."

SHUT YOUR EYES AND OPEN YOUR MOUTH, ETC.

If a man should tell you that he had the most beautiful painting in the world, and after taking you where it was, should insist upon having your eyes shut, you would likely suspect either that he had no painting at all, or that it was some pitiful daub. Should he tell you that he was a most excellent performer on a violin, and yet refuse to play unless your ears were stopped, you would think, to say the least of it, that he had an odd way of convincing you of his musical ability. But would his conduct be any more wonderful than that of a religionist who asks that, before examining his creed, you will hav the kindness to throw away your reason? The first gentlemen say, "Keep your eyes shut, my picture will bear anything but being seen;" "keep your ears stopped, my music objects to nothing but being heard." The last says, "Away with your reason; my religion dreads nothing but being understood."

HOW BIGOTRY WORKS.

I say our fathers, in the good old times, had an idea that they could force men to think in their way; and do you know that idea is still prevalent even in this country? Do you know that they think they can make a man think their way if they say, "We will not trade with that man; we won't vote for that man; we won't hire him if he is a lawyer; we will die before we will take his medicine, if he is a doctor; we won't invite him; we will socially ostracize him; he must come to our church, he must think our way, or he is not a gentleman."

WHY ARE THE GODS MALES?

Man having always been the physical superior of woman accounts for the fact that most of the high gods hav been males. Had women been the physical superior the powers supposed to be the rulers of nature would hav been women, and instead of being represented in the apparel of man, they would hav luxuriated in trains, low-necked dresses, and back hair.

THE TEMPTATION.

The Christians now claim that Jesus was God. If he was God, of course the devil knew that fact, and yet, according to this account (Matt. iv), the devil took the omnipotent God and placed him upon a pinnacle of the temple, and endeavored to induce him to dash himself against the earth. Failing in that, he took the creator, owner, and governor of the universe up into an exceeding high mountain and offered him this world—this grain of sand—if he, the God of all the worlds, would fall down and worship him, a poor devil, without even a bar title to one foot of dirt! Is it possible the devil was such an idiot? Should any great credit be given this deity for not being caught with such chaff? Think of it! The devil—the prince of sharpers, the king of cunning, the master of finesse—trying to bribe God with a grain of sand that belonged to God.

CAN MEN BE MORE LIBERAL THAN THEIR GOD?

At present, owing to the inroads that hav been made by Liberals and Infidels, most of the churches pretend to be in favor of religious liberty. Of these churches, we ask this question: How can a man who conscientiously believes in religious liberty worship a God who does not? They say to us: "We will not imprison you on account of your belief, but our God will. We will not burn you because you throw away the sacred scriptures, but their author will." "We think it an infamous crime to persecute our brethren for opinion's sake, but the God whom we ignorantly worship will, on that account, damn his own children forever."

EVERYTHING KNOWN AND FIXED.

Every church pretends to hav found the exact truth. This is the end of progress. Why pursue that which you hav? Why investigate when you know? Every creed is a rock in running water; humanity sweeps by it. Every creed cries to the universe, "Halt!" A creed is the ignorant past bullying the enlightened present.

A Word About Mr. Bennett's Vice-Presidency.—The Political Scramble of 1880.—Moses Hull's New Paper.—Old Ben Butler and Others.

FRIEND EDITOR MACDONALD: It really beats all that a man residing in my native state of Michigan—and he chairman, etc.—should allow to ooze off from his pen the thought that the great old, truthful Bennett should be removed from the vice-presidency of the National Liberal League. I did not read the letter until my attention was called to it. But, after all, I believe that Mr. C. H. Dunning, of Marcellus, Mich., who penned that sentiment in his letter, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 13th of December, is too much of a thinker and too honest a man to entertain that sentiment still. Then let us hope, Mr. Editor, that it was a slip of his pen, and that from reflection he has got all over it ere now, for I think no honest man in his right senses could wish the officers of the National Liberal League to accept of the great old heroic truth-teller's resignation of his vice-presidency.

We expect such perverted, sanctimonious Spiritualists as G. B. Stebbins, of Detroit, to dwell humbly apart from the great throng of big-souled Liberals, solitary and alone, save for his associates, a few such as Abbot, Underwood, and Bundy. I was tempted to say old baldhead, but fearful that there may yet be "she-bears" to tear people, I forbear. But don't you see, Mr. Editor, those characters hav been sanctified, and once in grace, once purified, they can never sin? But not so of real humanitarian, thinking, warm-hearted Spiritualists, nor of bright spirits on the evergreen shore. They view the physical temptations and errors of mortals with complacency, knowing them to be fallible man's educators knowing that evil is a rose, and that man must learn by his mistakes. They look upon the shortcomings of men here as bubbles that break and disappear, while the spirit of man unfolds, beautifies, and livs. But not so of the sanctified few. They know better. They know that people hav got to come to them to be saved.

Well, let them dwell humbly apart; they deserve to until they can learn to feel and act as men. Meanwhile the great power of the Liberal brotherhood of this nation, men and women with their brains in their heads and their hearts in the right place, are marching forward with the great old editor Bennett right in their midst, and in the head ranks, steadily "moving upon the enemy's works" to conquer and to bless

And now 1880, that is to bring the great political turmoil, is right at our doors. And in the mean time I want to tell all of the friends that Moses Hull & Co. hav just started one of the brightest and best little papers on the continent, which, for noble, truthful, and valuable sentiments, stands next to the stalwart TRUTH SEEKER itself. But his paper advocates practical reform in politics. It is a national Greenback paper, but is in every way keen and Liberal. Friends, send to 46 School street, Boston, to Moses Hull & Co., get a copy, and see for yourselves if my recommendation is not correct.

And now, in conclusion, let me say that I hope our national Liberal party leaders are awake on this momentous occasion of the approach of the great campaign of 1880. Let us join with the national Greenback party, join all of the factions together, meet early in convention, and nominate Benjamin F. Butler, or some other safe man, ands how the monster of this nation that there is yet a voice of the people.

And now friend editor, "Mac," and all of the other friends, I am Fraternally yours, T. S. ANDREWS.

Kipton, Ohio, Dec. 26, 1879.

A Prayer to the Orthodox Gods.

BY DR. C. W. STONE.

O thou great and undisputed company of universal rulers, we know thy greatness and appreciate thy boasted goodness! We see thy powerful hand in deciding battles in favor of the strong, and we are satisfied that it matters not how many devout men on the weaker side may be praying to thee to crown them with victory, and it matters not which army is battling for the right, the stronger one is sure to win unless by some strategy the weaker army succeeds.

O thou Gods of battles, we know that thou art great, merciful, and tender toward thy children! Thou hast destroyed whole nations of thy people, men, women, and children, and even little babes at the breast, and left not a soul to breathe! We acknowledge frankly, O thou heavenly firm, our total inability to understand the cause of thy wholesale slaughter of innocent babes and the quadruped portion of thy creation! Thou alone, O thou heavenly and merciful firm, knowest why thou didst do this thing, and we hav no right to inquire into thy private business affairs! And we are told in that holy book of thine that thou didst curse thine old white-headed servant, Bro. Ezekiel, and made him eat of that which none of thy children of to-day hav stomachs strong enough to eat. (Ezekiel iv.) Oh, wilt thou forever deliver us from a similar curse and oblige! Still we know that thou art kind and merciful to thy children. Thou hast set one nation to cutting the throats of another, and stopped the course of the sun till the butchery was finished. (See memorial of General Joshua.)

Why should we not love thee and teach our children to love thee? O thou most merciful, thou hast, in days that are gone by, consigned to debauchery, through thy noble servant Moses, thirty-two thousand innocent females, and put to death their fathers, mothers, and little brothers and sisters! For fear of thy memory being short, we will state that in this instance thy victims were the Midianites.

And again we acknowledge thy goodness and tender mercies in thy total destruction of the Amalekite nation, and more particularly, the death of their chief, Agag, by the hand of thy dear and bloodthirsty "son of a sea cook," who hewed Agag as thy children of to-day would hew a stick of wood.

And now, O God, Son, and Ghost, we would humbly pray that thy bloody and merciful hand may be kept off of our heads. And may thy traveling agent, Comstock, and thy local agents, Bundy and Abbot, be called from the field of persecution!

We hav heard of the many miracles performed by one of thy firm while his highness was here on earth; and though somewhat astonished at the cunningness of the performances, we see pretty near the same miracle performed here in Saginaw daily. Christ turned water into wine; Saginaw gentry turn water into whisky. O thou loving, merciful, and bloodthirsty ruler, what is the difference?

Amen and Amen!

"Superstition in All Ages."

I never saw such a masterly, irresistible piece of Atheistical philosophy presented with so much candor and simplicity, embodied in one volume of 339 pages. Meslier's book is a death-knell to all religions, also to all imaginary nonentities. It is only a commendable act of justice to say that his work is unanswerable. It is lucid in style, and undoubtedly one of the most powerful appeals in behalf of reason, common sense, and justice that ever was produced in any age or country. I hav never read D'Holbach's "System of Nature," but will say if his Atheistical reasoning is more profound than Meslier's, he was immensely great. It sweeps away all the gods of mythology and shows conclusively, reasoning from cause to effect, that the universe is governed by immutable law, and all results are by natural causes, and that there is no such thing as supernaturalism. He has left all Unitarian and Trinitarian gods behind, showing that such a being is an impossibility. Admitting the existence of a God, he would be a cause uncaused. I will giv a few sayings from the work.

"Admiration is always the daughter of ignorance. Men admire and worship only what they do not understand. "Power decides the fate of nations." "Ignorance and fear are the two pivots of all religion."

I will close by saying, Let all lovers of light and knowl edge buy this wonderful work. Let posterity sing peans to his memory so long as truth is superior to falsehood. Voltaire wrote the author's life; and was a great admirer of the work in question. O. B. FENTON.

Liberal League News.

E. CAMPFIELD, of Kansas, writes under date of December 25th: "The last Investigator reports seventeen Leagues in this state, and I can count nine more already organized and seven under way."

THE one hundred and fiftieth auxiliary League has just been chartered for Springville, Utah, with Hugh M. Douglass as temporary secretary. This is the sixth League organized in Utah. This territory is well represented on the Executive Committee by Bro. Walter Walker. He is the champion Walker in the good cause.

TO MY knowledge auxiliary Leagues are being formed in the following places: South Stockton, N. Y., by J. H. Clark; Coal Creek, Colorado, by George Mellar; Winchester, Ind., by Samuel A. Winship, and Wheatland, Iowa, by Jerome Dutton. There are probably fifty other places where organization is contemplated.

THE Buffalo (N. Y.) Liberal League has arranged for a course of fifteen lectures by distinguished speakers. Mrs. Amelia H. Colby has been delivering a number of lectures before this League. They were well received. Edgar M. Sellon, the secretary, writes: "We hav hired a room on Main street, No. 482, and fitted it up for a reading-room. We keep all the Liberal books and papers; hav a janitor keep the room warm, a free telephone, and large pictures of Ingersoll, Paine, and Christ framed and hung up on the walls. We hav got the clergy and daily papers excited, all of which helps us. We are preparing for a grand celebration on Paine's birthday. Another League (No. 2) is being formed among the Germans. It will apply soon for a charter. This German League has a reading-room and library. Our League is becoming quite popular. We hav a number of the city officials on the list of membership. Let other Leagues try a free reading-room, and invite the public in. Every League should make an effort to do some practical work if it desires to liv and prosper."

MR. JOHN WARR, who represents the state of New Jersey on the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League, informs me that he intends to do all in his power during the year 1880 for the Liberal League movement in that state; that he will commence his work by organizing a new auxiliary League at his home in Paterson; that he desires to open a correspondence with every Liberal in the state of New Jersey who favors the movement, and to obtain every such name. Now, my New Jersey reader, will you at once send your name and post-office address to John Warr, Paterson, N. J.? and do not forget to inclose twenty-five cents' worth of postage stamps to aid him in his work.

AT the date of this communication one hundred and fifty-two auxiliary Liberal Leagues hav been chartered. Of this number one each is located in the states of Colorado, Minnesota, Texas, Vermont, Nevada, Tennessee, West Virginia, Rhode Island, Maryland, Louisiana, and Washington territory; two each in Illinois, Connecticut, New Jersey, Idaho, and District of Columbia; three each in Nebraska, California, and Indiana; four each in Wisconsin and Iowa; six in Utah; seven in Ohio; eight each in Missouri and Illinois; nine each in Pennsylvania and Michigan; fourteen in Massachusetts; nineteen in Kansas, and twenty-eight in New York state.

Liberal friends in the various states, look over the above statement, and see to it that the state in which you reside adds a number of Leagues to the present number before another New Year's Day comes around.

THE prospects are that wise counsel will prevail and that the Tompkins County Liberal League will remain with the National League. I am pleased to learn from the secretary that whatever shall be the decision at the next meeting the League "will not cease the fight for Freethought" and will work as heretofore for the platform of the National Liberal League. That is right. If we can't see alike on all points that is no reason why we should desert our principles and go back on our professions.

MRS. H. L. LAKE, one our ablest Freethought lecturers, informs me that she starts from Clinton, Iowa, on a lecturing tour the 30th ult., and desires to obtain appointments to speak on the line of the Hudson River and New York Central Railroad, and along the line of the Rome and Watertown Railroad as well as in New York city and vicinity. I hope the Liberals of the East will avail themselves of the opportunity of listening to this earnest, able, and eloquent woman. She may be addressed, care TRUTH SEEKER office, at 141 Eighth street, New York city.

LINESVILLE LEAGUE CELEBRATION.

The Linesville (Pa.) Liberal League Celebration, of Paine's birthday, commences January 27th, and not the 29th, as I stated in a recent TRUTH SEEKER. It will last three days, and a large gathering is expected.

THE TAXATION OF CHURCH PROPERTY.

I notice that in many of the states arrangements are being made to petition the legislature to repeal the laws exempting church property and ministers and priests from taxation. Last year P. Himrod, Esq., of Lyons, Kansas, contributed ten dollars to assist the Liberals of New York state in the work of printing and circulating petitions in behalf of church taxation, and the movement inaugurated by our Kansas friend resulted in obtaining some fifty thousand names to such petitions. Is there not some Liberal in New York state who is willing to giv ten dollars to the movement this winter? If there is I wish he or she would forward the amount to Edgar M. Sellon, 2,835 Main street, Buffalo, N. Y., who will act as chairman of the New York State Liberal League Committee for the present year. Mr. Sellon will take charge of the movement this winter, and forward blank petitions to all who may desire them. Do not forget to send him at least two three-cent postage stamps with your application; and now let us all take hold and aid Bro. Sellon all we can. My idea is that it will be better to send in the petitions as fast as they are obtained, keeping many little streams going into the legislature constantly from every quarter, so that every morning, when the hour arrives for the presentation of petitions, there will be one or more petitions for church taxation to be read. Now, friends everywhere, let us set the ball in motion.

ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

The following letter from Elmina D. Slenker explains itself: "FRIEND GREEN: I see thee is stirring up each member of the Executive Committee of the National Liberal League for not doing something, and I may fall guilty under the indictment; but as there is no League here I don't really know what I can do further than I am doing. I write thirty or fifty letters a week, and fill them with 'good seed.' I hav sent in every fifty cents I could spare for three months' trial TRUTH SEEKERS. I wrote to D. M. Bennett once a week; sent him little items of money whenever I could; mailed and distributed from ten to twenty Liberal papers a week; pitched into preachers of false doctrines whenever opportunity permitted, especially the D. D.'s; and now if there is any unfulfilled duty left for me to do I shall be glad to perform it if any one will point it out. I want to do my 'level best.'" "What lack I yet?" said the young man to Jesus, which is virtually what sister Slenker says; and my answer is, "You lack postage stamps;" and I am going to make an earnest request of every Liberal in the United States and Canada, and the request is, that each immediately put ten three-cent postage stamps into an envelope and mail it to Mrs. Elmina Drake Slenker, Snowville, Va. If five hundred would do this it would giv her a New Year's present of one hundred and fifty dollars.

Liberals of America, what better use can each of you make of thirty cents? There is no estimating the good work sister Slenker has done for us. Help her this little and I assure you she will do much more than her "level best." Is there a Liberal who will read this request and not comply with it? I hope not.

A GRAND ORGANIZER.

Our popular Liberal lecturer, W. F. Jamieson, is proving himself one of the best Liberal League organizers we hav. He is organizing Liberal Leagues at the rate of about one or two a week. Liberals everywhere should aid him in the good work. The Liberal League movement is the movement of the day and every paper and every lecturer giving the movement substantial aid should not lack for support. This movement was not inaugurated to fail, but to succeed, and it will succeed. It is marching forward with constantly accelerated speed, and will at an early day make itself felt in this country.

From Kansas.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Allow me the privilege of stating to the Liberals of Kansas that the Liberal work in this state is in a more prosperous condition than at any time since the Liberal League movement was instituted. We can now count twenty-six Leagues in this state, and, with your assistance, the Executive Committee propose to increase the number to fifty before the next annual meeting of the state League. This can be done if every Liberal in the state will take hold of the work and do what he can to advance the cause. There are now in process of formation nearly twenty Local Leagues, and there is material sufficient in every county to sustain a good strong League; all that is wanted is a little encouragement to induce that element to organize. Make it a point to organize at least one League in your own county, and then see that your neighbors do the same. With one good strong working League in every county of the state we can compel the next state convention to nominate a prominent Liberal as candidate for Governor. Shall we try for it? It rests with you, my Liberal friends, whether this shall be done or not. Your answer will be made known by your actions. What will it be?

Another point which I must press upon your attention is that we must hav some money to carry on this work. Circulars must be printed; stationery must be bought, and postage be paid. During the last year I did not receive six dollars from all sources. The expenses hav been borne by myself. Is this right? Is it just? The battle is yours as well as mine, and I cannot furnish the muscle and sinews of war any longer. The work has assumed such proportions that it requires much time to attend to it. Letters must be written; questions are to be answered; workers are to be found; lectures must be delivered; new fields to be opened up, and the old ones to be kept at work. Few men in the state hav more postage to pay than your chairman. When you write always inclose stamp, and it would be much better to inclose two or three, so that new correspondence can be opened. To be brief, these expenses must be provided for or some other man can take charge of the work in this state.

Write and let me know at what time our next annual meeting shall be held. It is time that we begin to make arrangements therefor, so that everything shall be well done.

To places desiring a course of Liberal lectures, I will say that I can effect arrangements whereby the services of either Prof. A. O. Phelps, W. S. Bell, or Rev. W. E. Copeland can be procured. The former lecturer has been with us for nearly a year, and has done and is doing valiant service.

I think we can induce the National Liberal League to meet with us next year. Shall we offer any encouragement to that body to hold their next Congress at Bismarck Grove? Those of you who met with us last year well remember what a pleasant time we had, and it can be made far better this year if we do the best we know how.

I want to hear from the vice-presidents of the state League, whether they are going to accept the positions to which they were elected, or by declining make way for some person who will work?

Subscribe for THE TRUTH SEEKER, Investigator, and Mirror of Progress, and thus learn what is taking place in the Liberal world. You are but poor Liberals unless you read our Liberal papers. Subscribe now!

Some of these remarks may sound harsh, but this is the time for work and not for words. With from ten to twenty letters to write each day, and about one in ten inclosing stamp, it is enough to make one feel rather harsh, however good-natured he may feel at other times. The first one to respond has my unqualified permission to engage in the "harp business." Your hard-worked chairman,

Vermillion, Kan. E. CAMPFIELD.

To the Liberals of Ohio.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There appeared in an issue of a recent date, among the "Liberal News Items" of our friend H. L. Green, a headless, dateless, nameless, and tailless letter from somebody of somewhere, in which anxious inquiries are made as to the mortal status of Mr. Blank, of Blankville, elected at Cincinnati as Executive Member of the National Liberal League, to represent the state of Blank, of which somebody of somewhere is a resident. The cleverness of Bro. Green, in asking the bewildered thirty-seven committeemen to try on this coat successively, to see whether it fitted them, is so commendable as to insure him my vote at the next Annual Congress for his continuance in office, as chairman of that committee.

Indeed, I hav been tempted to believe this letter apocryphal; and a shrewd device of friend Green to stir up the boys. But no matter.

As one of the unhappy band called into Bro. Green's clothing store, I can see with half an eye that the garment left here on sale by Somebody, of Somewhere, does not fit me, and that I cannot be the Mr. Blank of Blankville, whose status in the flesh is desired to be ascertained.

But I do fear me for the vitality of the Liberals of Ohio. If I were to go into the tailoring business, asking people to try on coats that fit those who do not reply to letters, circulars, postal cards, etc., sent to them, it would be amazing in the history of merchant tailoring to see how one coat will fit so many. Since my appointment as member of the Executive Committee for Ohio I hav written to the secretaries of all the auxiliaries in the state, as published in the Investigator. I hav had a reply from but one, the Cleveland League, and they swear by the National Liberal League of America. The report I hav received from the Liberals of the state consists in one three-cent stamp from Frankfort, O., which was used in replying to the letter of my correspondent from that place; and this "generous support" I hav received after my name had been published in half a dozen Liberal papers, and noticed by friend Green in the Investigator.

If the Mr. Blank, of Blankville, state of Blank, has had the same experience as I hav had with the Somebody's of Somewhere in Ohio, I do not blame him for finding himself in a moribund condition.

My address is Cincinnati, O.; my name will be found at the end of this letter. Any inquiry addressed to me, any "calls for formation of auxiliaries," will be promptly (as they hav been hitherto) attended to. I am ready to giv any information desired upon application.

I am and hav been waiting for such applications. Send them in without delay. CHARLES HERBOLD.

Power of the Press.

The Executive Committee of the National Liberal League for Ohio will soon send to each paper in the state a copy of the petition for the taxation of church property, with a request to publish and comment. I now request each Liberal in Iowa under whose eye this may fall to use his or her influence to secure the insertion of this petition in his or her local paper, and to send me a marked copy of said paper if it publishes and comments, or refuses to publish and animadverts in any way upon our cause, and this special movement for the equalization of taxation. Let us know who the freemen and untrammeled papers are and act accordingly. Our indefatigable co-worker, Mr. M. U. Mercer, of Winterset, served me a copy of the Beacon Light of that place with the petition so printed that it can be cut out and pasted upon other paper in the same manner as the separate petitions. The Beacon Light also publishes the names and addresses of the members of the state committee. How many more will go and do likewise? Friends, let us use every means in our power to advance the good cause. Send for petitions. Do not forget to inclose a stamp. On to victory.

E. C. WALKER,

DANIEL DE FOE was a most prolific writer. His published works number not less than five hundred and sixty books and pamphlets. He was nearly sixty when he wrote "Robinson Crusoe."

Letters from Friends.

EAST SAGINAW, MICH., Dec. 21, 1879.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just read Mr. Bennett's fifth letter from Albany, and it does me a "heap" of good to believe the old war-horse will survive his imprisonment and emerge from the Red Sea of Christian malignity stronger in spirit and a more efficient worker for humanity. I hav somehow got the impression that the brother will be released about the first proximo, but the feeling probably comes from a sense of the propriety and justice of executive interference in the case, and because even government officials, if not totally depraved, open the eastern windows of their nature to the light of the new year, rather than from any confidence in the wisdom or mercy of the de facto President. You will understand of course that this is not to be taken as a prophecy; and while hope deferred would make the heart sick, it should not be set down as evidence that I am not "inspired."

When I first read that Mr. Bennett was writing a book on "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," I could hardly believe it. Immured in that lonely cell, without access to books or papers—no library but his brain—how could he write such a book? But recurring to his manly letter in reply to Buncombe and Abbot, all was plain—Bennett remembers. Here is an important difference between him and Mr. Beecher, and I hav studied human nature to poor advantage if this quality does not secure him the sympathy and support of all genuine Liberals, besides challenging the respect of every conscientious opponent. It is barely possible, however, that the forgetfulness of one shepherd and the memory of the other are to be explained by the peculiarities of the sheep. Any one who can swallow that there are twenty-six generations between David and Joseph, and the forty-one wholly different generations given by Luke, accepting all as the genealogy of an immaculate being, whose mother was a virgin and whose father never married her at all, may be counted on for capacity to accommodate Jonah and the whale, and hav room enough left for any theory of "nest-hiding" which clerical crookedness may suggest or ingenuity invent. Well might it be said of such a one that he had been faithful over a few things. With Bennett the situation was entirely different. He stood as the representative of thinkers—of men and women who can form no idea of an explanation which explains nothing. To get at the "true inwardness" of any matter we ask for facts; the principles we hav. The author of "The World's Sages" has given us the facts, and while serving out a Christian sentence for exercising the right of free speech and free mails, he awaits the verdict of the Liberal public upon his life-work. Who among us would hav had him seek to climb up some other way? And where is the individual with capacity to carry him beyond the a b c of Liberalism, who does not know that the society of a pretty and intelligent woman is "exceedingly agreeable" to a large, highly-vitalized man, especially if she be "petite" and "chatty," and he in a condition that calls for sympathy? Professor Jamieson and I took this subject under advisement some years ago, and, after a long and prayerful consideration, came to the conclusion that women of the above description, "other things being equal," are the life of "the American republic," but "a source of danger," even to the "clergy." And I feel "impressed" to say that we, jointly and severally, challenge the world (or that portion of it who think they hav a monopoly of all respectability) to shake the position. Either Bundy & Co., including Stebbins, must possess strongly-marked asinine traits, or else they hav fallen under that nightmare of social idiocy which has so long excluded the relations of the sexes from the domain of rational inquiry, and either position is unfortunate. So far as they are individually concerned, perhaps it makes but little difference, and we may be able to utilize them as objects of ridicule; but it pains the true Liberal to know that any one wearing the insignia of Freethought should lend his powers to advance and perpetuate false and foolish prejudices which foster moral dishonesty and intensify social degradation.

Oh, but that letter of Elizur Wright's on "Religion Gone—What Then?" is a rustler, and no mistake. I am glad Mr. W. lived to write that letter and THE TRUTH SEEKER to print it. Such men may be able to see themselves as others see them, in so far as their motives go, but they can never appreciate the full value to humanity of such earnest, stirring words at such a time, from such a source, and on such a theme. Humanity is coming to the front; the colossal ones are almost here; as they appear, the gods and demons that hav so long stood in the pathway of all genuine progress will go howling back to their place in the under world, never more to mar the happiness or hinder the harmonious development of the race. Hopefully yours, R. P. LEWIS.

LOUISVILLE, KY., Dec. 4, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I hav written Mr. Bennett, at Albany, that I am entirely opposed to his retiring from the editorship of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I cannot see that he has committed any serious offense. If I hav changed at all in my estimation of him, I hav more respect for him than ever.

I hav written the President several times lately, reminding him that one whom he knew to be innocent of crime, and whom he could but would not pardon, was still languishing in a loathsome prison. I hold Hayes in utter contempt now, though I voted for him.

Respectfully, F. E. ASPINWALL, M. D.

TRUXTON, N. Y., Dec. 6, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed you will find $3, for which please giv credit according to within bill. I received Mr. Abbot's Index of Oct. 30th, and hav read Mr. Bennett's letters, which I think were somewhat loving and romancing for an old man as he is, but, nevertheless, he is nothing more than flesh and blood as well as other men. I hav no stone to cast at him in regard to his love-letters as long as he is behind the bars and has only a poor chance to speak for himself, and when he did, he spoke manly and bravely in his last letter from the penitentiary, which I and many other men whom I spoke to about it fully indorse. As long as THE TRUTH SEEKER suits me I am going to help sustain it. But I would much rather that it would giv such reading matter that would be more interesting to new subscribers, who are not acquainted with Mr. Abbot's or Mr. Bennett's affairs. As for me, I think I am pretty well posted, as I was at the Congress which was held at Syracuse and saw and heard all that was said by them. I am satisfied with your noble paper and will do all I can for it. I hav been confined at home for a long time taking care of my companion, who took her departure from this world on Nov. 16th. I had her remains laid in Truxton new cemetery, and where her spirit or soul has gone to I cannot tell, but hope if she had any such that it is better off in the other world than it was in this.

Hoping that you, Mr. Editor, and all other well-wishers of Mr. Bennett and his TRUTH SEEKER, will do the best they can for him and the Liberal cause, I am,

Yours truly, JOHN DEAN.

OXFORD, O., Dec. 24, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find money order for six dollars—three for Uncle Tom and three for M. A. King, for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880.

And now, my dear friend Bennett, you hav had so many big guns fired for you that Uncle Tom was about to giv it up and not write to you, but after studying a moment I concluded I would fire off my pop-gun, hit or miss. The first thing is how do you do? I send my love by the bushel to you; yes, Mr. Bennett,

Long as the tints of morn I hail,
My love to you shall never fail;
The sun and moon to earth may fall.
I shan't forget you, not at all.
Your prison door, I sometimes shout,
May open fly and let you out
In the open air that's pure.
What trouble you hav to endure!
Your trouble soon I hope will end,
My true, and honest, loving friend.
I hope old Hayes will see his folly,
And pardon you out of jail, by golly;
And send you home to wife and friend.
So here my rhyming it will end.

Mr. Bennett, I am so infernal mad at your enemies that I can't sleep sound. I hav dreams. I had one and sent it to you in hopes you would publish it. If you can't publish it in THE TRUTH SEEKER print it on slips of paper, say twenty-five or thirty, and I will pay for them.

You must print a few of this pop-gun letter; if you don't, I shall think that Long street is slighted sure. And, Mr. Bennett, a long life and a happy one; a long life and a merry one; a long life and a calm one; a long life and a glorious one; a long life and a joyful one. And now, friend Bennett, when you are compelled to leave this troublesome world may all the little angels hover around you and waft you to everlasting peace, is the prayer of Uncle Tom. He is all right. THOS. H. DODGE, per M. A. KING.

DES MOINES, IOWA, Dec. 25, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav taken your paper for over two months and am well satisfied with it and its editor, D. M. Bennett—for the latter because I think he tells the truth about a simple matter that any man might do under similar circumstances, and having a well-developed constitution. I never did like Beecher after that trial because I thought he was entirely too forgetful to be a good, truthful man. I think it is not so much what a man does as it is to be honest in doing it. And I might say here that I never did like that seven-to-eight president, or that thing we call President Hayes, and made so by fifteen men instead of forty millions. So it goes, they select him and he in turn selects them, and this is called executive government. I used to take the R.-P. Journal, of Chicago, until it became a most perfect slander sheet, and I ordered it stopped before Jones was shot, and I hav not read the d—d dirty thing since. I think it is reform we are after rather than popular floodwood slander like his. I am, dear friend, your sincere, well-wisher, LEVI PATTERSON.

THE OBSCENE INTERREGNUM.

The following communication is from a distinguished Liberal of this country to a friend of his:

DEAR FRIEND: We see you are doing your best for general and individual intellectual independence. How different it is with envious Bundy, Abbot & Co.! We shall soon be summoned to attend their Liberal funeral, where Colgate, Comstock, Benedict, and friends will perform their new orthodox burial services for the religious salvation of their illiberal souls. Some one should write up the "Mistakes of Bundy and Abbot." While on their annual hunt this year for some new obscene incidents, they were not satisfied with what they found ousside of the Albany Penitentiary. Some unnamed person trumped out of that prison an overdrawn case to appease their inspired chronic-obscene appetite. Obscene dyspepsia is sometimes, as in their case, a newspaper disease.

Radical societies make a great mistake when they admit into their working ranks ministers, ex-ministers, or lovers of obscene lies.

Would an envious Bee rise "above public reproach" by stinging the most industrious Bee in the radical hive, and at a time, too, when the said Bee was confined and helpless in an enemy's cell? With now and then one for an example, we can record the real cause of the first division in the Liberal hive.

Dictatorial and ministerial selfish rule or ruin will account for the present obscene interregnum. B.

SIOUX FALLS, DAKOTA, Dec. 23, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find money order for three dollars for renewal of my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for another year. I hav been your silent subscriber ever since you started THE TRUTH SEEKER in Paris, Ill. I hav also taken the Index almost from its first issue until Abbot, actuated by pure jealousy, commenced his wanton attack upon you. I then dropped him and the Index like a hot potato.

I hav heard a few lisps about stopping THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am an old Infidel, sixty-eight. If my advice is worth anything I would say, Nail your colors to the mast-head, lash yourself to the helm, and, with a little pecuniary aid from your Liberal friends—and they are legion—and with the indomitable Macdonald for first mate, you will make the gallant TRUTH SEEKER ship ride out the storm of Christian hate and persecution, and anchor in the grand haven of Freethought and mental freedom.

Yours truly, CALVIN GRISWOLD.

ANTWERP, O., Dec. 8, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: My answer to D. M. Bennett's honest, candid letter in THE TRUTH SEEKER is a money order inclosed to pay my subscription for 1880, also for the large-size bust of R. G. Ingersoll. I am sorry I am not able to donate money to help sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I am going to try to sell as many of your publications as possible. I hav a good many Spiritualistic friends (not Bundyites) that I am going to labor among, and I hope to get you many subscribers. Yours respectfully,

MRS. H. S. LIDDELL.

WALL LAKE, IOWA, Dec. 2, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Find inclosed two dollars to pay up for THE TRUTH SEEKER until January 2, 1880.

As Mr. Bennett wishes it, I want you to assure him of my heartfelt sympathy in this, his hour of trial. I hav not the faintest notion of giving up THE TRUTH SEEKER. Please score one opposite my name.

I think it is hard to find a man who has not, at some time or other, committed some little indiscretion that he would not like to hav examined too closely.

I am very sorry that Mr. Bennett's "skeleton" has been dragged from its closet. But let it pass. I don't think very many of his friends are going to desert him.

Let Mr. Bennett remember what my immortal countryman, Robert Burns, says in one of his epistles to I. Ranken:

"Hypocrisy, in mercy spare it!
That holy robe, Oh, dinna tear it!
Spar't for their sakes wha aften wear it—
The lads in black.
But your curst wit when it comes near it
Rives't aff their back.
Think, wicked sinner, wha ye're skaithing;
It's just the blue gown, badge, an' clathing.
O saunts, tak that ye lea'e them naething
To ken them by
Frae ony unregen'rate heathen
Like you or I."

If it had not been for his "curst wit" in letting daylight through this same holy robe, he would not be where he is to-day.

And now, as I hav been quoting Burns, I would recommend Abbot, Bundy, and others of that ilk to carefully peruse his address "to the unco guid, or rigidly righteous," and take heed to its teachings.

I am, sir, yours in the fight against hypocrisy,

JOHN WILSON.

SAGINAW CITY, Dec. 16, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I cordially agree with you in your reply to Bro. Dunning's ideas, expressed in his letter, advising Mr. Bennett to resign. Is Mr. Dunning, or any other member of the N. L. L., better qualified to fill the office than D. M. Bennett? Does it show that Liberalism that we profess, when one of our best men commits a fault and asks pardon of all, both of friends and foes, to say we forgive him, but, to please his most inveterate enemies, wish him to step down and out? Consistency, thou art a jewel! I should consider myself Comstocked if I had any less respect for Mr. Bennett on account of a little human nature coming to the surface. He is wise and too powerful for hypocrites to crush. Find inclosed one dollar to help the good cause. W. G. ELM.

MOMENCE, ILL., Dec. 27, 1879.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I hav always prized "Letters from Friends" very much, and still you hav improved on them. One man writes that Bennett treated Abbot uncourteously. I never observed anything of the kind, but entirely the opposite, until necessity compelled him in self-defense. Why should that friend in Michigan, Dunning, attempt to so degrade one of the best of men? It must hav been thoughtlessly done. I know nothing of Mr. Bennett's requiring forgiveness. If that is all the quarrel he ever had with his wife, they are a pair out of a thousand; and a man getting deceived by a blackmail game makes no crime on his part, and he was badly deceived. Such good dispositions are apt to be imposed upon.

Just read Bundy's and Abbot's testimony to the woman's heavenly character. I do not like any comparison between Bennett and Abbot. There is none between truth and falsehood. Consider Abbot's entirely false pretense as to agree with Mr. Bennett about the petition to Congress, just for an excuse to help Comstock to destroy THE TRUTH SEEKER to save his bread and butter, without doubt; and his mussy-pussy about going to Syracuse to accommodate the League with a splendid candidate for office, and then flirt out like a mad child to seek protection because the League elected a great and worthy man.

I could not account for Abbot's having any followers till I learned that the Index was owned by a stock company. I wonder if they are too proud of their numbers and success to associate with our truth-seeking old Bennett.

Truly yours, W. F. DENNIS.

MR. AND MRS. D. M. BENNETT AND E. MACDONALD, My Dear Friends: Your very kind and esteemed letter of recent date I found on my return on the 20th inst. Yes, you were correct in supposing that I had not seen Mr. Bennett's "Fourth Letter" at the time of my writing in explanation of this mountain labor which brought forth less than a mouse.

Shame on those villainous cowards for this fire in the rear. Instead of accomplishing Bennett's fall, they hav given him strength; and the rebound, if it does not utterly destroy them, brings them down below the respect of all honorable men as well as true Liberals. There is nothing that can ever raise them to respect or wipe the foul stain from humanity save the plea of insanity.

Their conduct has been so shamefully at variance with all that can be called honorable, that but little additional evidence is required to impress candid and thinking men that their base envy and jealousy of Bennett's success, popularity, and unparalleled increasing circulation and patronage hav dethroned their reason. And in confirmation of this opinion, I hav just finished reading an article from one of these delectable disciples of purity as given to the Chicago Inter-Ocean of December 10th, which I will inclose, wherein he characterizes the supporters of Bennett as "Freelovers, tag-rag, and bobtail." I hope you will giv the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER the benefit of at least a portion of it.

I will say to Mr. Underwood in all sincerity that I consider him partially insane. No man of sound reason, with a knowleged of his own practice and teaching, could be so imprudent as to bandy the epithets he has so unjustly and unwisely done. How long, Mr. Underwood, since you had the moral courage to publicly denounce the tyranny and injustice of society in holding woman to a strict observance of prenuptial chastity, saying at the same time that it was not required or expected of man? There is a terrible tyranny that you hav been for some time suffering, which I forbear to mention, though you well understand, and which in time brings moral cowardice, and the two are indigenous of that which an honorable man will detest. I was again pained to hav a man that I had once loved as an only son abuse me and nine-tenths of the Liberals of our land because they gave support to Mr. Bennett, for it was that support for which you abused them.

Yes, then, I am a supporter of Mr. Bennett, and shall continue to be so long as I liv and he continues to labor so bravely for the happiness of man. Pile up epithets and obscenity chin-deep if you wish; I had rather wade through the whole of it than wear the dishonor your conduct justly merits of a sane man. Again, I say, plead insanity, confess, do works meet for repentance, and come back to the fold and be forgiven.

I will again forward, in a day or two, $5.00 to aid THE TRUTH SEEKER. Be assured, my dear friends, you will not be forgotten, and justify your course fully. The little mistake amounts to nothing, and should not be considered. I am surprised you ever thought of stepping down and out. No, no, my dear sir; never giv up the ship. Not a man can be found to say that, and the ladies that are ladies, and not prudes, say no twice, and hold up both hands for you, saying, What a splendid example for many a sinner! And further, I say, recall that hasty resignation, and not gratify that creature, Abbot, who is mad, and who produced insanity upon Underwood.

Fraternally and truly your friend, D. R. BURT.

I MAY BE WRONG.

MOREHEAD, IOWA.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: When I first heard of those letters I didn't believe the report—I could not believe it. When you acknowledged that you did write them I was much surprised; I felt, as I feel yet, that it was a misfortune to the cause of Freethought. I thank you with all my heart for your brave and honorable confession. Your letter, in which you confessed, is a good composition—the words ring with honesty and truth "with its shirt off." I don't feel mad at Mr. Abbot or Mr. Bundy. Let us not, dear sirs, be hasty to sever the ties of friendship with such men as B F. Underwood. You who write letters in THE TRUTH SEEKER, you don't know how much I love to read your letters, but let us be cautious; let us guard our own tongue and dispositions, for I fear that many of us who really think we are liberal, charitable, and tolerant, are bigoted and coarse. A lover of truth and progress,

J. C. CARTWRIGHT.

UNIONVILLE, CAL., Nov. 29, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT: Yes, we will support THE TRUTH SEEKER. The R.-P. Journal has had all the money from me it will ever get. Hav been a subscriber for years, used to lend and pass it around, but now burn it since it has fallen so low. Am going to support the just all the time. You are possessed of more truth than Comstock the infamous, and the Bundy-Abbot-Colgate clique, combined.

Hayes ought to be ashamed of himself! I would rather suffer unjustly, as you do, than be in the place of Hayes and be as unjust as he is. I wish all manner of confusion to your enemies. Cheer up! you will liv to put them all to shame yet. Your sincere friend, E. T. SLIGHT.

RESPONSE TO MRS. H. L. LAKE.

ANCORA, N. J., Nov. 30, 1879.

DEAR SISTER: Your noble letter in TRUTH SEEKER of Nov. 15th calls forth an answer from the depths of my innermost soul.

"How are we to liv in accord with our deepest convictions." Yea, to you, to me, and other earnest women the longing heart of humanity comes questioning. And oh, my sister, we must answer. Woman must inaugurate a movement in which the conditions of true life will be provided for. This is impossible in the present state of society. We are slaves to the money power, the foundation of which rests upon a system of social despotism! What, then, is our duty?

We must organize industrial homes upon the principles of associative life. Laborers must employ themselves! Our grand hero D. M. Bennett and the noble, brave TRUTH SEEKER will be sustained to aid us.

Shall I send for publication the constitution of an associative movement which I am trying to assist a few brave souls to inaugurate? Faithfully your sister and co-laborer.

SADA BAILEY.

ROCKFORD, ILL., Dec. 29, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Allow me to offer a word in behalf of our good brother incarcerated in that "Christian institution," and still held there at bigotry's behest. Smitten with falsehood and misrepresentation by the cowardly assassin, with the time-serving popularity-seekers bringing up the rear, I am cheered by the effort of that grand Liberal army that hav sprung to his defense.

Notably among these are Leland, Jamieson, and Severance, with many others who hav dipped their pens in righteous indignation or just retribution. Who of us would hav expected to find Peebles, Stebbins, Tuttle, and Underwood lending a hand to the modern juggernaut, lest the old hero should escape unscathed. Thankful am I, that in our Liberal ranks are found the burnished metal and the polished steel, rigorously wielding the sword of truth or diamond-pointed pen, dealing unflinching justice to these cowardly souls of men.

That confession bears upon its face the stamp of truth. If all could be ostracized for like mistakes or weightier ones, who would stand outside the list?

That these private matters hav been lugged out, inflated, and held up to public gaze, is evidence conclusive of their search in vain for crime, revealing less of human selfishness and more of the divine, than is found in one of many thousand of the consecrated crew, who are said to lift up holy hands and bring the truth to view. So we say to our truth speaker, We will stand by you, and your TRUTH SEEKER in the home sphere, by voice or pen, and the stuff that moves the affairs of men. Feeling assured that this effort to sink you in the turbid pool of prejudice will serve only as the refining ordeal that uplifts the human to the sphere attractive to the good and true.

Moreover, you are not the only one who by this ordeal may discern their friends, and discerning these I trust the added ones to your domain will be great indeed.

Truly your friend, MRS. P. LILLIBRIDGE.

WILLIAMSTOWN, VT., Dec. 30, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $10; $3 to renew my subscription for 1880, and seventy-five cents for a copy of Mr. Graves' new book, "Sixteen Saviors or None," and also two or three copies of "Anthony Comstock, his Career of Crime and Cruelty;" the remainder to use as you choose. In regard to the course taken by enemies to crush you, the best I can say is, We indorse the sentiments expressed in the numerous letters published in THE TRUTH SEEKER, which we read with great pleasure. We feel the greatest indignation at the injustice of your imprisonment. That, and the more than double infliction heaped upon you by those from whom you had a right to expect better things, is beneath all humanity.

Abbot must hav felt that he was under a crushing burden when he sought the help of five thousand able bodied men to sustain it. And so of all the rest that hav taken upon themselves the big job of proclaiming to the world that a man, now shut up in prison (for no crime), did, some time in the past, write some letters to a woman that were not quite as discreet as they might hav been. Surely they all must need rest after such a mighty effort.

We think Comstock had a hand in concocting the hash that has been so profusely served up. We commend the course you hav taken and think time will prove that you hav been wiser than your enemies. To Mrs. Beunett we would say, You hav acted the part of a noble woman, and we hope you and your noble husband will liv many years to enjoy each other's society, and continue the work you are so well fitted for.

As one of the jury in your case, I would say, Step not down nor out, but retain your place as editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. You may reckon me a life subscriber unless the war closes before my exit. Although I am now nearly eighty-one I want to liv to see the end of this unholy crusade. I long to hear that you are released, as you ought to be, from your cruel imprisonment. That you hav our heartfelt sympathy you may be assured. Pardon the length of this epistle. Yours sincerely,

ROBERT and AZENATH W. SEAVER.

MANTENO, Nov. 27, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find $3 00 to renew my subscription to the great lover of Liberalism—THE TRUTH SEEKER. I had occasion to peruse the last publication of the Index containing the base and cowardly indictment of yourself for a trivial love-matter which concerns neither him nor the great cause of Liberalism. They may think they hav made a great discovery and struck a great blow, but they are severely mistaken, for they hav only showed the deformity of their character, and the baseness of their disposition, which is contemptible beyond description. I can see nothing but malice with a vengeance as the bottom motive of all this great slanderous tirade. Col. Bundy, the valiant soldier, self-promoted general-in-chief in this grand array of slander, with F. E. Abbot for his staff, made, in their infamous reproduction, a strategetical move to captivate the affection of the noble army that are battling under the banner of freedom against intolerance and persecution; but when D. M. Bennett, their frank and truthful leader, discovered and unfolded their treacherous design, they were deposed and sentenced to be buried in oblivion, until the day of resurrection as announced by their co-partner in persecution, whose sweet motto is, Believe or be damned.

It is a pity they couldn't succeed, for their great point in view was to treacherously supplant you, and become master of the battle-field, but our indomitable hero and martyr in time frankly outgeneraled them, so their fate is, Believe or be damned. D. M. Bennett will remain forever their peer. I must add, in justice to yourself, that I think you hav acted nobly in the frank and manly acknowledgement of your mistake, which is a common infirmity of human nature; therefore, believing as I do, that no man yet has lived to be of your age without committing a few mistakes I flinch not to extend the right hand of fellowship, and say, Go on and guide as you hav in the past the grand ark of progress, disperse the clouds of darkness, and disseminate indiscriminately light for the blind as well as for those that can see, and food for those who are starving on the rubbish of Christianity.

I would add one word of advice. There has been carried on through the Liberal press a great deal of personal denunciation which works detrimentally to the Liberal cause, I think, for it is incongenial to the principles of Liberalism, and whoever will be first to set the example of dropping out entirely from their editorial publication such detestable matters, will be worthy our utmost respect and eternal remembrance. It has attained such proportion that an undue share of all the Liberal papers are sated and burdened with the detestable stuff, disinterested readers in those quarrels are worried and disgusted with it. I would not include in the abuse your defense contained in the last issue, for I think it was appropriate and necessary, but the sooner you drop those two bigots, Bundy and Abbot, the better. All you need do with them is to let them have free use of the rope. Yours truly, PETRO.

AN OPEN LETTER.

BELLEVILLE, KANSAS.

F. E. ABBOT, J. C. BUNDY, AND A. COMSTOCK, Sirs: I am in receipt of copies of your publications containing each several columns of copied and editorial slime and filth, especially designed by you, as I believe, to crush and blacken if possible, not only the reputation but the character of that noble, untiring champion of liberty, justice, and humanity, D. M. Bennett.

I saw, by the first glance at those detestable charges made in your polluted sheet, too plainly manifest the cloven footprints of this most inhuman trio. A most glorious trinity! eminently worthy so noble a cause. Are ye men, or are ye demons in human shape? Did ye never learn in youth, nor thus far in adolescence, that of all the dastardly acts done, that of striking or stabbing a stricken, fallen foe is the meanest?

O ye pitiable things (for men I cannot call you)! hav you no sense of shame left? Is there not left one spark of manly honor? From my heart I pity you, and from sheer tenderness as for misguided youth, I advise you that, for the sake of outraged humanity, you do, on bended knees, prostrate yourselves, and humbly beg pardon, not of an imaginary being, but of our betrayed, outraged Liberal fraternity. Then try to liv as pure and true men as he whom you hav so foully and fiendishly beset and vilified; thus in time you may regain the esteem you once enjoyed of honest men.

Whatever may hav been Mr. Bennett's weakness, he most nobly shows by his candid confession his part in our common human nature, acknowledges his frailty, his error, at that time, but no criminality stains his fair escutcheon. And right here let me say, for his encouragement, that his was as grand and noble a confession as ever fell from the lips or pen of mortal; and it raised him high above most other good men in my estimation. Honest, brave old hero, go on in your good work for humanity. I, for one at least, will not forsake you, while thus worthy, so long as I hav a voice to raise or a crumb to share.

Inclosed I send ten dollars to be applied as per inclosed order. I am, with pity for the trio, and a tender regard for the hero and martyr, a lover of truth and justice,

H. PATRICK, M.D.

NAUVOO, ILL., Dec. 23, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed three dollars, the renewal of my subscription, due since the 1st of July last. I hav been a careful reader of this worthy paper since its issue, and am conscientious in asserting great instruction has been the result of it. But why is this state of things, that when men are gifted with greater knowledge concerning the welfare of the human race, they are scorned and persecuted in every shape or form? Surely this great nation of ours acknowledges the great progressive element of scientific experiences that prevails! Delay in every branch of professional industry and through all great intellectual minds is the result of additional comfort and blessings to humanity. For evidences of the facts, I would say, let us look back to the situation of the past, when the church was supreme, and then compare the result of a century of freedom. Ought not this to be enough to convince the people of any creed that free thought, free speech, free press, and free mails are the natural result of human civilization—the birthright of man and woman?

And yet when I think that in the last quarter of the nineteenth century men are persecuted for opinion's sake, and when I read that the editor, D. M. Bennett, is incarcerated in a penitentiary for publishing THE TRUTH SEEKER, a journal devoted to science, morals, Freethought, and human happiness, I say it is the most unjust and unreasonable conviction ever inflicted on this great advocate of mental liberty.

Through all history, freedom, or what constitutes the rights of man, has always been the prey of Christianity; for this reason I oppose the teachings of theology. It does not accord to others the same right that it claims for itself.

Liberalism, as Liberals understand it, is the inspiration of the mind—the right to use our five senses for the best motives of useful knowledge. For instance, our mind, in order to acquire knowledge, we must necessarily think, and this is done through the mind, and nobody in the world has control of any intelligent mind unless it is oppressed by power. Hence I wish to remark right here that oppression is inconsistent with the command of Christ where it says in the Bible to do unto others as you would hav others do unto you. Well, this is a good and practicable precept; but, on the other hand, when I read in this so-called sacred book, "Believe or be damned," then I say that every word of that sentence is not in accord and harmony with the other precept, for the former teaches benefaction, while the latter teaches malediction. Yet we are told to believe all that book contains. Well, Freethinkers believe what is fair and reasonable, not because it is in the Bible, but because it is a natural inheritance of human feelings and wisdom. We hav sciences which giv us facts of the why and wherefore of things. Yours respectfully, A. LINGE.

WORCESTER, MASS., Dec. 22, 1879.

MY DEAR BENNETT: Two hundred and fifty-nine years ago to-day the Pilgrim Fathers landed at Plymouth and commenced that nationality which has culminated in the present American nation, with its laws, liberties, and religion.

It has taken the long period of over two and a half centuries to produce from puritanical seed even two men who hav embodied the moral courage to face an ostracizing community with an open and acknowledged admission of their private faults.

It cannot be that you and Franklin are the only men that American ecclesiastical stirpiculture has produced which hav committed errors or made mistakes; that you two should stand out alone—Franklin in the last, and you in the present, century—to tell mankind that you hav erred in judgment and practice, and that you, after seeing your errors, reformed and warned mankind not to get wrecked on the same or similar shoals.

Franklin, in his "Autobiography," tells the reader of his faults, and thereby disarms the critic upon his youthful errors of the poison which his pen was meant to impart. And you, too, in your prison cell, promptly drew the fire from your enemy's guns by publicly placing the lighted fuse of truth to the charge which they had surreptitiously extracted from your private record.

Go on, my friend, and take courage in the resolution of well doing, and remember that the moral light which beams from behind your prison bars has dispersed the lecherous darkness of your accusers, and, like the priests in the ancient story, they hav covered their faces and fled from the rays of truth thrown upon them by your frank and open statement.

Many of your friends saw the storm gathering and knew not what would be the effect, for they did not know what hidden rocks lay beneath the unexplained record; but the lightning's flash, the thunder's peal, and the terrific storm hav come and gone, and leave a calm and placid sea of public respect for you. And I thank you most heartily for thus showing to the world that seeming errors and wrongs may be overcome and that humanity may rise higher than selfish ambition; that public sentiment, when gazing into a chasm of mistakes and even seeming crimes, can be calmed by that high morality which is the fruit of honesty, truthfulness, and manly courage—that courage which dares to face responsibility and censure and fears to falsify more than it fears the scorn of mankind. Such qualities shine like sunbeams, and will always burn away the clouds which gather from error and ill-judged action, leaving radiant the better qualities of the new-born effort of a progressive soul.

SAN FRANCISCO, CAL., Dec. 22, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I hav just been reading in your issue of Dec. 13th the letter of Juliet H. Severance, M.D., and I want to say "Amen" so loud that all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER may hear, and I want to say to Bro. Peebles, I hope that he and I may liv long enough to attend just such a convention, for then justice will hav been done to all of those charges. Till then the spirits of those who hav been crushed through just such wrongs will find mediums to speak for their friends here.

LOIS WAISBROOKER.

DELPHI, N. Y., Dec. 25, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT, Dear Sir: I address you as if you were at your desk in THE TRUTH SEEKER office. Inclosed please find $12 00, for which send copy of "Thomas Paine's Complete Works," etc., according to directions, and oblige an old subscriber who took your first paper and who intends it shall liv in spite of your arch-enemies, Comstock, Abbot, Bundy, and the devil. They hav done their worst, and THE TRUTH SEEKER still lives.

Go on, Bro. Macdonald; you conduct the campaign well. The time will soon come when our chief will be with you; then I trust that trinity of smut scavengers will hie to their dens and be heard of no more forever. I see by Bennett's last letter he is writing a work in the penitentiary. You may depend on me for a copy when ready to mail.

Fraternally yours, HIRAM MCCLURE.

Mr. Pike's Letter.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed find post-office money order for thirteen dollars—three dollars to renew my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880, and ten dollars donation to THE TRUTH SEEKER for this month. Yours for truth and humanity,

The Quaker and the Skeptic.

BY NEMO.

A college bred-youth, conceited and vain,
Met an honest Quaker one day,
And began, in the usual strain,
The old Infidel role to play.

The Bible, forsooth, he could not believe,
And freely asserted the fact;
But still he was willing quite to receive
Any proof of each word and act.

When the Quaker had heard the youth awhile,
He ventured a question or two,
And adapted himself to the skeptic's style,
Which indeed it was right to do.

To lead him along, the Quaker inquired
If he ha any doubt in his mind
That a place called France existed? If so,
What proof could he possibly find?

"I hav not seen France, it is true," he said,
"But some of my friends hav been there,
And they all establish what I hav read—
And most reliable men they are."

"Then I understand thee, my friend, to say
That thyself or friends must see
A certain thing as clear as day,
Ere thou wilt believe it can be?"

"Of course," the skeptic answered at once,
"A thing must be seen to be known;
Without such evidence none but a dunce
A simple assertion would own."

The Quaker, to squelch the youth, took some pains,
As touching the question of "sight,"
And inquired, "Had he ever seen his own brains?"
The skeptic said, "No," which was right.

Still two questions more the Quaker proposed
To the first one quite apropos—
Requesting the skeptic, if so disposed,
To answer them—yes or no.

"Pray, hast thou seen those who thy brains hav seen?"
And he answered "No," as desired.
Then the Quaker inquired with sarcasm keen,
"Hast thou brains?" And this youth retired.
Madison, Ga. —The Madisonian.

REMARKS BY T. C. L.

That "college-bred youth" was only half bred,
And less than half baked, I dare say;
A college-bred youth with some brains in his head
Won't admit a good case all away.

He was bred, no doubt, in a pious college,
Where young twigs are bent, and where grew
The most stunted of all trees of knowledge,
And the crookedest views of what's true.

That Quaker, too, differs in faith and in style
From the Friends that are met hereaway;
Their old Bible has gone to the rubbish pile,
And their "inner light's" brighter to-day.

Our Quaker and youth would agree to a T
That proof is the stuff for belief;
But it is not all of proof to see
We feel, we hear, we reason, in brief.

When our reason and senses concur, in proof
That a Bible or creed isn't so,
By all that is under the sky-lit roof,
That error has got to go.

If a doctrine agrees with our reason,
Can't we properly say that we see it?
If to old ways of thinking that's treason,
We can't help the logic—so be it.

Can't you see your own brains? then butt 'gainst a wall;
Bless your stars! if you've brains you will see 'em;
But that proof try on sins born of Adam's fall.
You can't, like squirrels, tree 'em.

Can't you see the kernel concealed in a nut?
Whack away with a stone on the shell;
But pounding the Book till your occiput
Turns gray won't crack out hell.

Send a postal to France for Gambetta,
And be sure, by return of first mail,
Back will come in due time a prompt letter
With response to your wish in detail.

But try on the God of old Isaac
A message or prayer or the news;
Guess you'll wait till the day that you die sick
'Fore you get the first line of his views.

See the cable, so deep 'neath the breaker!
Send dispatch: "How are you, my dear Vic."
Place your ear, O most orthodox Quaker:
"Right smart," she'll reply pretty quick.

But a telegram send to the God of old Mose,
Whose lightning-shop runs in the sky:
How 'bout those "mistakes," if he only knows.
And when will there come a reply?

The lords of earth deign answer to your prayer;
The Lords up above are all dumb;
Those treat their subjects on the square;
These put you off till kingdom come.

Bundy.

BY MRS. C. H.

The man who does the "weeding" of society,
Who is the gardener in the moral world.
Who knows each human plant in its variety,
From every weed upon this planet hurled.

Whose special work this tyro self-elected,
Is to be umpire of impure and pure;
Whose definition of morality selected
Means "social evil," not its cure.

If nuisances and nastiness are purely
What doth pertain to sexual functions, then
The "weeds" infesting all the world can surely
Not be deteeted from the "plants" 'mong men.

And when this gardener begins up-pulling.
If he do justice to his settled plan,
He'll weed this planet without stop or fooling,
Till he has cleansed it of each morfal man.

If God had only been as pure as Bundy,
He'd made each man and woman free of sex,
And marked them holy as a Jewish Sunday,
No matter what foul stuff went down their necks.

No plaudit can be found for man's excesses,
But if one man is but a "pint cup," then
That man whom larger measure nature blesses
Is an excessive nuisance to his ken.

But does it follow in the rule of justice,
That this pint measure shall be always fixed
As standard; and all that o'erflows it lust is,
And loudly labeled "nastiness" unmixed?

This self-styled judge of human pureness shows us,
Each time he pulls a weed his "central thought;"
Prurient as a prude who simply throws us
His own foul likeness in the rogue he caught.

The inner consciousness of every liver
Can only be umpire of his own acts.
Doubt not, ye critics, that this just law-giver
Will separate the falsehoods from the facts.

Book Notices.

GENESIS I–II.: An Essay on the Bible Narrative of Creation, by Augustus R. Grote, A. M. New York: Asa K. Butts, 1880. Price, 50 cents. For sale at this office.

In this pamphlet we hav a version of the two myths, the Elohistic and the Yahvistic, as contained in the first and second chapters of Genesis. The snake and his successful initiation of the woman and man into the knowledge of good and evil, though a part of the second myth, are left out. But the interpolations made to locate Eden as Babylonia are retained, and, we notice, translated very broadly. Accompanying the text is the Hebrew original in Roman letter, expressing the Masoretic perversions in the completest Portuguese style.

A literary criticism of much acute erudition follows. The first, or Elohistic account, begins with chaos, like the Greek cosmogony; and the six days express the differentiations of the creation. It "was probably committed to writing by an Israelite belonging to the northern tribes, of which the tribe of Ephriam was the most powerful. Among these tribes the worship of Yahveh was not introduced until the time of King Josiah of the southern kingdom. All passages that giv prominence to Joseph and his descendants are Elohistic; while the passages which detail the ritual of the tabernacle or temple, the office of the priests and Levites, which giv prominence to the tribes of Judah, are Yahvistic, and must hav had a Levite as their author."

The "Testimony of Archæology," the next chapter of the little monograph, is more explicit and instructive. The author calls to our attention "that the contents of these two accounts of Genesis were not the sole property of the Hebrews, but the development out of a common body of Semitic tradition." Then giving an outline of the "Chaldean Account of the Genesis," as rendered by Mr. George Smith, he remarks its likeness with the Hebrew story, and shows that much which the latter omits is exhibited in the writings of the prophets.

"Parallel Myths" constitutes another chapter. We hav the Orphean and Hesiodic legends of Chaos, Gaia, and Uranus, also of Prometheus; then the Brahman (Sinhalic?) story of Adima and Heva, and their disobedience; the cosmogony of Sanchoniathon, the account of Berosus, the Persian legend of Mashia and Mashinah, and the Norse myth Ymir, "all petrified descriptions of natural processes expressed in the figurative language of undeveloped minds lacking the power of abstraction." This explains Greek mythology, Hindoo, and other Aryan legends. "Why not likewise the Semitic legends?"

The next division is the endeavor to answer this question by "The Testimony of Facts." First, we are reminded that Genesis is not homogeneous in its composition. The Elohistic and Yahvistic accounts contradict each other. In the first, man is said to be created male and female; in the other, Adam is formed, and afterward a woman out of his side. One account represents man as made in the likeness of the Elohim; in the other he becomes "as the Elohim, knowing good and evil" only by transgression.

To define the six days as indefinite periods is proof of a want of exact thought, an effort to reconcile an exploded statement with the new facts, rather than cut loose from demonstrated error. Again, "the relation between the earth and sun, as we gather it from astronomical sources, is a different one from that intended by the account in Genesis. The record of the rocks tells us unmistakably that plants and animals hav flourished through untold ages side by side, new forms succeeding old ones. But in Genesis the creation of trees and shrubs took place in a period perfectly distinct from animals. The paleontologist must then reject the account of Genesis as perfectly incredible."

After these premises and demonstrations, Prof. Grote, in conclusion, contends that the literal teaching of the story of creation, as found in Genesis, and which we meet preeminently in Sunday-school catechisms, is injurious in its effect upon the mind, and an impediment to intellectual advancement. It contradicts our discoveries.

The Bible throughout recognizes the so-called Ptolemaic astronomy. It is no explanation of the origin of the sun, moon, or man. The story that things as they are were miraculously made so is only another way of stating that they are because they are. If Genesis and its fairy tales of creation could be taken out of the Sunday-school, there would be an immense gain to the future intelligence of our people.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE; or, The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun. By Kersey Graves, of Richmond, Indiana. Being a reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

FRIEND EDITOR: I hav just read Kersey Graves's last great work, "Sixteen Saviors or None," and must say that he has more completely used up his opponent than any other author I hav read. He not only upsets every argument of Mr. Perry but turns his guns back on himself till he really seems to be less than an infinitesimal nothing. One by one Mr. Graves takes up his authorities and attempted points and shows them to be falsely rendered, or else successfully uses them as proofs for his own side.

His "ecclesiastical court" is one of the most interesting trials on record. The great merit we all admire in Mr. Graves as a writer is the systematic arrangement of his facts, arguments, and points. Whoever reads a work of his will discover on reaching the close of it that he has a perfect, beautiful, and complete map of the whole thing spread out before him, on which he can find at a moment's notice any special point, plea, or argument, and in the best possible shape, too.

This book is not only, in my humble judgment, a complete refutation of Mr. Perry's "great blow," but it is brimful of scraps of valuable information gathered from high-priced oriental literature, which is itself inaccessible to so many of us. It also abounds in short, sharp, pointed anecdotes which clinch the arguments with double force, while they at the same time add wit, life, spirit, and humor to the whole thing.

If any one can read this book of Mr. Graves's and not believe that nearly all nations in all ages had their God-born saviors, with pure virgin mothers, his intellect must be wofully stultified, cramped, and blinded by the cut and dried theology he has imbibed with his mother's milk, and which has been nourished and fostered with the closed eyes and unreasoning acceptance of one who seeks not with earnest, studious, persistent efforts the pure, holy, and bright gem of truth, but rather prefers the quiet calm and easy-flowing tide of public popularity.

Let us hope that the "Sixteen Saviors or None" will hav a fast, rapid, and quick sale, both for the sake of the industrious and indefatigable writer, who has given us so many valuable Liberal works, and for that of the publisher, our brave hero and champion, D. M. Bennett, who, though suffering a cruel and unjust imprisonment with criminals and felons, for simply writing, speaking, and printing just such truths as this volume contains, is still sending out from behind the shadows of the prison bars book after book just as fast as they can be issued from the press. He is "the power behind the throne" that givs us our beloved TRUTH SEEKER and its whole train of glorious and blessed concomitants, of which this book of Mr. Graves's is one. I hope all who can will buy the book, and that all who sell Liberal works will add it to their list, thus helping to make grand and glorious the prison cell that was designed by our enemies as a stigma and disgrace upon one of the greatest and most effective workers our cause has ever owned. ELMINA DRAKE SLENKER.

THOMAS BAILLY POTTER, Member of the English Parliament, now in this country, says of the laboring people of England: "Our working classes cannot obtain employment, and are literally in a starving condition. Here is a letter which I received last month from the poor people of my own borough, showing how extremely desperate is their present condition. It reads as follows: 'We, the poor of Rochdale, send you this note to inform you of our deep distress We are on the verge of the grave through hunger and want. The slackness of trade in this town is awful. We look to you as our advocate and member of Parliament, confident that you will do something to alleviate our sufferings and we shall be in duty bound to pray for your long life and success.' I believe that this picture of the life of the working people of England is not exaggerated, and this country might do a great deal to help them by lowering its tariffs so as not to impede commerce. All they ask is that you take their goods in return for the food you furnish them."

Advertisements.

RATES:

We will insert advertisements at the rate of 75 cents per inch for the first insertion, and 50 cents per inch for subsequent insertions. For advertisements running over one month, or more than four inches, we will giv special rates. Parties wishing to advertise can write their copy and send it, saying how many inches they wish it to make, and we will display accordingly. No extra charge for cuts. We take all reasonable precautions against having our friends imposed on by disreputable advertisers; but we are not responsible for the honesty of any advertiser unless we say so editorially. Editorial puffs are not for sale. Humbugs, if we know it, will not be advertised at any price.

TERMS:

Unless we are acquainted with parties, we require cash at the time of ordering advertisements. All can easily reckon the cost by the above rates.

TO LIBERALS WHO ADVERTISE:

We ask our Liberal friends who are doing business to remember us. The paper is read by at least twenty-five thousand people every week, and the circulation is steadily increasing. By advertising with us you will not only make money for yourselves, but benefit the paper, which needs all the help it can get to stem the tide of intolerance. It is better for Liberals to patronize their own papers, for by so doing they not only advance their own interests, but help support papers which advocate their principles and diffuse truth throughout the land.

KERSEY GRAVES,

Having been engaged most of the time for several years past in writing, now proposes to enter the field as a speaker in the service of the National Liberal League in Ohio, Indiana, Illinois, Michigan, Missouri, and other states. Write to him for particulars. The following are some of the subjects on which he will speak:

1. The signs of the times, and the rapid progress of Infidelity.
2. Sixteen crucified gods and twenty-seven Bibles.
3. The origin, history, and demise of the devil.
4. The twelve cardinal doctrines of the churches at war with science.
5. The Bible sanctions twenty-seven crimes, and is at war with twenty-six sciences.
6. Some mistakes of Moses and his God.
7. The thousand laughable ideas in the story of creation and salvation.
8. The Bible retards morality, civilization, and the reformation of the world.
9. Jehovah and the devil compared.
10. A sermon—What shall we do to be saved?
11. The real causes and true remedy for the present financially depressed and distressed condition of the country.

And many other subjects.

RECOMMENDATIONS.

We advise everybody—both ladies and gentlemen—to turn out and hear Mr. Graves, for he is really an able and interesting speaker, powerful and eloquent, with spices of wit and eloquence.—The New Era.

He is an eloquent and powerful speaker, with a boundless supply of historical facts and anecdotes.—The Republican.

We hav been highly delighted, instructed, and interested by a course of eight lectures by Kersey Graves, of Richmond, Ind., and we most cheerfully recommend him to the confidence, the hearts, and the homes of the Liberal community.—Alton Progressive Society.

We cordially recommend our estimable brother—with whom some of us hav been long personally acquainted—as a candid, consistent, and powerful speaker, displaying great historical research and logical acumen.—Salem Society of the Friends of Progress.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus "let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sough after.

Gems of Thought.

If you can find no peer to travel with you, then walk cheerfully on alone, your goal before, the world behind; better alone with your own heart than with a crowd of babblers.—Buddha.

The popular definition of a ghost is just the reverse of the truth; it makes one consist of a soul without a body, while really a specter, an illusion, a humbug of the eyesight, and the touch, is a human body not vitalized through and through with a soul.—Star King.

What pleasure is there in pleasure, if quantity is not attended as well as quality? I know nothing more agreeable than a dinner at the Holland House; but it must not begin at ten in the morning and last till six. I should be incapable for the last four hours laughing at Lord Holland's jokes, eating Raffaelli's cakes, or repelling Mr. Allen's attacks upon the church.—Sydney Smith.

Thy soul was like a star, and dwelt apart;
Thou hadst a voice whose sound was like the sea.
Pure as the noted heavens, majestic, free,
So didst thou travel on life's common way
In cheerful godliness, and yet thy heart
The lowliest duties on herself did lay.
—Wordsworth.

Brainless pates are the rule; fairly furnished ones the exception; the brilliantly endowed very rare; genius a portentum [a miracle; a thing to be wondered at]. How otherwise could we account for the fact that out of upwards of eight hundred millions of existing human beings, and after a chronicled experience of six thousand years, so much should still remain to discover, to think out, and to be said? —Schopenhauer.

Of necessity, every new truth is at first in a minority of one; it is a rebellion against the existing system of belief; accordingly, the existing system, ever thinking itself a finality, strives with all the weight of its established organization to crush it out. But by the nature of things, that must happen whether the novelty be a truth or an error. After all, it is only through the appearance of rebels in the social system that progress is effected.—Maudsley.

The world had its childhood, and when it was a child it spoke as a child, it understood as a child, it thought as a child; and, I say again, in what it spoke as a child, its language was true, in that it believed as a child its religion was true. The fault rests with us, if we insist on taking the language of children for the language of men, if we attempt to translate literally ancient into modern language, oriental into occidental speech, poetry into prose.—Muller.

As to other points, what God may hav determined for me I know not; but this I know, that if he ever instilled an intense love of moral beauty into the breast of any man, he has instilled it into mine. Ceres, in the fable, pursued not her daughter with a greater keenness of inquiry than I, day and night, the idea of perfection. Hence, wherever I find a man despising the false estimates of the vulgar, and daring to aspire to what the highest wisdom through every age has taught us as most excellent, to him I unite myself by a sort of necessary attachment.—Milton.

Can that be a true religion which consigned men of holy innocence to the flames because they held that the Son was like unto the Father, but not the same as the Father, or because they would not worship the Virgin and the saints? Can that be a true religion which screened nameless crimes behind the sacred walls of monasteries? Can that be a true religion which taught the eternity of punishment without any hope of pardon or salvation for the sinner, however penitent? People who judge of religions in that spirit will never understand their real purport—will never reach their sacred springs.—Max Muller.

If Christians can assist me to one gleam of truth that I hav not, to one fact I know not, I should glady and joyfully receive the same at their hands. I want evidence more sure than "everlasting hills," for they are finite. Not one hill of all the millions that now exist will prove everlasting. Each and all are slowly disintegrating and becoming leveled down by the continuous friction of wind and water, and the time will come when the last hill that now is will be no longer a hill, though others may take their places in the eternity that is to come. Not one identity is eternal. All that is is subject to change, and matter with its promises and potencies is alone indestructible.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

WOULD YOU BE YOUNG AGAIN?

Would you be young again?
So would not I.
One tear to mem'ry given,
Onward I hie;
Life's dark flood forded o'er,
All put at rest on shore;
Say, would you plunge once more,
With home so nigh?

If you might, would you now,
Retrace your way?
Wander through thorny paths,
Faint and astray?
Night's gloomy watches fled—
Morning all beaming red—
Hope's smile around us shed—
Heavenward—away!

Where are they gone, of yore,
My best delight?
Dear and more dear, though now
Hidden from sight,
Where they rejoice to be,
There is the land for me;
Fly, time, fly speedily;
Come, life and light!

—Boston Courier.

Odds and Ends

IMPROMPTU.

'Tis sweet to love;
But ah, how bitter!
To love a girl
And then not git her!

Mr. Brockbay, while descending the stairs, lost his grip, and counted every step with the seat of his pants. "You're drunk," said Mr. Kendrix, as he scowled upon him. "No I ain't," responded Mr. Brockbay. "Zat's way allus come down stairs."

Drop two shirt-studs while you are undressing, and on the following Sunday one will be found behind the parlor sofa; the other will drop out of the lining of your hat two years later.—Miss Addie Boyd, of Cincinnati Commercial. Drop a hint or a suggestion, and a smart woman like Miss Addie will tumble to it in less than no time at all. How did she find out about those shirt-studs, though?—Hackensack Republican.

"Where can I find my husband?" inquired a woman at police headquarters the other night. "Dunno," replied the official in charge. "What business was he in, banker, or tailor, or what?" "Oh, my husband was a temperance lecturer," was the reply. "Oh! Then you had better inquire in the liquor stores in your own vicinity, my dear madam. I never knew a temperance lecturer to leave his own neighborhood to get drunk."—New York Express.

The fashion of placing the heel of a woman's shoe near the middle of the foot has led to the following in the Springfield Republican:

She passed just now in the falling snow,
And left the print of her dainty shoe;
From the edge of the heel to the pointed toe,
The most I can make is a number two.
Yet her brother showed me her morning slipper—
A number seven, as I'm alive,
And broad in the sole as a Portsmouth skipper.
Now how the d—ce do the girls contrive
To squeeze a hoof like a camel's foot
Into a number two French kid boot?

A Spanish curate having preached with great eloquence against the deadly sin of gluttony, his housekeeper was so much impressed by his discourse that she slipped out, ran to the parsonage, threw the succulent breakfast she had prepared for her master into the pig-pen, and spread the table with herbs and such-like savory messes. The good priest, returning from the church, complained of the Spartan simplicity of his fare, whereupon the housekeeper recalled to his mind the position he had taken in his sermon.

"Juanita," says the good clergyman, "you hav gone to the plaza of a Sunday afternoon to see them dancing, havn't you?"

"Certainly, your reverence."

"Did you ever see the fiddler dance?"

"Never, your reverence; of course not."

"Well, Juanita, I am the fiddler."

SIGNS OF THE SEASONS.

When the wind blows east alway,
And the roads like rink-floors ring,
And you cough and sneeze all day,
Then men say it's "merry spring."

When the rain pours day and night,
Skies look glum, and faces glummer,
And hay fever's at its hight,
Then, of course, it's "glorious summer."

When sole change from catching colds
Is in wondering how you caught 'em,
And gray mist the land infolds,
Then you know it's "genial autumn."

When cold water takes two shapes,
Drenching douche and icy splinter,
And the world's all coats and capes,
Then be sure it's "jolly winter."

INTUITIONAL LOVE.—BY F. FILLMORE.

We stood in the moonlight
While the winnowing wind
Toyed with her tresses
And tempered her mind
To sad, silent musings
Of that gossamer thought
Too frail for fulfilment,
Too chaste to be brought
To the grossness of earth,
And environs that herd
The brain's beautiful beams
With the commonplace word.
Pale ripples of moonlight,
By the soft zephyr's kiss,
Were washed o'er her forehead
In bright billows of bliss
That mirrored her musings,
Then dashed on their way
To the strand of my soul,
There to stay! there to stay!
And my sorrow was bathed
In sweet sympathy's spring;
And its sobs stayed to laugh,
And its sighing to sing;
For I knew that her heart
Beat in rhythm with mine,
Then the moon seemed a lamp
Swung by seraphs divine;
And the muddy decay
Of material eyes
Were swept from their seats,
And the stars of the skies
Were my visual orbs:
While the rhythmical roll
And the music of spheres
Quelled the yearning of youth
And the longing of years.
Oh, thou heaven supernal!
I might still be there had
She not whispered, "Scoot, Johnny!
He's coming! That's dad!"

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good doctor is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. Bennett, Editor of The Truth Seeker. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. Bennett. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By Viscount Amberley, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By Joseph Simms, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By Thomas Paine. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By Thomas Paine. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

Notes and Clippings.

THE Tay Bridge disaster is attributed in many Scotch pulpits to the violation of the Sabbath by its victims. What a God!

PRESIDENT LINCOLN once said that some people not only believe that the earth moves on its own axis, but that they were the axis.

HOMER was a beggar. Spenser died in want. Cervantes died of hunger. Dryden lived in poverty. Joaquin Miller is doing very well.

IT was a Morton Sunday-school boy, who, on being asked what made the tower of Pisa lean, replied, "Because of the famine in the land."

AFTER a Texas jury had stood out for ninety-six hours, the judge got a verdict out of them by sending them word that a circus had come to town.

THE Spiritualists and Liberals of Vermont will hold a mass convention at West Pawlet, Feb. 20, 21, 22, 1880. Mr. E. V. Wilson, of Illinois, will be in attendance.

ALMOST all the mayors of Massachusetts cities speak favorably in their messages of the license system as the best that can be devised to abate the evils of intemperance.

TALK about first families of a city. There was Adam, who belonged to the first family, yet a woman pulled the wool over his eyes and got him in a terrible scrape.—Urbana Union-Democrat.

MR. TENNYSON, of whom it has before been stated that he was a Spiritualist, is said to hav so firm a conviction as to personal immortality that he cannot bear the slightest contradiction on that subject.

THE Dublin Nation says that "the great bulk of English Catholics are among the bitterest foes of Ireland, and no English Protestant exhibits a more eager desire to libel Irishmen at home and abroad."

A VERY good Christian maiden lady, Miss Roxana Brigham, of Marlboro, Mass., refused to eat because she got it into her head that eating was sinful, and so, after nine days of starvation, she died on Saturday of last week.

THE Rev. D. M. Welsman, of the Lutheran charge at Somerset, has been on trial the past week, on a charge of bastardy. The lady was a member of his congregation, and about thirty years of age. The reverend scalawag has been convicted.

W. F. JAMIESON lectured at River Falls, Wis., January 13th, 14th, 15th, 16th, and 17th, and will speak at Ellsworth, 19th and 20th; Omro, 23d, 24th and 25th (Convention); lectures 26th, 27th, 28th, 29th; Frankfort, Mich., February 5th, 6th, 7th, 8th, and 9th. Address Lake City, Minn.

THE REV. W. H. PLEDGE, recently appointed at the Methodist Conference in Augusta to take charge of the church in Atlanta, committed suicide in the Markham House in that city by cutting his throat. He was a minister of prominence and leaves a family. No cause is assigned.

THE Scottish Reformation Society sees a very dark future before Scotland. In its annual report it says: "It shall be written for generations to come that one of the darkest years which Scotland has ever passed through has been the year when her reformation from popery was formally reversed by the re-establishment of the old Catholic hierarchy in her land."

THE Catholics of Ontario, according to the Irish Canadian, intend to bring Vice-Chancellor Blake before Parliament for discriminating against Catholics in his judgments, and especially for remarking, when the Mother Superior of a nunnery appeared to testify before him and gav her name in religion, that "it was one of those fine Italian names employed as a disguise for Bridget Maloney."

THE Springfield Republican throws a damper on church fairs and like gatherings by stating that such things are in violation of the law of the Commonwealth unless they hav been licensed by the Board of Aldermen, just the same as Mr. Barnum's circus, the female minstrels, or any other show where an admission fee is charged. The statute which is quoted seems to sustain the Republican's view of the case.

TWENTY ladies, not far from Mount Vernon street, "chipped in" and bought some lottery tickets. One of them told her minister, and he was shocked. "My dear madam," he exclaimed "do you know that is gambling?" She rattled right along as if she hadn't heard him: "Yes, we are going to draw the $30,000 prize, and if we do, then we've all agreed to giv you $5 000 of it for the new church organ." An excellent idea, my dear madam—excellent! and I devoutly trust you may win."

MRS. MURIEL took great interest in parish affairs. Last year she promised to assist in decorating the parish church. One illuminated text she thought would look well over the chancel screen, and she requested her husband to bring it from town. As might hav been expected, he forgot the text, and wired to his wife for particulars. To the surprise of all the telegraph clerks, this message came flashing over the wires: "Unto us a child is born, nine feet long by two feet broad."

IN a republic as ours, where all religious denominations are free to worship as they wish, the divorce between church and state should be complete. On this point the New Castle (Ind.) Mercury says: "A more perfect sundering of church and state ought to be insisted upon in this country. Men should be elected to office on account of fitness, qualifications, and such general principles as ought to govern in political matters. No man is qualified to be a voter, in the best sense of the term, who allows his church or lodge or society associations to determine his vote."

MOODY and Sankey are engaged in a big religious revival in Cleveland. "The women hav been having meetings," says a special dispatch, "to which Moody and Sankey were the only men admitted, and a reporter, who smuggled himself in and took up a position in a small room adjoining the auditorium, describes the scenes as exceedingly sensational. The women wept copious tears and threw themselves on to the anxious seat in all sorts of positions. All classes were represented, and every grade of piety was given more or less extravagant expression to."

AMONG the provisions of the new California Constitution, those concerning the prosecution of persons accused of crime are now exciting most discussion in that state. The chief function of grand juries will not be the making of indictments, but prosecution may directly follow information after the preliminary examination and commitment of a magistrate. In cases below felony the trial by jury may be waived by the consent of both parties, or the jury may consist of any number less than twelve, mutually agreed upon; but no man, if he so chooses, can be tried any other way than before an old-fashioned jury.

THE Rev. Moorhouse James, of Bedford, England, is dead. About thirty years ago his name was very prominent in England. He was prosecuted in Liverpool for refusing to marry a couple who had been asked at the Superintendent Registrar's office, on the ground that the man had not been confirmed. The trial was regarded as of great importance, the prosecution being instituted by the Registrar-General. In the course of the hearing, the Attorney-General stated that if fourteen or fifteen years previously the church of England had numbered among her clergymen who held the conscientious scruples of Mr. James, Dissenters could not hav been married at all. The jury found a verdict of guilty.

THE Greenback meeting at Washington was opened by a prayer from the Rev. Gilbert De La Matyr. Many of the delegates objected to this, saying they could do whatever praying they considered necessary for themselves. These remarks were regarded by the correspondent of the N. Y. Times as an argument against greenbacks, or at least against the Greenbackers. Prayer, we think, could very properly hav been omitted from an assemblage of Greenbackers, for a large proportion of the party are Liberals; besides, from what we can glean of the Lord from the Bible, his sympathies would be with the bondholder. Silver and gold is the money of the Bible. Jesus was of the common people, and perhaps if he lived now he would be a Greenbacker; but the Lord himself would undoubtedly be for hard money, first, last, and all the time.

A YOUNG man only twenty-seven years of age, and described as a clerk in holy orders, was charged a fortnight ago before a London magistrate with stealing a stole from a church in Tavistock Place, and from other places a pair of field glasses, a gold watch, and a gold pin, the combined value of the four articles being about $40. The stole was afterwards found and the charge withdrawn, but to the stealing of the glasses the prisoner confessed, and they were then produced in court by a pawnbroker with whom they were pawned. The watch was taken from a woman in whose house the curate had lodgings, and when discovered this woman testified that he implored her not to prosecute him, as it "would be his ruin." A cabman, who drove the curate to the police station after his arrest, on returning to his stables noticed that some papers had been torn up in the cab, and found them to be pawn tickets.

WEST PAWLET, Vt., has a preacher who cannot distinguish between blackguarding and preaching. He cannot preach a sermon without slandering every Freethinker from Paine to Ingersoll. Narrow-minded, bigoted, unjust, and a coward, he dares not accept the challenge left there last summer by Captain Brown for a debate, and in that way giv both sides a fair showing. He had rather stand in the "coward's castle" and say that "Tom Paine was not married to the woman with whom he lived," and other kindred stuff, than to hav a man ready to pick up his mistakes and fling his lies back into his teeth. He cannot preach a sermon without berating every decent skeptic in the community. As long as he can get an easy living by throwing out his "chaff" upon a half-witted audience without working, it is all he cares for. Blackguarding seems to be second nature to him, and he blows away and acts as though he thought every lie he tells about Freethinkers will be a star in his crown. The challenge of Capt. Brown stands a monument of his cowardice.

WHAT SORT OF A GOD IS THIS?—Finding Mary was in the condition she was on account of his cuttings-up with her, why didn't God stand by her like a man? Why didn't he get her a doctor and provide her a comfortable room in a first-class hotel or private house? Why did he abandon her? Was he ashamed of her and his prospective progeny? Why did he compel her to undergo the terrible ordeal resultant on her yielding her all to him—that terrible ordeal in the straw, in a stable amongst the hogs and cattle, in the dark, dismal, lonely night, unattended unaccompanied, except by the dumb brutes! with no gentle hand to steady the aguey knee, no pillow to support the aching head! no one to put a cup of water to the quivering lips! no one to offer a word of encouragement or tender sympathy for the poor, inexperienced, betrayed, wronged, ruined, wretched young girl in the throes of terrible and torturing childbirth? What sort of a God is this that cared nothing for his (should be) wife, and his tender, innocent, helpless offspring? Poor God-betrayed Mary! Poor innocent babe! Little had you to thank your heavenly father for. He abandoned you and forced your poor mother into a stable to bring you to life. He subjected you to the hatred of Herod! He provided you no food, no raiment, no lands, no money, no education. He abandoned your poor mother. He never married her nor made her any restitution. He didn't provide for the maintenance of her child, but left him to chance. No, no, poor child; but he raised up enemies about you. He made a fiendish dragon called the devil, and suffered him to drag you into mountains, to starve you, and to fly with you in his claws, like a harmless little chick in the sharp claws of a hook-nosed eagle, to the dizzy roofs of towering edifices! He stood by and suffered the few friends your meekness and goodness had brought about you, through fear of mob violence, to betray, deny, and abandon you; and finally he suffered the mob to murder you! cruelly, insultingly, painfully, tediously, to torture you to death! This is God! This is the all-powerful, just, merciful God to whose glory and worship we devote in one way or another, one-fourth of our time, and upon whom, in multitudinous ways, we lavish at least one-third of the world's wealth! A pretty God, that! Nice fellows, we!—Seymour Times.

Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer.

AN ADDRESS BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.

We meet this evening to commemorate Thomas Paine, not, as some imagine, because we regard him as a leader or ourselves as his disciples; for while we admire genius and worth, and give our gratitude and love to the benefactors of all ages and climes, we can allow no man to dispossess us of our direct relations to nature; we can recognize in no individual, living or dead, a king or a lord, a pope or a priest. Nor do we assemble here to honor the memory of Paine because we adopt all his views or indorse all that he wrote. Many of us dissent from some of his reasonings and conclusions. Few, I presume, if any present, can accept all that he advocated, much less all that unfriendly critics and opponents have attributed to him.

But we meet to recall the services and to honor the name of Thomas Paine, on this anniversary of his birthday, because he did a great work in his generation in destroying religious superstition and helping build up our present intellectual and moral condition; because he was a brave pioneer in the cause of Freethought, who cleared the way and made it comparatively easy for others following to advance beyond him, and because in exposing popular errors and cherished delusions, when personally he had everything to lose and nothing to gain by such an undertaking, he showed a sublime courage and a noble spirit of self-sacrifice that commands our admiration and deserves our unstinted praise.

And while it is a pleasure for us to meet in honor of Thomas Paine as a pioneer in the Liberal cause, it is a duty that gratitude prompts and historic truth demands that we use our efforts, and make these public demonstrations contribute, not only to rescue his name from the unmerited reproach under which it has so long rested, but to give him his true place in history as an advocate of popular freedom, and especially as one of the founders of the American republic.

We can group together but a few of the leading facts and incidents in the life of the man whose memory we have assembled to honor.

He was born at Thetford, England, in 1737. His father was a Quaker, his mother belonged to the Established church. He was favored in early life with such opportunities only as the humble circumstances of an English mechanic afforded. At the tender age of thirteen he was taken from school and set to work at stay-making, an occupation which his father followed. His youth, so far as can be learned, was marked by no incident of an extraordinary character, and presented no noticeable indications of the intellectual ability which he exhibited at a more mature age. At twenty-two he married an estimable lady, but the following year death robbed him of her companionship. A short time subsequently he obtained a position in the Excise, but was soon removed for an act which some of his biographers allege that his uncompromising integrity required him to perform. Among the other avocations in which he afterwards engaged was teaching school. Restored after a while to his old position as an exciseman, he continued to fill the position for several years. In 1771 he married the second time, but the union was an unhappy one, and soon afterward, by mutual consent, a separation ensued.

About this time he wrote a pamphlet proposing certain reforms in the Excise department, in consequence of which he was again removed from his situation. But his pamphlet fell into the hands of Dr. Franklin, who was then in London, and led to an acquaintance between these two men who were soon to take such a prominent part in freeing our fathers from colonial vassalage, and enthroning in dazzling exhibition to the world an example of popular government among the wilds of North America.

In the latter part of 1794, by the advice of Franklin, and bearing with him letters of recommendation from the distinguished philosophers, Paine came to America. He was then thirty-seven years old. His mind was cultivated by reading and reflection. He possessed considerable knowledge of the natural sciences, and he had, besides, the advantage of a somewhat varied experience in business pursuits, in none of which, however, had he achieved more than moderate success. His object in visiting America was to establish a seminary for young ladies, but by the advice and with the assistance of Dr. Rush and other prominent men in Philadelphia, giving up his original project, he assumed editorial charge of the Pennsylvania Magazine, a position for which he proved himself eminently fitted.

At this time the colonies, indignant at the course the mother country was pursuing toward them, were earnestly petitioning the English government for a redress of their grievances. Their petitions were full of assurances that they were loyal and faithful subjects of Britain, and their request was limited to asking for a restoration of the privileges which they had enjoyed up to 1763.

Thomas Paine was the man who was to teach the colonies that their honor and future happiness alike demanded a different attitude toward the insolent English government. While our fathers were recounting their wrongs with the hope of making a favorable impression upon the king and securing a restoration of their former privileges, Paine published his celebrated "Common Sense." It appeared in January, 1776.

This work boldly attacked the principles of monarchical government. It ridiculed hereditary succession. It exposed the impossibility of honorable and lasting reconciliation with England, and boldly denied the right of Britain to govern the colonies without their consent. On the other hand, it pointed out the advantages and portrayed the excellences of republican institutions, demonstrated the practicability of independence, urged immediate separation from the mother country, and called for the establishment of a republic in which should exist no legal distinction between peer and peasant, prelate and mechanic; no hereditary titles, no religious disabilities, but in which all should be equal before the law; in which personal merit should be the only condition of honor and preferment, and the will of the people, expressed through their chosen representatives, the supreme law of the land—a republic that should be an asylum where the oppressed of all nations might come and find protection and brotherhood, and that should present to the world an example of political and social liberty. "O ye that love mankind," he wrote, "ye that dare oppose not only tyranny but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia and Africa have long since expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. Oh, receive the fugitive and prepare an asylum for mankind!"

The effect of this work was wonderful. At first it was read with indignation. Its irreverent attacks on the British form of government, and its bold and impassioned appeal to the colonies to declare themselves free and independent states, surprised and alarmed those who had heen accustomed to regard the English Constitution as the perfection of political wisdom, and were looking and longing for reconciliation. But this feeling rapidly gave way to sentiments of admiration for the author and hearty, enthusiastic approval of the policy that he advised. Everybody read "Common Sense." Editions were multiplied till the circulation reached one hundred thousand copies. The desire for independence, growing stronger and deeper from New England to the Carolinas, soon became irresistible and bore down all opposition. In a few months, as a result of the public feeling, produced largely by this work, followee that lofty manifesto known throughout the world as the Declaration of American Independence.

The extent to which we are indebted to "Common Sense" for preparing the colonies for separation and influencing them to declare their independenee, can be learned only by consulting the sources of American history—the chronicles and correspondence of those times; for most of the writers who have compiled histories of the United States, from dislike of Paine's religious views, or from fear of rendering their works unpopular, have either omitted all reference to his services or devoted to him but a paragraph, when pages only could do him common justice.

Washington, in a letter to Gen. Joseph Reed, two months after the appearance of the work, speaks of it as working a "powerful change" in public opinion.

Gen. Lee, in a letter to Washingson, alluding to "Common Sense," says, "I own myself convinced by the arguments of the necessity of separation."

Ramsay, in his "History of the Revolution," says, "Many thousands were convinced and led to approve and long for a separation from the mother country, though that measure, a few months before, was not only foreign to their wishes, but the object of their abhorrence."

Lossing, in his "Field Book of the Revolution," says "'Common Sense' was the earliest and most powerful appeal in behalf of independence, and probably did more to fix that idea firmly in the public mind than any other instrumentality."

Rev. Jedediah Morse, in his "Annals of the Revolution," says, "The change of public mind on this occasion [in consequence of "Common Sense"] is without a parallel."

Samuel Adams, writing to Paine in 1802, and alluding in grateful terms to his services, adds that "'Common Sense' awakened the public mind and led the people to call loudly for independence."

I will add only the testimony of Hale, who, in his "History of the United States," says, "The effect of the pamphlet in making converts is without a precedent in the annals of literature."

Paine did as much to keep alive the spirit of resistance to Britain and the determination to achieve independence after the Revolution was inaugurated as he had done to prepare the popular mind for separation and to arouse the colonies to sever the last link that bound them to the mother country. His enemy, Cheetham, confesses that "his pen was an appendage to the army of independence as necessary and as formidable as its cannon." Into the movement he threw his whole soul. Accompanying Washington's army and accepting the fare of a common soldier, hd wrote words of encouragement and hope, often on a drum head, by the flickering light of a torch, and scattered them freely among the troops. Written in a bold, confident, and convincing style, and suited to the condition of the army and the aspect of public affairs, their influence was great in sustaining the spirit of the soldiers and keeping up the hopes of the country. The first of the pamphlets appeared just after Washington's defeat on Long Island, when he had been driven from Forts Washington and Lee. The air was filled with gloom. Traitors were busy in the camp and Tories swarmed in the town. Our soldiers were disheartened and fear pervaded the land. Embarrassments and hardships were growing heavier; discouragements came from every quarter; "pitfalls lurked athwart the way," and deepening darkness covered the close. In this sad condition of affairs, in this night of despondency and gloom, rang out in clarion tones the thrilling and immortal words of Paine:

"These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will in this crisis shrink from the service of his country, but he that stands it now deserves the thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered, yet we have the consolation with us that the harder the conflict the more glorious the triumph."

This pamphlet was read throughout the army and throughout the country. Its effect was electrical. It fired the soldiers with fresh courage and helped to inspire the whole country with a determination never to give up the struggle until independence should be achieved. In all the dark and trying times that followed, when our soldiers, overwhelmed by the numbers of the enemy, were driven from position to position; when their ranks were thinned by battle, disease, and hardship; when starvation stared them in the face, and, stung by winter's cold, they reddened the snow over which they walked with bare and bleeding feet, Thomas Paine revived their hopes and sustained their spirits with his powerful and effective pen. The remarkable papers known as the "Crisis" were continued at intervals till the darkness disappeared and the morning light of promise broke, and independence dawned upon the land. The last of these pamphlets congratulated the country upon the successful termination of the war, upon the patriotism and valor of the army, and the grand and glorious results which the people had accomplished for themselves and unborn millions that would come after them.

"The times that tried mens souls" he wrote "are over, and the greatest and completest revolution the world ever knew, gloriously and happily accomplished." . . .

"Never, I say, had a country so many openings to happiness as this. Her setting out in life, like the rising of a fair morning, was unclouded and promising. Her cause was good. Her principles just and liberal. Her temper serene and firm. Her conduct regulated by the nicest steps, and everything about her wore the mark of honor. It is not every country (perhaps there is not another in the world) that can boast so fair an origin. Even the first settlement of America corresponds with the character of the revolution. Rome, once the proud mistress of the universe, was originally a band of ruffians. Plunder and rapine made her rich, and her oppression of millions made her great. But America need never be ashamed to tell her birth, nor relate the stages by which she arose to empire."

At the close of the American Revolution Paine was one of the most popular men in America. The great and distinguished of the land sought his society, and vied with one another in manifesting their appreciation of his abilities and giving him tokens of their gratitude for his services. Washington invited him in the most cordial language to partake of his hospitality at Rocky Hill. He was in regular correspondence with the most prominent men of the country, and no man's counsel seems to have been more in demand or more highly valued. Had he chosen to accept an office, the people would gladly have given him almost any position that was within their power to bestow. Had Paine died at this time, what honors would not have been lavished upon him! The whole country, filled with grief, would have poured its tears around his fresh grave. The Christian clergy would have been among the first to extol his character, while they would have claimed him as a child of their faith. Christian mothers would have taught their children to tread lightly over the spot hallowed by his mortal remains. Christian poets would have related in song, and Christian novelists would have interwoven in story, the noble deeds of his life. Christian historians would have recorded faithfully his services and handed down his fame. With every return of the anniversary of our natal day Christian orators would speak of him with pride and gratitude as the pamphleteer of American independence, as the author-hero of the Revolution, while the people would twine votive wreaths around his name and keep his memory green.

But the career of this remarkable man was not finished with his successful labors for a republic in North America.

The condition of the people in Europe excited his sympathy and claimed his attention. Some writer had said, "Where liberty is, there is my country." Paine, with less regard for himself, and in the spirit of boundless philanthropy, said, "Where liberty is not, there is my country, and thither I hasten that I may help establish it."

He returned to England, and after visiting and relieving the wants of a widowed mother, who was suffering from poverty, he turned his attention to France and exerted all his powers to defend and sustain that people in their efforts to establish a free government. For ages the condition of the French people had been deplorable. They had been systematically robbed by the government that a corrupt, hereditary aristocracy, and a yet more corrupt priesthood, might live in luxury and splendor. Many circumstances had combined to bring about the Revolution of 1789. That the writings of the French philosophers, which scattered broadcast the doctrines of political and religious freedom, contributed to prepare the people for the great event, no person who has a competent knowledge of history can doubt. The works of Montesquieu, Voltaire, Rousseau, and Abbe Raynal, by examining the principles and origin of government and attacking hoary-headed social, religious, and political evils, directed thinking minds to a better condition of affairs than then prevailed, awakened a love of liberty, a desire for the abolition of corrupt institutions, and the reorganization of the government on the principles of justice and equality. The Declaration of Independence in America, the formation of our republic, and the return of French officers and soldiers who had participated in our struggle and become imbued with sentiments of republicanism, the removal of Neckar, the mismanagement in finances that followed—all these facts and circumstances were among the causes which contributed to produce the revolution in France—a revolution which, however much we may deplore the excesses of its friends and the machinations of its enemies, and its failure to achieve all it aimed to accomplish, proved an incalculable blessing to France and to the cause of liberty throughout Europe.

In full sympathy with struggling France, Paine gave to the world his "Rights of Man," the ablest work he ever wrote, and one of the most masterly productions that ever appeared in opposition to monarchical government, and in defense of the rights of the people. It was a reply to Edmund Burke's "Reflections on the French Revolution." It scattered his arguments to the wind, and bravely pleaded the right of the French people to depose their Bourbon oppressor and to establish a government founded on the consent of the governed. The effect of this work in Europe was hardly less remarkable than that of "Common Sense" in America. It was translated into various languages and read by all classes. Its circulation reached one hundred thousand copies. It "introduced with astonishing effect," says Baine, in his "Wars of the Revolution," "the doctrine of democratic government in the first states of Europe."

The British government, alarmed for the safety of its monarchical institutions, and with a view to suppress the work, issued a proclamation against "wicked and seditious libels," and afterwards prosecuted the author of the "Rights of Man."

Paine went to France and was elected to a seat in the National Convention. On his way from Calais flowers were strewn in his pathway, and he was the recipient of every attention and honor that respect and gratitude could prompt.

Paine did his best to infuse moderation into the councils of the French republic. He voted against the death of the king, when nearly the whole Convention were in favor of his execution, and when to differ from the majority was at the peril of reputation and life. The conduct of Paine, during the whole time he was in France, was as brave and consistent as during our own struggle for independence. He was never deterred from doing his duty by any consideration, not even when his personal safety seemed to demand acquiescence with those in power.

Amid the excitement and madness of the hour Paine was thrown into prison, where he remained ten months, escaping the guillotine by an accident which, had he been a Christian, would afterward have formed the subject of a tract in favor of the doctrine of special providence.

Up to this time his popularity in this country was undiminished. James Monroe, then our minister to France, in a letter addressed to Paine just before his release, wrote:

"It is unnecessary for me to tell you how much all your countrymen (I speak of the great mass of the people) are interested in your welfare."

"The crime of ingratitude has not yet stained, and, I hope, never will stain our national character. You are considered by them as not only having rendered important services in our own Revolution, but as being on a more extensive scale the friend of human rights, and a distinguished and able advocate in favor of public liberty. To the welfare of Thomas Paine the Americans are not, nor can they be, indifferent."

While in France Paine wrote his celebrated "Age of Reason." The first part was completed before he was thrown into the Luxembourg jail; the second part composed chiefly during his imprisonment.

This was his crime. This was the head and front of his offending. The popularity of the author gave the work a wide circulation, and its influence was felt and by the clergy dreaded.

Paine returned to this country, where he lived the remainder of his life.

Open Letter.

BY M. BABCOCK.

To the Honorable School Board of St. Johns, Michigan. Hon. Randolph Strickland, D. C. Hurd, George Stevenson, Josiah Upton, O. W. Barker, and Charles Grisson, Esq., Gentlemen: I do not believe that a dose of hell and damnation in the morning is best calculated to fit either the mind or body for the studies of the arts and sciences during the day. I do not believe that either gods, ghosts, devils, or witches are essential to the successful running of our public school.

A book which teaches all of these superstitious dogmas is daily being made use of, by your sanction, in our school.

And I wish to say that I hav no respect for any God, book, religion, or human being who will pollute the imagination of childhood with the infamous lie, the dogma of an eternal hell.

I do not believe in the use of two books, the one teaching that three times one makes one, and the other teaching that three times one makes three.

And I want you to understand that I object to the use of any book in our schools whose language is so obscene that it cannot be read in the presence of a virtuous woman without causing the cheek of modesty to blush with shame. I care not if its obscenity be inspired or uninspired; I say if it be unclean and unfit to be read in decent society, throw it out of our schools.

Bible in schools is but a question of time; sooner or later it must step down and out. It took Infidels and outsiders hundreds of years before they could get Christians to abandon the practice of cutting each other's throats. The Bible has drenched this earth with blood and tears by setting one set of Christians to killing another set of Christians. The Bible has set men to raising hell in this world as a means of escaping hell in another world. And you cannot deny, gentlemen, that the Christian religion has been established by the fagot and sword in the hands of tyrants, murderers, and hypocrites, and that the church, armed with the halter, ripping-knives, and instruments of torture, has, in the name of this Bible God, cruelly put to death, by burning at the stake and other ways, not less than sixty millions of poor, pitiable creatures on account of their religious opinions. Then, I ask, is it not true that the church and the Bible hav raised hell in this world as a means of escaping hell in the next world?

For all of these hellish acts the Bible is responsible. I hav no respect for such a book; but its worshipers of to-day, like its worshipers of the past, hav no regard for the rights of others. Therefore I do not expect that the church (your master, gentlemen) will take the Bible out of school so long as outsiders will submit to hav their rights trampled upon by hypocrites and the bigots of the Protestant church.

This "blessed book" teaches that for five thousand years there has been a steady stream of human souls sliding into the bottomless pit; and to-day the bulk of the great human family, at the rate of one a second, continually keep dropping, drop, drop, dropping, into the flames of an eternal hell. No postponement on account of the weather. No distinction on account of race or color. Night and day, drop, drop, dropping into a place of endless misery. And such, gentlemen, is the teaching of the infamous book made use of in our school.

But Jesus has pointed out a way by which you and all of the scholars of the school may be saved from hell. He says, "He that believeth and is baptized shall be saved; but he that believeth not shall be damned." "And these signs shall follow them that believe: in my name shall they cast out devils: they shall speak with new tongues: they shall take up serpents; and if they drink any deadly thing, it shall not hurt them. They shall lay hands on the sick, and they shall recover" (Mark xvi, 16–18).

If you can do these things, gentlemen, you shall be saved, otherwise you shall be damned—damned on account of your honest opinions and lack of faith. Splendid! How consoling! But if you lack faith, Jesus says that you will be placed with the goats, and then he will say to you, "Depart from me, ye cursed, into everlasting fire, prepared for the devil and his angels" (Matt. xxv, 14).

"To be cast into everlasting fire" (St. Matt. xviii, 8).

"These shall go away into everlasting punishment" (St. Matt. xxv, 46).

"Eternal damnation" (St. Mark iii, 29).

"Everlasting destruction" (2 Thess. i, 9).

"Eternal judgment" [condemnation] (Heb. vi, 2).

"Eternal fire" (Jude, 7).

This, gentlemen, is a solid doctrine of an eternal hell. It is hell outside, hell inside, and hell down through the middle. It is too much hell to be taken into our public school, and, as I hav already said, I hav no respect for any teacher, school board, or human being, who will pollute the imagination of children with such an infamous lie as the dogma of an everlasting hell.

And Jesus says, "There be eunuchs which were made eunuchs of men: and there be eunuchs which hav made themselves eunuchs for the kingdom of heaven's sake. He that is able to receive it, let him receive it" (Matt. xix, 12).

Now, gentlemen, honor bright, do you approve of this command? And is the practice being recommended in our school as one of the great plans by which Jesus tells its boys that they may become worthy of heaven? Hav you, either individually or as a school board, carried into practice this, the teaching of Jesus, as a means of salvation? Now, gentlemen, I care not whether this precept comes from Jesus, God, or the devil, or whether it be recommended for the kingdom of heaven's sake, or for the kingdom of hell's sake, in my judgment, it is a bloody relic of the past, and unsuited to the wants of the civilization of the nineteenth century.

No gods, ghosts, or devils; no hell and damnation; no lakes of fire and brimstone; no gnashing of teeth in endless torment; no bloody precepts, and no worshiping of a God who, with his she-bears, killed forty-two innocent little children; and no worshiping in our public school of the book of superstition which sanctions nearly every species of crime, is our motto.

"An eye for an eye" (Bible). "A tooth for a tooth" (Bible). "Spare the rod and spoil the child" (Bible). If a scholar gets pummeled on one cheek, let him turn the other cheek also for another pounding (Bible). Splendid precepts for a school; don't you think so, gentlemen?

Random Thoughts.—Labor and Capital.

BY CHANNING BURNZ.

Principal is a money used as a nucleus about which to gather its kind.

Interest is money paid for the use of principal, and must be saved from the proceeds of labor hired with that principal, together with the profit, which profit becomes another principal for the use of the borrower, as interest becomes a new principal to the lender.

Now, is this profit and interest rightfully held under the surveillance of one mind and under the control of one power, to the exclusion of the many who helped to earn it?

What is its effect upon those many? Their bodily necessities, their comforts, are often sacrificed and all esthetic culture shut off. But worse than this, they become, after a few years of this life, transformed from bright and hopeful men and women into little better than well-drilled animals; ambition gone; debarred from thought because from responsibility; their only care or hope in life to retain the patronage of the capitalist who governs them, and while ministering to a few necessities, eke out here and there a little luxury, and possibly to save enough to continue this life a few years longer when the power to labor is gone. Oh, the waste of precious life!

There is an old joke—not a funny one—that the capitalist gets no more than his hireling; i. e., his living. Yet when asked to change places, the capitalist declines. Nor can he, in the old-time cant, reply, "Oh, I am born and bred in this; you in that condition; to change were to make both miserable." Ten to one his wealth has been got only by some unenviable attribute—selfishness, pinching stinginess, grasping avarice, by the risking of others' funds, or through plain dishonesty. Seldom is he "to the manor born." By nature he has generally the hardihood of the hardiest, and were he only taught the wrong and folly of his life, might bear with ease the humbler position of a mere man.

"Before the law all men are equal." Good lawyers say that. Each has an equal right to those natural gifts which man takes to his use and an equal right to the kind feeling of his fellow-man.

A capital has been borrowed of $100,000 at 5 per cent per annum; the times are not very prosperous, and the manufacturer, after paying all expenses, cannot turn his money over at more than 3 per cent four times a year; this is 12 per cent gross, less 5 per cent interest paid, which gives 7 per cent interest on $100,000, or $7,000 profit, plus a salary of $3,000, which is usually bestowed upon the money-holder for his management, and this leaves $10,000 a year to the borrower. What do his poor employees get? Cashier, say $2,000; bookkeepers, sav $1,500 and $1,000; other help from $1,000 down to $350 each. This is a very moderate picture, and is so common as hardly to be startling. And yet, O powers of man! should a man who has simply credit be able to liv from five to twenty-five times better than a man who has only skill?

But stop! Profit makes a new principal; the capitalist lays by a large part of "his earnings" (?), and that becomes a new capital—the price of other poor souls to bondage. Thus do the masses weld their own chains. The ignorance of men, their apathy to disgrace, the natural slavishness of humanity, is the cause of all this. Bah! men are not men yet; they must still learn their worth.

LONDON has over two hundred thousand foreigners, from every quarter of the globe, among its residents. It contains more Roman Catholics than Rome itself, more Jews than the whole of Palestine, more Irish than Belfast, more Scotchmen than Aberdeen, and more Welshmen than Cardiff.

MARRIAGE.—TRUE LOVE VS. FREELOVE.—BY MRS. SARA A. UNDERWOOD.

One has but to look around, with open and unprejudiced eyes, upon society as it really is to-day to see the utter folly and falsity of these Freelove charges. The majority, the overwhelming majority, of marriages, even under the laws found so much fault with, are happy marriages. Wives are not all trembling slaves, nor husbands all adulterers and tyrants. Into nine-tenths of the homes we enter we cannot fail to mark the evidences of a pure and holy love between husband and wife. The eyes that meet each other so frankly and trustingly, their tender accents of confiding love, the respectful deference to each other's whims and wishes in all matters of business, and the heartfelt enjoyment of each other's pleasures—these we can see every day in nearly every family around us. This is the rule; the unhappily mated are the exceptions.

It is pleasant to turn from the sickening falsehood of Freelove literature to testimonies like these of the pure, exalted, intelligent love borne by wives and husbands towards each other; and there is a deep sense of moral satisfaction in knowing that such testimonies can be multiplied by scores and hundreds of the same purport in refutation of Freelove libels on legal marriage. There are happy homes on every side of us. We all know of ten happy homes to one unhappy one. Happiness in married life is the rule and not the exception. The unhappy marriages are no more in numbers than may be expected in the present imperfect state of humanity. There is always a certain percentage of crime of all kinds, and there will always be a certain percentage of unhappy unions. There is always a large number of persons who take pleasure in committing theft, but the law, in its mission of protecting society, punishes these criminals; and we surely would not think of revoking all laws for the protection of property that these sinners may be left undisturbed in their right to steal. So with all crimes. Society, slowly evolving from barbarism, has come to decree that Freelove is criminal and hurtful to individuals and the community, and so does not propose dispensing with legal recognition of individual rights in the marriage contract in order to make anarchy easier of accomplishment.

Instead of a loosening of the marriage bond, we need a bracing up of the moral sense in the community, so that the marriage contract shall be better fulfilled. We are in sad need of a revival of virtuous principle. The tendency of the times has been to be too lax in condemnation of the lesser immoralities of private life. Public opinion needs to be brought up to a higher and sterner standard of morality, for without morality the race cannot advance. It has come to pass that those who call themselves reformers—who shout the loudest in praise of liberty, who swear the world is all askew and they hav a mission to set it right—it has come to pass that these sneer at morality, sneer at purity, sneer at culture, sneer at marriage, sneer at the home and private purity. They laugh at the idea of any man living a pure life; they demand that all barriers to bestiality be broken down, and that the world be turned topsy-turvy for their pleasure. It is time for a reaction in favor of purity, of morality, of law and order; it is high time that something definite be done and said by those who hav the true welfare of their fellows at heart. From this laxity has sprung this evil thing called Freelove, which should now be frowned down and shown in all its vileness, and treated with the contempt it deserves.

MARRIAGE AND DIVORCE.—RESOLUTIONS AND ADDRESS OF MRS. ELIZABETH CADY STANTON, AT THE WOMAN'S RIGHTS CONVENTION, COOPER INSTITUTE, FRIDAY, MAY 11, 1860.

Resolved, That, in the language (slightly varied) of John Milton, "Those who marry intend as little to conspire their own ruin as those who swear allegiance; and as a whole people is to an ill government, so is one man or woman to an ill marriage. If a whole people, against any authority, covenant, or statute, may, by the sovereign edict of charity, save not only their lives but honest liberty, from unworthy bondage, as well may a married party against any private covenant which he or she never entered, to his or her mischief, be redeemed from unsupportable disturbances to honest peace and just contentment."

Resolved, That all men are created equal, and all women, in their natural rights, are the equals of men, and endowed by their Creator with the same inalienable right to the pursuit of happiness.

Resolved, That any constitution, compact, or covenant, between human beings, or even between God and human beings, that failed to produce or promote human happiness, could not in the nature of things be of any force or authority; and it would be not only a right but a duty to abolish it.

Resolved, That though marriage be in itself divinely founded, and is fortified as an institution by innumerable analogies in the whole kingdom of universal nature, still a true marriage is only known by its results; and like the fountain, if pure, will reveal only pure manifestations, nor need it ever be said, "What God hath joined together let no man put asunder," for man could not put it asunder; nor can he any more unite what God and nature have not joined together.

Resolved, That of all insulting mockeries of heavenly truth and holy law, none can be greater than that physical impotency is cause sufficient for divorce, while no amount of mental, or moral, or spiritual imbecility is ever to be pleaded in support of such a demand.

Resolved, That such a law was worthy those dark periods when marriage was held by the greatest doctors and priests of the church to be a work of the flesh only, and almost, if not altogether a defilement, denied wholly to the clergy, and forbidden a second time to all.

Resolved, That an unfortunate or ill-assorted marriage is ever a calamity, but not ever, perhaps never, a crime; and when society or government, by its laws or customs, compels its continuance, always to the grief of one of the parties, and the actual loss and damage of both, it usurps an authority never delegated to man nor exercised by God himself.

Resolved, That observation and experience daily show how incompetent men are, as individuals or as governments, to select partners in business, teachers for their children, ministers of their religion, or makers, ajudicators, or administrators of their laws; and as the same weakness and blindness must attend the selection of matrimonial partners, the dictates of humanity and common sense alike show that the latter and most important contract should no more be perpetual than either or all of the former.

Resolved, That children born in these unhappy and unhallowed connections are, in the most solemn and important sense, of unlawful birth—the fruit of lust but not of love, and so not of God—not divinely descended, but from beneath—whence proceed all manner of evil and uncleanness.

Resolved, That next to the calamity of such a birth to the child is the misfortune of being trained in the atmosphere of a household where love is not the law, but where discord and bitterness abound, stamping their demoniac features on the moral nature with all their odious peculiarities, thus continuing the race in a weakness and depravity that must be a sure precurser of its ruin, as a just penalty of long violated law.

They tell us, in that future home—the heavenly paradise—that the human family shall be sifted out, and the good and pure shall dwell together in peace. If that be the heavenly order, is it not our duty to render earth as near like heaven as we may? For years there hav been before the Legislature of this state a variety of bills asking for divorce in cases of drunkenness, insanity, desertion, cruel and brutal treatment, endangering life. My attention was called to this question very early in life, by the sufferings of a friend of my girlhood, a victim of one of those unfortunate unions called marriage. What my great love for that young girl, and my holy intuitions, then decided to be right, has not been changed by years of experience, observation, and reason. I hav pondered well these things in my heart, and ever felt the deepest interest in all that has been written and said upon the subject, and the most profound respect and loving sympathy for those heroic women who, in the face of law and public sentiment, hav dared to sunder the unholy ties of a joyless, lovless union. If marriage is a human institution, about which man may legislate, it seems but just that he should treat this branch of his legislation with the same common sense that he applies to all others. If it is a mere legal contract, then should it be subject to the same restraints and privileges of all other contracts. A contract to be valid in law must be formed between parties of mature age, with an honest intention in said parties to do what they agree. The least concealment, fraud, or intention to deceive, if proved, annuls the contract. A boy cannot contract for an acre of land or a horse until he is 21, but he may contract for a wife at 14. If a man sell a horse, and the purchaser find in him great incompatability of temper, a disposition to stand still when the owner is in haste to go, the sale is null and void—the man and his horse part company. But in marriage, no matter how much fraud and deception are practiced, nor how cruelly one or both parties hav been misled—no matter how young, inexperienced, or thoughtless the parties, nor how unequal their condition and position in life, the contract cannot be annulled. Think of a husband telling a young and trusting girl, but one short month his wife, that he married her for her money; that those letters, so precious to her, that she had read and re-read, and kissed and cherished, were written by another; that their splendid home, of which, on their wedding day, her father gave to him the deed, is already in the hands of his creditors; that she must giv up the elegance and luxury that now surround her, unless she can draw fresh supplies of money to meet their wants! When she told the story of her wrongs to me—the abuse to which she was subject, and the dread in which she lived, I impulsively urged her to fly from such a monster and villain, as she would before the hot breath of a ferocious beast of the wilderness. (Applause.) And she did fly. And it was well with her. Many times since, as I hav felt her throbbing heart against my own, she has said: "Oh, but for your love and sympathy, your encouragement, I should never hav escaped from that bondage. Before I could, of myself, hav found courage to break those chains, my heart would hav broken in the effort."

Marriage, as it now exists, must seem to all of you a mere human institution. Look through the universe of matter and mind—all God's arrangements are perfect, harmonious, and complete. There is no discord, friction, or failure in his eternal plans. Immutability, perfection, beauty, are stamped on all his laws. Love is the vital essence that pervades and permeates from the center to the circumference—the graduating circles of all thought and action. Love is the talisman of human weal and woe, the open sesame to every human soul; where two beings are drawn together by the natural laws of likeness and affinity, union and happiness is the result. Such marriages might be divine, but how is it now? You all know our marriage is, in many cases, a mere outward tie, impelled by custom, policy, interest, necessity, founded not even in friendship, to say nothing of love, with every possible inequality of condition and development. In these neterogeneous unions we find youth and old age, beauty and deformity, refinement and vulgarity, virtue and vice, the educated and the ignorant, angels of grace and goodness with devils of malice and malignity; and the sum of all this is human wretchedness and despair, cold fathers, sad mothers, and helpless children, who shiver at the hearthstone where the fires of love hav all gone out. The wide world and the stranger's unsympathizing gaze are not more to be dreaded for young hearts than homes like these. Now who shall say that it is right to take two beings so unlike and anchor them side by side, fast bound, to stay all time until God shall summon one away?

Do wise Christian legislators need any arguments to convince them that the sacredness of the family relation should be protected at all hazards? The family—that great conservator of national virtue and strength—how can you hope to build it up in the midst of violence, debauchery, and excess? Can there be anything sacred at that family altar where the chief priest who ministers makes sacrifice of human beings—of the weak, the innocent? where the incense offered up is not to the God of justice and mercy but to those heathen divinities who best may represent the lost man in all his grossness and deformity? Call that sacred where woman, the mother of the race—of a Jesus of Nazareth—unconscious of the true dignity of her nature, of her high and holy destiny, consents to liv in legalized prostitution, her whole soul revolting at such gross associations, her flesh shivering at the cold contamination of that embrace, held there by no tie but the iron chain of the law and a false and most unnatural public sentiment? Call that sacred where innocent children, trembling with fear, fly to the corners and dark places of the house to hide themselves from the wrath of drunken, brutal fathers, but, forgetting their past sufferings, rush out again at their mothers' frantic screams, "Help! oh, help?" Call that sacred where fathers like these hav the power and legal right to hand down their natures to other beings, to curse other generations with such moral deformity and death?

Brethren, look into your asylums for the blind, the deaf, the dumb, the idiot, the imbecile, the deformed, the insane! Go out into the by-lanes and dens of this vast metropolis and contemplate that reeking mass of depravity!

Pause before the terrible revelations made by statistics of the rapid increase of all this moral and physical impotency, and learn how fearful a thing it is to violate the immutable laws of the beneficent ruler of the universe, and there behold the terrible retributions of your violence on woman! Learn how false and cruel are those institutions, which, with a coarse materialism, set aside those holy instincts of the woman to bear no children but those of love!

In the best condition of marriage as we now hav it, to woman come all the penalties and sacrifices. A man in the full tide of business or pleasure can marry and not change his life one iota. He can be husband, father, and everything beside; but in marriage woman givs up all. Home is her sphere, her realm. Well, be it so if here you'll make us all supreme; take to yourselves the universe besides; explore the north pole, and in your airy car, all space; in your northern homes and cloud-capped towers to feast on walrus flesh and air, and lay you down to sleep your six months' night away and leave us to make these laws that govern the inner sanctuary of our own homes, and faithful satellites we'll ever be to the dinner-pot, the cradle, and the old arm-chair.

Fathers, do you say let your daughters pay a a life-long penalty for one unfortunate step? How could they, on the threshold of life, full of joy and hope, believing all things to be as they seemed on the surface, judge of the dark windings of the human soul? how could they forsee that the young man to-day so noble, so generous, would in a few short years be transformed into a cowardly, mean tyrant, or a foul-mouthed, bloated drunkard? What father could rest at his home by night knowing that his lovely daughter was at the mercy of a strong man drunk with wine and passion, and that, do what he might, he was backed up by law and public sentiment.

The best interests of the individual, the family, the state, the nation, cry out against these legalized marriages of force and endurance. There can be no heaven without love, and nothing is sacred in the family and home but just so far as it is built up and anchored in love.

Our newspapers teem with startling accounts of husbands and wives having shot or poisoned each other, or committing suicide, choosing death rather than the indissoluble tie; and, still worse, the living death of faithless wives and daughters, from the first families in this state, dragged from the privacy of home into the public prints and courts, with all the painful details of sad, false lives. What say you to facts like these? Now, do you believe, men and women, that all these wretched matches are made in heaven? that all these sad, miserable people are bound together by God?

Nero was thought the chief of tyrants because he made laws and hung them up so high that his subjects could not read them, and then punished them for every act of disobedience. What better are our republican legislators? The mass of the women of this nation know nothing about the laws, yet all their specially barbarous legislation is for woman. Where hav they made any provision for her to learn the laws? Where is the law school for our daughters? where the law office, the bar, or the bench now urging them to take part in the jurisprudence of the nation?

But, say you, does not separation cover all these difficulties? No one objects to separation when the parties are so disposed. Now to separation there are two very serious objections. First, so long as you insist on marriage as a divine institution, as an indissoluble tie, so long as you maintain your present laws against divorce, you make even separation so odious that the most noble, virtuous, and sensitive men and women choose a life of concealed misery rather than a partial, disgraceful release. Second, those who, in their impetuosity and despair, do, in spite of public sentiment, separate, find themselves in their new position beset with many temptations to lead a false, unreal life. This isolation bears especially hard on women.

Horace Greeley, in his recent discussion with Robert Dale Owen, said this whole question has been tried in all its varieties and conditions, from indissoluble monogamic marriage down to Freelove; that the ground has been all gone over and explored. Let me assure him that but just one-half of the ground has been surveyed, and that half but by one of the parties, and that party certainly not the most interested in the matter. Moreover, there is one kind of marriage that has not been tried, and that is a contract made by equal parties to liv an equal life, with equal restraints and privileges on either side. Thus far we hav had the man marriage, and nothing more. From the beginning man has had the sole and whole regulation of the matter; he has spoken in scripture; he has spoken in law; as an individual he has decided the time and cause for putting away a wife, and as a judge and legislator he still holds the entire control. In all history, sacred and profane, the woman is regarded and spoken of simply as the toy of man, made for his especial use, to meet his most gross and sensuous desires; she is taken or put away, given or received, bought or sold, just as the interest of the parties might dictate. The right of woman to put away a husband, be he ever so impure, is never hinted at in sacred history. Even Jesus himself failed to recognize the sacred rights of the holy mothers of the race. We cannot take our gauge of womanhood from the past, but from the solemn convictions of our own souls, in the higher development of the race. No parchments, however venerable with the mold of ages, no human institution, can bound the immortal wants of the real sons and daughters of the great I Am as the heirs of the joys of time, and joint heirs to the glories of eternity. If in marriage either party claims the right to stand supreme, to woman, the mother of the race, belongs the scepter and the crown, for her life is one long sacrifice for man.

Sara on Marriage.

One of the outcomes of the "late unpleasantness" over obscenity, personal records, private letters, and that class of troubles, is a vigorous discussion of the institution of marriage. The Index—the pure, the high-toned, the cultured Index—is in for it up to its eyes. Mrs. Sara Underwood came out recently with a slashing essay upholding the "divine institution" and defending it against the Freelovers who hav "captured the League" and who are likely to capture the country and play destruction generally. THE TRUTH SEEKER this week copies a portion of Mrs. Underwood's article. That it may not, however, be taken as the expression, without dissent, of the opinion of universal womanhood, her views are offset by an equally vigorous expression on the subject of marriage by another editorial contributor of the Index—Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton. Here readers hav the views of two representative woman. Diametrically opposed as they are, every reader can take his choice.

The Index of last week also has a pointed, terse, and well reasoned reply to Mrs. Underwood's article, by "a happy wife in a happy home"—all which goes to show that Sara will not exactly "bear the palm alone."

How many questions would be settled, how many consciences would be relieved, and consciousnesses enlightened if their owners would descend into them, for a brief period, and reflect that this globe is not finished up yet! We are in the midst of an evolution that is not yet near the end. This scheme of things that is passing before our eyes is in progress—not in statu quo. We are neither at its start, nor at its stop; but at some stage in mid career.

Now every scheme of progress involves change. A panorama would not be much of a show that stood stock still. There is wear and tear in every thing that moves and has its being. Things, principles, ideas, will get old, decrepit, used up, and must be replaced with new.

But it is a saddening, disheartening thought that probably not more than one million of the fourteen hundred million individuals of this human race know, appreciate, feel the force of, and guide their lives by this fact of change and progress. Thirteen hundred and ninety-nine million human beings hav the cosmical conception that everything is fixed, that nothing changes, that immobility reigns, and the thing that is, is the thing that shall forever be; and thirteen hundred and ninety-nine million human beings are continually envying the one million for their happiness, their steadiness, their unconcern amidst what to others is a period of alarm—are continually grumbling, scolding, vilifying, cursing the one million for predicting change, aiding development, invoking progress. If those ganglionic convolutions, white matter or gray, that are on the road towards brains in the thirteen hundred and ninety-nine million human heads could once be irradiated with the idea that the drop curtain they are at this vivid instant fixing their gaze upon is not by any manner of means the whole play; that if they will take front seats, stop shucking peanuts, and pay particular attention, a little bell will tinkle, up will go the curtain, a scene will appear, then another scene, and scenes will change into other scenes, acts will be played, and the whole drama wound up. If this conception of scenic, panoramic, evolutionary movement could once get into the thirteen hundred and odd million human heads, the cosmos would at once hav a new interest to them, the universe would hav a reason for being, and life would be worth living.

Now, what is true of the whole is true of the parts. Governments, institutions, codes of laws, constitutions, all are sapped, mined, and inter-penetrated with this principle of movement—this necessity for change. One would suppose, for instance, that by this time the male human being would giv up the contest for institutions that endow him with untenable power and confer upon him a questionable superiority over the female human being—institutions that never hav been stable; that hav changed and again changed, and that now, more than ever, are crumbling beneath his feet. We hav arrived at a stage in this phantasmagoria of movement when everything is questioned. No principle in science, no tenet in religion, no policy in politics, no tenure of property, but is called up for review and must receive sentence of approval, of modification, or of abolition. Is the civilized or Christian system of marriage the one and only lucky institution in the universe that was established perfect at first, that has stood the shock of ages, and come out in the nineteenth century safe from all change and perfect in form, while every other institution, under the knock-down arguments of time, of experience, and reason, hav been battered out of all shape? To him who hath eyes, who hath ears and clear senses, and who reads history with them all open, that system which relates the sexes, under whatever name it is, has been known, has been as variable, as inconstant, as obedient to evolution, as any other institution. Even the one principle which now universally characterizes marriage, the subjection of woman to man, amounting practically to ownership, has had its victories and its defeats. There hav been times and places where women were in power and had the administration of affairs, but these were the accidents of development, occurring long ago, and limited to a few favored spots and spaces. But this freedom of woman could not long be maintained. It is now universally subordinated to that of man, and reduced to that small amount which universal manhood chooses to concede.

But now the "Torch of Science" is blazing with uncommon brightness in all lands and on all institutions; and some radiances from it are penetrating the system of Christian or civilized marriage. The Torch of Science is about to be turned full blaze upon this institution, and it will hav to abide the consequences of the scrutiny like any other institution. The relations of the sexes are as legitimate a subject of philosophic study, of logical adjustment, of applied science, as are the relations of property, of politics, or of industry; and the right of such investigation will be asserted and enforced against all opposition. The Torch-bearers may indeed be, and probably will be, reviled as obscenists, denounced as disturbers of families, ridiculed as Freelovers; but the Torch will shine on all the same, investigation will proceed, and the social adjustments which science demands will be submitted to and allowed to hav full effect. While these changes are going on, while many souls will be freed from nightmare and bodies from torture, some distresses, or perhaps even some tragedies may result to others. All transitions are painful, and some weak creatures, not adapted to survive, may get in the throat of the crisis and be crushed by the pressure.

But, good heavens! what are the few such cases to the thousands on thousands who die daily deaths, unheralded and unknown, from the merciless crushing of the present social machinery! With what face can Sara Underwood talk about "beastly passions" in a tirade against Freelovers and in favor of marriage when she knows that it takes thousands on thousands of harlots to supplement, re-enforce, and counterpart her lauded system of marriage. She ought to know, and probably does know, that these hordes of commercial women are supported mainly by husbands and fathers, and wholly by Christians and confessors of sins. When marriage disappears as an institution, harlotry will disappear with it. No Liberal, no Radical, not one of the class she chooses to stigmatize as Freelovers, contribute to the support of this twin relic of marriage; not one would aid its maintenance any more than he would contribute to the support of the Christian church, and probably not so much, because many a Liberal, in his easy good nature, to keep peace in the family, secure custom in business, and be deemed a good citizen in the community, does contribute to the support of a church which he despises.

Sara adduces two cases of what she deems suffering which she attributes to Freelove. But, O most dear Sara, was there never any suffering, any tragedy, any crime under the cloak and cover of marriage? Here in a New York court last year eight women filed before the Judge one after another, all of them having been married to one and the same man before he got found out and arrested—and this convenient and repetitive extension of our marriage laws is a perfectly easy pattern to be followed, and is extensively practiced in our widely extended country and overgrown cities, and women hav no protection against it.

Then the cruelties and abuses in marriage are notorious, as Mrs. Stanton describes them to be, whether Sara knows of them or not. Take the Torch of Science and go to our anatomical museums, or even to the private office of any physician of large practice, and bring the light to bear on the bottled, labeled, and well-preserved, specimens of uterine tumors, cancers, displacements, and monstrous growths of many kinds, and then say, if you can, that there is no suffering, no beastiality in marriage; that all is sacred and divine and lovely in marriage. Do you suppose, dear Sara, in an age of freedom, an age of independence for woman, that one single one of your branch of the race will remain with any man on any tumor terms? Would not she terminate such a relation, and be upheld by public opinion in terminating it, long before the cancer period could arrive?

Another phase of this marriage system—a reflex one—should be spoken of, when charges of suffering and cruelty are bandied about. Not a poor girl in all this land, who trusts, with all the faith of inexperience, the promises of her lover, will be sustained by Christian or civilized public opinion if he deserts her—and opium, charcoal, or the dark river remorselessly closes her career. These are Christian penalties, decreed by a civilization molded by Christian teachings.

But, as a Liberal, I am happy to say that, thanks to the aforesaid Torch of Science, these teachings are losing their hold on the people and the subjects of them are breaking away. There are a few parents who will not turn their daughters out of doors, and the number of the humane is increasing. There are a few high souls who will not desert, on the contrary will rally around, any so-called "unfortunate," enable her to preserve her self-respect, and, above all things, reprieve her from death.

The kind-hearted Oliver Goldsmith, a century ago, put the social decree into the following mournful numbers:

"When lovely woman stoops to folly
And finds too late that men betray,
What charm can soothe her melancholy?
What art can wash her guilt away?

The only art her guilt to cover,
To hide her shame from every eye,
To giv repentance to her lover
And wring his bosom, is—to die."

That cruel decree remains, with lessening rigor, in force to this day; but now or soon the following will be the better rendering of the spirit of the age:

When woman loves 'tis no more folly,
Men nobler grown no more betray,
The mateless maid is melancholy,
The guilt of love is washed away.

There's no more guilt for art to cover,
No shame dwells now in any eye,
Repentance wrings no bosom lover,
The folly is—to stoop, to die.

But Liberals, Radicals, Freethinkers, and progressive souls of all stripes, will not be scared by any Christian bugbear. Readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER especially hav been tried as by fire and will not go into hysterics. They believe in science, accept the truths of science in all realms of research, and will welcome any changes which the discoveries of science bring about in any department of human affairs. Whatever changes may be found necessary in marriage will come, will gain favor, and become established on account of their reasonableness, on account of their accordance with human nature, on account of the greater happiness they confer upon the human race. The advocates of the promotion of woman to her rightful supremacy in the whole affectional department of human affairs are not moving to usher in chaos and hideous night, and they know that no results of a disastrous nature will follow their efforts.

Liberal News Items.

LIBERALS of western New York and western Pennsylvania should remember that the Linesville Liberal League Paine celebration comes off Jan. 27th, 28th, and 29th.

MR. D. NEILSON, of St. Thomas, Ont., Can., is making an effort to induce some of our Liberal publishers to issue a Freethought journal for children. I wish such a paper could be started with such a woman as Elmina Drake Slenker as editor.

MR. W. H. T. WAKEFIELD, the Secretary of the Kansas State Liberal League, writes, "The records of my office show that we hav about thirty Leagues fully organized in the state, and there is reason to believe that this number will be nearly doubled by next August.

ALLOW me to thank the following-named donors for their contributions made to assist me in my Liberal work since July, 1879: Annie Carter, $1; M. Reiman, $2; Paul Gariepy, $2.50; L. Spaulding, $1; J. H. Northrup, $1; Isaac Corbin, $1; James Bredner, $1; S. S. Ball, $4; Dr. W. T. Wellborn, $2.50; W. Walker, $2. I will try to put to good use any further contributions that I may hereafter receive.

THE Liberal cause has recently lost a noble friend in the death of Mrs. Ann Ellsworth Hunt, of Indiana. I made her acquaintance at the Watkins Convention, and met her again at the Cincinnati Congress. Her well spent life will not die with her, but will remain to bless the world long after her departure. I never met a braver defender of truth as she understood it.

MRS. COLBY and Mrs. Smith, of St. Louis, hav been holding Liberal meetings in Buffalo and at other places in western New York. Mrs. Colby does the lecturing and Mrs. Smith the singing. Wherever they go they interest the people. Mrs. Colby is certainly a very able speaker, as all know who listened to her eloquent addresses at the Chautauqua Convention. She proposes now, with her friend Mrs. Smith, to visit some of our Eastern cities. I hope our Eastern friends will giv them a generous welcome.

MR. FRANK D. SMITH, our representative committee man from Idaho, writes: "I hav now before me the letter of Hon. Thomas C. Galloway, of Washington county, accepting the appointment of our Territorial Committee. He is an excellent gentleman, and is now a member elect of our Legislature. He says he cannot do much for a short time, but will 'go in' when the spring opens. What we want here is a good lecturer like Jamieson. The people of east Oregon are with us in this respect, and will throw in their mite. Mr. Galloway says he will try and organize a League in Weiser City soon."

I AM pleased to learn that the new Liberal League of Cincinnati is in a prosperous condition. It has now fifty members. It meets every Sunday at Odd Fellows Hall, corner of Fourth and Home streets. An able course of free lectures are being delivered before the League this winter. For the last six Sundays as follows: "What is Freethought?" by Thos. Winter; "The National Liberal League," by Chas. J. Herbold; "The Phantom Idea of a Future Existence," by Thomas Winter; "Science vs. Superstition," by G. G. Hubbell, and "The Religion of Nature," by Dr. Felix S. Oswald, A. M. Sunday, Jan. 11th, John J. Clegg lectured on "The Mission of Freethought," and on Jan. 18th Charles J. Herbold speaks on "Moral Cowardice."

THE Liberal League State Committee for Ohio for the present year is constituted as follows: Charles J. Herbold of Cincinnati, Chairman; Dr. Charles E. Beardsley, Ottawa; Thomas Sharp, Salem; John J. Clegg, Cincinnati; Dr. Felix S. Oswald, A. M., Cincinnati. Bro. Herbold is doing all it is possible for any one to do for the Liberal League movement in Ohio, but he justly complains that the Liberals of the state do not come to his aid. From a letter I received from E. C. Walker I learn he complains of the same thing. Liberals do not even answer letters written to them. This is not as it should be. Liberals everywhere, if you do not feel able to contribute a little money, to aid your representative, you can write him a word of encouragement. The fact is, Liberals hav never learned to work for the cause. There may be some persons who call themselves Liberals, who left the church, as I heard a distinguished Liberal speaker say once, because they were too d——d tight to pay pew rent. Fifty cents from each Liberal of a state would enable its committee man to accomplish a great work. There are few but could afford to pay that sum if disposed so to do.

Paine's Birthday

Will be celebrated by the Linesvile (Pa.) Liberal League with a three-days' meeting devoted to eloquent speeches, good music, tripping the light fantastic, and eating. January 27th, 28th, and 29th are the days set apart for this purpose. Lyman C. Howe, J. W. Van Namee, Mrs. Colby, W. W. Walker, H. L. Green, O. P. Kellogg, and other able speakers will attend. The League extends a cordial invivation to all to be present, and Christian clergymen are specially asked to come and hear some truths about their great antagonist. Two sessions of the meeting will be held each day. Thursday evening, the 29th, will close with a grand ball in Opera Hall and a supper served in League Hall. The Linesville full orchestra will furnish the inspiration for the disciples of Terpsichore. The dance and supper will cost those enjoying both $1.50. The supper alone is 25 cents. Tickets can be bought prior to the occasion at Rankin & Fenner's drug-store.

Discussion.

PROPOSITION.—"The Christian religion and the Bible tend to immorality and the injury of society."

MR. JAMIESON'S SPEECH.—CONTINUED.

William Howitt, of England, in his work entitled "Colonization and Christianity," writing of Europe, makes this strong statement:

"The barbarities and desperate outrages of the so-called Christian race, throughout every region of the world and upon every people that they have been able to subdue, are not paralleled by those of any other race, however fierce, however untaught, and however reckless of mercy and of shame, in any age of the earth."

Hon. James M. Peebles, a gentleman of extensive research, and a distinguished traveler, bears similar testimony:

"Are professing Christians in this century really any better—any more charitable and Christlike—than those denominated Infidels and ultra-rationalists? Nearly two thousand years of trial and demonstration have justly written down Christianity a most stupendous failure! The fruits, the influences, justify such judgment. Its highways, ablaze with war-banners, are paved with human skulls; and its history, shocking to refined natures, can only be written in tears and blood. The candid in every walk of life must admit that, since the famous Constantinian Council, its undertones have been the groans and pleading cries of the persecuted and the imprisoned, the beheaded and the burned at martyrs' stakes" (Jesus: Myth, Man, or God).

On page 85 of the same book he says:

"Carefully tracing the career of the Christian church under the patronage of Christian sovereigns, one is compelled to consider Christianity synonymous almost with persecution and fiendishness. Does an apologist say this was not Christianity? The groundless assertion is denied. It was, it is, Christianity; and what is more, it is in perfect keeping with the genius of the system as interpreted by councils, synods, and the masses of its devotees. If the fruits are disliked, disown, deny the tree, the name even of the tree that bore and bears them. This theological superstructure—Judaized Christianity—with its total depravity and vicarious atonement, with its angry God and threatened retaliating damnation of numberless millions, naturally and legitimately promotes just such individual and natural wickedness as we have been contemplating."

We need not be astonished at any of the many crimes committed by Christians. Their religion licenses them to commit all sorts of crimes. I admit that there are many noble-minded Christian men and women, who love the truth and think they have it. They are excellent citizens because they are more influenced by their human nature than their religion.

Huxley says: "Extinguished theologians lie about the cradle of every science as the strangled snakes beside that of Hercules; and history records that whenever science and orthodoxy have been fairly opposed, the latter has been forced to retire from the list."

That is the way Christians defeat their foes. The plain, matter-of-fact history of science itself proves these words of the great Huxley to be literally true. This being a fact, what becomes of the boasting of my reverend friend, in his first speech, that Christianity won victories? Huxley continues:

"Bleeding and crushed, if not annihilated; scotched, if not slain. But orthodoxy is the Bourbon of the world of thought. It learns not; neither can it forget; and though at present bewildered and afraid to move, it is as willing as ever to insist that the first chapter of Genesis contains the beginning and end of sound science, and to visit, with such petty thunderbolts as its half-paralyzed hands can hurl, those who refuse to degrade nature to the level of primitive Judaism."

It sounds almost as if he had my friend in view. As nearly all scientists hold such sentiments as these in regard to Christianity, they are classed by Mr. Ditzler as being on my side—Infidels; and of course this has made the battle easy for me. He has given the brains of the world to the Infidel side. True he strove to modify the position, when he saw where it landed him, by assuming that Christians are friendly to science. So far as science may seem to agree with theology, that may be true, because science is becoming everywhere more popular with the people, and Christianity is losing its hold.

I now call attention to another fact, and that is the doctrine of the right of private judgment is Infidelity; it is not Christianity. The Christianity of Protestantism has been stolen from the mother church, while the Infidelity is the real Protestantism after all. Protestantism is a mixture of Roman Catholicism and modern Infidelity. Extract the Infidelity, and there is but Catholicism left. My friend himself recognized this fact when he denominated as Infidels such minds as Parker, Draper, and others, who were deemed by him too Liberal to be Christian.

Edgar Guinet, a great herald of Protestantism, styles the Protestant sects "the thousand gates open to get out of Christianity." In a little work entitled "Plain Talk about the Protestantism of To-day," by Segur, it is declared that "the Protestant rejects, on the claim of private judgment, a part of the Christian truths which the church teaches to the world by the authority of Christ. The Infidel, in the name of the same freedom, goes farther and rejects all Christian truths." "It is the same principle with both. It is the individual reason which takes the place of faith; that is, of the submission of the spirit to divine authority. The Protestant, whether he believes it or not, is an Infidel in germ, and the Infidel is a Protestant in full bloom."

And that is strictly true. My opponent was anxious to make it appear that Infidels organized the Catholic church. When I proved the absurdity of that statement so clearly that even my friend saw it, he qualifies it by saying he meant that Infidels made it possible for the Catholic church to be organized. That, too, was his mere assertion without the least offer of proof. Let us see, now, how Catholics view the matter of authorship.

"Now, I say it again, and all Protestants must needs say it with me, this private judgment is Protestantism in its essential principle. Then Luther, the father of private judgment and of Protestantism, is the father of all Infidelity—the father of all anti-Christian negation."

Martin Luther admitted that Christianity was borrowed from the Catholic church. In his dispute with Zwinglius, who objected to the dogma of the real presence as a remnant of popery, Luther said: "Well, then, reject also the holy Bible, because it is from the pope we received it. We are forced to acknowledge, Protestants as we are, that in popery there are truths of salvation, yes, all the truths of salvation, and that we receive them from popery; for it is in popery that we find the true Holy Scriptures, true baptism, the true sacrament of the altar, the true keys which pardon sin, true preaching, true catechism, the true articles of faith, and moreover, I say, that in popery true Christianity is to be found." (See the Protestant edition of Luther's Works, published in Jena, pp. 408-9.)

For every statement made on my side of these questions I hav given you proof. I did not ask you to take my ipse dixit.

NOTE.—The local paper in which the debate of eight sessions was published refused to print the ninth night's speeches. The Christians began the work of publication, and we give their side faithfully, just as they reported it, excepting typographical errors. As the debate now stands, both disputants have about the same amount of space. Mr. Jamieson, however, has written to both Rev. Dr. Ditzler and moderator, Rev. M. Greene, offering to print Mr. Ditzler's last two speeches in full. If they are not received it will not be Mr. Jamieson's fault, as he has done all he can to accord to his opponent an equal chance and perfect fairness. If the reverend gentleman will avail himself of Mr. Jamieson's courteous offer his addresses will appear. But if Mr. Ditzler has nothing further to offer, it is, of course, his privilege to leave the debating track, instead of running the course set before him, and the debate, which was listened to by hundreds of interested auditors for nine sessions, two hours each, will close with Mr. Jamieson's eighteenth address.—PUBLISHER.

Shall We Bow to the Church?

There is not a sin in the catalogue of crime of which the church has not been guilty, not one. Run your eye up and down the black record of the past, and then turn your attention to the work of the church as seen to day. For a thousand years she has been the great robber of the world. She bankrupted the nations of the Old World, impoverished individuals, and held the mighty arm of power round the financial throat of every state of the old continent. She has been the crestor and nurser of the greatest cruelties invented by human malice, which belonged to the dark ages, when torture shook the world as never before. She robbed parents to build jails in which to incarcerate men and women who could not believe, perchance, in some absurd dogma or proposition originated by some fanatical, religious Jesuit.

Not only does the church stand forth as a highway robber upon this earth, but as the representative of the most diabolical murders committed or known in the ages. She has put to death men and women of different belief until her servants hav fainted under the task of beheading helpless ones in chains.

And yet not an indictment has ever been drawn against this church power in the great orthodox religions that could hold. The pious and saintly religious judges hav always excused her because she perpetrated her erroneous ideas and hideous murders in the name of religion. This is wrong. We protest, in the name of humanity, against these outrages and unpunished evils. An evil is none the less an evil because it is perpetrated in the name of religion. Nay, it is a greater evil; it deserves merciless censure and severe punishment. If any citizen of the United States should do one hundredth part of what the old church religions hav done every day for centuries past, he would be hanged by the neck until dead; and unsung and unwept he would pass into eternity; his grave would be unmarked.

And now we are asked to bow and worship this holy fraud who has taught through her example every evil known to man. Calvin was a murderer, he took the life of Servetus. Not that Servetus had committed any crime; not that he had been guilty of any wrong; but he could not conscientiously believe as Calvin did. When dying he regretted he could not believe as Calvin did, but rather than to say he did he perished in the flames. Should we do as Calvin did we would be hung for murder, yet we praise him because he took a human life in the name of religion.

It is not on record where the church ever punished men and women for not doing right. Thousands and millions of her slaughtered victims, whose bones bleach in the valleys of Europe, whose blood once made red the rivers of the Old World, whose moans and groans once made unbearable the cities and states of the old continent, were men and women not charged with living impure and immoral lives, but men and women who could not believe, and would not say they did, all the dogmas and doctrines of the church. Let every man who wishes to enjoy religious liberty in this land, the freest land beneath the sun, for the sake of humanity, for the sake of free thought and free speech, for the sake of encouraging the growth of the mind, let every man bow to nothing but his sincere conviction of right worship, and to no other being than that mighty ruling influence that allows him to be true to his views. And furthermore let him praise and love all others for so doing. Then there will be no persecution. Difference of opinion there will be, but that difference will be cloaked in charity, and

"The greatest of these is charity."

Progress of Freethought in Berks and Schuylkill Counties, Pennsylvania.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Thinking that a few words from this part of the moral vineyard might not be uninteresting to your readers, I desire to say a few words about it. A year ago Reading was possessed of a few Liberals, many of them Spiritualists, a few Materialists, and a large number who did not care enough about the matter to formulate a belief, but none of them taking any stock in brimstone or the love of God, which is past finding out. The preachers had things pretty much their own way. There were but few who took THE TRUTH SEEKER. I knew of but one regular subscriber; since that time it has been taken by twenty or thirty, and four times that number read it; as a consequence the people became interested and desirous of knowing these new truths. Occasionally a copy fell into the hands of a divine. One of these men, forgetting that his religion was not built up and strengthened by controversy, flew to the daily paper, and began telling what a bad paper he had discovered, with many and various remarks about the bad people who would dare to print and send out such a paper. The consequence is that under the benign influence of his holy aspersions and truthful misrepresentations people are inquiring more and more for the truth. Articles have been let into the daily in answer to him, and the people can see the manifest honesty of the latter, and it requires no intellectual telescope to see the hatred, envy, malice, and cowardice of the former. Things will be fair in Reading if the editors will only continue to giv space to both parties to giv Christianity an airing.

I owe the Liberal public, and Bro. Green especially, an apology for promising a League for Reading so hastily, and then not fulfilling my promise. For a time last summer everything was propitious. I had the promise of support from our leading Liberals. I secured the requisite number of names, called the meeting, which was not well attended. Some of our best and most influential men were afraid to enter the work in so public a manner for fear of their business. The old dragon has us in its clutches. It is useless to deny facts. The people—few of them—are not afraid of any hell hereafter, but they are fearfully afraid of the hell they can raise here and now.

Thus the matter stands. I hav, however, great hope for Reading yet, and doubt not ere long we will see a good, strong League here. The church is strong here, but is gradually losing her hold. I fall back upon THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberal books. They will accomplish the work in time.

A short time ago I went into Schuylkill county in the interest of your paper and our literature. Pottsville, the county-seat, is a lively town of fifteen to sixteen thousand. It is not encircled by but chucked in among the hills, and looks as though it had been built in such a hurry that they had no time to lay off streets. The beauty of the surrounding hills and the open-heartedness and generosity of the people makes one soon forget any little irregularity of the streets. One has but a short distance to go from the center of the town to find himself face to face with nature in her wildest and rudest forms. As I stood upon the top of Sharp Mountain, overlooking the town, drinking inspiration at every breath, viewing the towering hights all around, far and near, I could but stand and contemplate the mighty force that had thus piled them in their huge magnificence; then I cast my eye down upon the habitations of man far below, and thought, "How puny are his efforts in comparison to these piles around me!" "Yet," thought I, "has he not dug to the center of these hills and compelled them to yield their treasures? Has he not leveled his roads over them? Has he not bored through these and made his roads, through which he speeds on wings of steam?" Yea, verily, man is monarch.

Many of the people are in perfect sympathy with the freedom of these hills, and are Liberal to the core. I met many solid Freethinkers.

Mr. Ingersoll's work here was not without its effect. The Liberal element, although not organized, is wide awake and earnest. Here, as elsewhere, the Gorgon (the church) freezes to stone many who would otherwise be active in the spread of light and truth.

I had the pleasure of attending a county teachers' institute, where I made many pleasant acquaintances, and found Liberals, both ladies and gentlemen, among them. I take it as quite an indication that the people are throwing off the strait-jacket of the priest when almost the entire institute, and many of them Christians, attended a real live comic opera. There was some growling the next day by some of the goody-goody ones, but I took it for granted that they were there. Altogether I hav seldom visited a town in which I was better pleased with the prospect of Liberal ideas. I left a good many books, and took some orders for THE TRUTH SEEKER, with a good prospect of many more to follow. I then went over the hills about three miles to St. Clair, a little village, and was greeted similarly. Here I found a society calling themselves the Common Sense Society. They are a small band, but are in earnest. All this is evidence to me that the work goes smoothly, irresistibly forward, and although there is much to do, we hav no reason to be discouraged. I shall report progress in the future, as I think it may be interesting.

The Signs of the Times.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: We are not an alarmist, but in taking even a casual survey of the political and religious horoscopes we see serious trouble in the near future. The hand-writing on the wall is too plain to be mistaken. The waves of greed, bigotry, and superstition are rolling higher and higher and becoming more and more defiant. The atmosphere is full of inharmony, dissatisfaction, and unrest.

That there is a moneyed oligarchy, secretly but surely and rapidly, growing up in our very midst no sane, thinking, reasoning person can well deny. The money power and its ally, the church power, are steadily encroaching upon our rights with the one object in view, namely, that of wresting from the masses both civil and religious liberty. We expect soon to see the money power of this country in hostile array against the laboring class. Let us look the facts square in the face. Let them be written in the blue azure sky in letters of fire, as it were, that we may be no longer deceived. It is a lamentable and undeniable fact that the money power has succeeded in the last few years in getting every measure through Congress that it has desired, thereby giving us class legislation with the direct tendency to make the rich richer and the poor poorer. When the government had issued sixty millions of greenbacks, which were, by an act of Congress in 1862, made a full legal tender for all debts, public and private, did not the money power compel the government to cease issuing legal tender as it would spoil their stock in trade? When the "Old Commoner" Thaddeus Stevens, offered a bill authorizing the government to issue five hundred millions legal tender, did not the money power compel Congress to insert the word "except," at which moment the greenback became crippled, shorn of its power, thereby unfitting it for doing what gold would do, hence unequal with it?

After the bond system had beeu fully inaugurated, and bonds purchased with a depreciated paper currency (made so by the money changers), did not this same power compel Congress to pass the so-called public strengthening act of 1869, thus violating the original contract and making the bonds payable in gold and silver only? When silver was being rapidly mined, and some danger of becoming plenty and cheap, did not the money power drive the act of demonetizing silver through Congress, and that too at a late hour and without a single reading? There, in the stillness of night, was the dollar of the daddies stricken down, and so secretly too that some of our leading statesmen, and the press of the country, did not know it for weeks afterward, and done simply to make the bonds payable in gold and silver only. Did not the money power dog Secretary Chase day and night until he succumbed to their demands and gave his consent to the national banking system? Did not the money power clamor for specie resumption and compel Congress to pass an act forcing resumption at a given time, which was unnatural, hence must be productive of unhealthy results? Did not Hayes and Sherman recently request Congress to retire the greenbacks on the ground that they were unconstitutional? Is this not an index finger pointing to the perpetuity of this wholesale swindling banking system whereby a class is enabled to liv in idleness, dwelling in palaces, dressing in purple and fine linen, and faring sumptuously every day upon the sweat and toil of the laboring wealth-producing class?

The time is near when they (the banks) will feel themselves compelled to act strongly. Meanwhile a very good thing has been done. The machinery is now furnished by which in any emergency the financial corporations of the East can act together at a single day's notice with such power that an act of Congress can overcome or resist their decision.

Think of this, coming from an able representative of the money power. The machinery is so arranged that the banks can act together and override the Constitution, defy Congress, and control the government. Is there no danger? With all this evidence, and much more that might be adduced to prove that the money power has controlled and run this government the last eighteen years, what hav we left to hope for. Knowing that the law-making power is mostly made up of unscrupulous, tricky, selfish, soulless political demagogues, who will get down on their bellies to the money power and do their dirty, filthy work for filthy lucre, I ask again, what hope hav we? Think you, gentle reader, that the future is all calm, serene, and sweet? Are there no breakers but a small way ahead? The money power has steadily been encroaching on the rights, privileges, and liberties of the laboring class. Will it not continue its diabolical work until we are ground into powder? We hav quietly submitted heretofore; are we to quietly submit ever after?

We will pause and stick a pin here and take up the other branch of our subject, and answer the above question at the close of our article. It is true that the money power and the church power go hand in hand. Most all clergymen rank with the rich and well-born, and are carried about on a chip by the aristocrats in every community. As the money power has been steadily encroaching upon the rights and liberties of the laboring class, so has the church power been doing likewise. The founders of this republic set church and state as far apart as the poles, but as soon as they died off then began the nefarious work of bringing state and church together, slowly and secretly at first, but more bold and defiant of late. It was the gold-basis money-power Congress that passed the obscenity law by which our honest, noble, patriotic, bold hero, D. M. Bennett, is languishing in prison. The clergy got that law through Congress for the sole benefit of the church. It was but a few years since the constitutional amendment to recognize the Christian God lacked but two votes of passing the Senate. Fifty years ago that resolution would hav been received with scorn and hisses; of late it came near passing. Fifty years ago the obscenity law would hav been received in the same way; now it is a law overriding the Constitution, depriving us of the freedom of the press and the mails, giving saintly, hypocritical, bigoted judges the power to imprison their superiors without a cause. The church power is not satisfied with what has been done, but is becoming more and more intolerant and unjust in its demands. It is now taking steps for the more strict observance of the Sabbath. There was recently a large religious gathering at Mansfield, O., at which time Rev. Peterman, of Philadelphia, preached a sermon upon the legal necessity of the Christian amendment to the Constitution. A quarter of a century ago these things were scarcely thought of. Thus we see that the money power and the church power hav been steadily pushing their claims further, and still further, until the laboring class is at the mercy of capital, until the unbelieving Infidel is at the mercy of Christian judges, with the liberty of the press and mails abridged, and that too in violation of the Constitution.

Dear readers, this has been done, and yet we, with marvelous good nature, hav borne it all. The question to be decided, and soon too, is how much more will the laboring people endure at the hands of the money power? How much more will the Infidel endure at the hands of the church? We expect the coming crisis to start between capital and labor, and as the money power is backed by the church it will finally settle down upon the religious issue.

Shall we hav religious freedom or shall we bow in humble submission to the dictum of the church, is the question for Liberals to decide in this country ere long. We frequently hear Liberals say that "there is no danger, there is too much intelligence in this country." Wonderful, prodigious! What intelligence! Only last Sunday a minister of this town said the star of Bethlehem was a real star sent to point out the spot where one-third of God and his son Jesus lay—about as reasonable as to take one of California's largest cedars to pick a speck out of a person's eye. But then, his hearers took it down. Talk of intelligence when people think that Jesus died that they might liv! Talk of intelligence when acres of people in this country think they eat a part of Christ's body and drink his blood at each sacrament! What a voluminous body he must hav had! and he must hav been a blooded chap! Talk of intelligence when there are millions who shoot off their prayers to a myth, expecting them to be answered, and that they are going to enjoy lots of nice things, etc. This quality of intelligence never fought for religious freedom, but would fight to establish an inquisition for the benefit of Infidels.

Excuse the digression, and we will return to our subject. Liberals, relying so much on the intelligence of the people is wherein the danger lies. We are napping while the enemies of liberty are vigilant and active. It was supposed there was too much intelligence to hav plunged this country into a civil war in 1861. The slave power would not giv up its pet institution until compelled to. Blood and treasure had to be sacrificed, and thus it will be again. The money power will not release its grasp without great sacrifice. The church will not surrender its power and see their pet Jehovah dethroned without revolution. The money power is crying for a strong government—a centralization of power. The church power is crying in thunder tones for God in the Constitution, and thus unite church and state. It seems to the writer idle to suppose that the wrongs we now endure will be righted and still greater wrongs prevented without a revolution of blood and carnage. Revolutiens are wonderful educators, and it seems they must needs to bring about a higher and nobler condition. Matters both politically and religiously are coming to a focus with Aladdin-like rapidity. The crisis we see near at hand, and we regret it that Liberals do not arouse from their lethargy and don the garb of energetic action. There should be Liberal Leagues in every town in the country. There should be a Liberal party formed at once. We should try to see which Congressional district can first send a member to Congress who would hav sufficient moral courage to ask the repeal of the obscenity law, and the withdrawal of chaplains from Congress and the army and navy, etc. We should do all in our power to Liberalize the people, so that when the struggle comes it will be short and decisive. When we look about us and see the condition of things—see poor humanity groveling in the mire of ignorance and superstition. When we see so much to do towards the bettering of humanity, our soul sickens within us. When we see such men as Underwood, Tuttle, Peebles, Abbot & Co. stand upon their dignity and purity, and would fain stab D. M. Bennett in the back while he is bound hand and foot, our soul revolts at the thought of these men claiming to be Liberals, and yet would fain heap insult and injury upon the devoted head of one of the world's noblest, purest, boldest, most honest and able champions of human freedom. Thomas Paine gave birth to the principles of religious liberty, but Columbia's land never produced a more able defender than D. M. Bennett, who acknowledges he wrote some foolish letters, said he was sorry, and promised to do better. What more could he do? What else would these pious gentlemen hav him do? Oh, what purity! the snow upon Mount Hood is nowhere beside it! What innocence! lambs, doves, and humming-birds bear no comparison with them! When they think of "Cupid's Yokes'" obscenity, or see a piece of calico, no doubt but they are sorry they were born men, preferring rather to be hermaphrodites. We regret that the Index, R.-P. Journal, and Independent Age couldn't find a grander work to do than to descend into the cesspool of filth, rottenness, and stench, and thus cause an old stink which had been buried to re-stink again. Gentlemen, you rubbed out the wrong figure. You reckoned without your host, and if your olfactory nerves don't smell that stink until you are heartily sick then we are no prophet.

We would say to all live, earnest, fearless Liberals, There is a mighty work before us. Let us arise and shake off those weak-kneed, kid-gloved gents who hav suffered themselves to become beslimed all over just to gratify their jealousy and tickle the ears of orthodoxy that they may be called popular. Cast aside those clogs. The time has come for earnest, bold, radical men and women to step to the front. The great battle of Armageddon is to be fought. The church of Rome has her eye on this country as the future home of the pope. When the mother church givs the signal her children (the Protestant churches) will fly to her and take refuge beneath her wings, and she, with her legions, will step to the front to put down Infidelity. Then the battte will wax hot. Then will come a second time that will "try men's souls."

My fellow-Liberals, let us not falter. There is not anything so dear, so sweet, as that priceless jewel, human freedom. Let us strike now, strike hard, and strike often, and though the mountains of bigotry, superstition, and tyranny may loom up towering to the clouds, let us scale their lofty peaks, turning neither to to the right nor left till the victory is won. Let us not cease our efforts until every person within our borders, without regard to race, rank, condition, or color, shall revel in the sweets of freedom. Let us not cease our labors until the shackles of the moneyed oligarchy and churchology shall be torn to fragments, and the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of American liberty, shall wave over a land of freedom. Let us not tire until we shall be able to transmit to posterity the noblest, richest, and sweetest inheritance possible to enjoy, that of perfect and entire civil and religious liberty. A. ALLEN NOE.

LET US BE UP AND DOING!—The rationalist is a pilgrim of the spirit; his march is no holiday stroll, but a long exploration into the wilderness of ignorance, error, superstition, deceit, spiritual oppression. Society is full of prejudices that must be effaced; of fears that must be expelled. There is opposition to be encountered with his utmost courage. There is a spirit of slander, misapprehension, and falsehood which he must face from day to day. He cannot lay by his weapons. He cannot amuse himself. The responsibility of the new faith rests upon all who hold it. The harvest is abundant, but the laborers are few, and the few must do the work of many. The time has not come for any to slumber and sleep. The time has just come to be up and doing. Yes, for a long time to come we must comport ourselves like men with their loins girded, their lamps burning, who wait for the coming of their Lord, the spirit of truth, that when he cometh they may be ready to go in with him to the marriage.—O. B. Frothingham.

IT is a curious fact that a soft substance, as cork, blunts the tools used in cutting it far more rapidly than do the hardest and toughest of metals. A cork-cutter's knife requires sharpening every second, while a tool used in planing or boring steel will work for hours without sharpening.

THE acorns of the cork tree are edible, and resemble in taste the chestnut.

Sixth Letter from Albany.

PENITENTIARY, Jan. 11, 1880.

MY DEAR FRIENDS: Summer succeeded spring, autumn followed summer, winter replaced autumn, and mid-winter is already upon us, and I am still a prisoner. I am still deprived of the sweets of liberty; I am still treated as a deep-dyed felon—an enemy to my country and to my fellow-man. But as I am permitted to address you once more, I gladly avail myself of the opportunity As week follows week and month succeeds month, the time passes slowly and drearily here. This is not a place of cheerfulness. Time does not flit so rapidly here as in the crowded metropolis, where duties and pleasures engage the attention of the masses, or as in the smaller towns and villages over the land, where there is always a variety to occupy the time and thoughts; nor as in the thousands of country homes, from Maine to Oregon, where the unending cares and duties of both the husbandman and the faithful housewife fail not to interest and employ both mind and body from day to day and from month to month. There the free air of heaven fans their brows, and their feet are free to go where they please. Here freedom is unknown; everything is coercive and oppressive. Prison life has no attractions; but those can appreciate it best who hav felt its rigors and tasted its bitterness. I do not, however, wish to complain of my lot. My condition is not so bad as it might be. The officers of the prison hav shown me kindness, which I duly appreciate. But to an imprisoned man there is nothing that can take the place of liberty; nothing so longed for as freedom. This he thinks of and yearns for during his waking hours and fondly dreams of in his sleep.

I hav not been feeling quite so well since my last writing as I could wish. A feeling of gloom and sadness has overcast me oftener than wished for. The difficulties of the head, etc., of which I hav before spoken, hav been present more frequently than desirable; but, worse still, I hav been troubled with continued wakefulness. One hardly minds dull and tiresome days if he can sleep well at night; but without refreshing sleep life soon becomes wearisome. I think it was Sancho Panza who said, "God bless the man who first invented sleep." Poets hav truthfully styled it "Tired nature's sweet restorer." It is truly one of man's best friends. But with me of late it has become almost one of the "lost arts." I hav been struck with the difference in my sleeping abilities since I hav been in prison. At first I slept soundly and generally through most of the night; latterly it has not been so. Some nights I obtain an hour or two of sleep, and sometimes none at all. I fain would bow at the shrine of Somnus, the god of sleep, venerated by the ancient Greeks and Romans; but, like some others of the gods, he seems shy and distant and to care little for my oblations or requests. His visits are infrequent and brief. I am not sure whether this state of things depends upon a physical or mental derangement, but probably somewhat of each.

It is not improbable that my experience for the past few months has contributed to this state of mind. I cannot help thinking I hav been treated unjustly and unkindly. For insufficient cause I hav been torn from my home and all that is dear to me in life, and immured with felons. Nominally this has been done because I exercised the rights of an American citizen in using the mail, but really because I think and speak counter to the current system of theology and hav had the temerity to write and publish in accord with my convictions. It was my Christian enemies who did this, in the person of Anthony Comstock. The main object was to suppress my publications — THE TRUTH SEEKER and its books and pamphlets. The plan was well laid, but did not work quite as expected. THE TRUTH SEEKER still lived, and its publications were sent to all parts of the country after I was put in prison. Something more must be done. Additional aids must be enlisted, and from the Liberal ranks envious men were found who were glad to co-operate in destroying the hated TRUTH SEEKER. While the Christian enemies held its editor in close confinement and in a helpless condition, certain Liberal (?) enemies poured in the hot shot of slander, cruel epithets, abuse, distortion, and malignancy.

Some damaging private letters, written two years ago and over, were furnished them, and these they seized upon with the voracity of vultures and the instincts of ghouls; and these, joined with sensational headings, defamation, distortion, malicious comments, and arrant falsehoods, were extensively published from one end of the country to the other. Thousands of extra copies were printed and mailed to friends and foes, and names from a list stolen from my office were used for the purpose. Such treatment, at best, and especially under the circumstances, was heartless, uncalled for, cruel, and despicable. The letters, though discreditable to the writer, were strictly private and harmless. Nobody had been injured by them, and nobody was in any danger of being injured. Their object was not to ruin and destroy a brother. A deed is good or bad in proportion to the good or ill it does to others. If it harms no one it is not extremely bad. The malicious publishers of the letters had no business with them, and neither had the public. The only person at all wronged by them had condoned them, the writer had repented of his indiscretion, and the whole affair had almost passed into deserved forgetfulness, when these human hyenas busied themselves in the way they did, and made their howlings heard across the continent. There was no necessity for such behavior; no interest demanded such unkind conduct, and no good cause was subserved by such villainy. They pretended that a love of purity and morality prompted them; but that was a lie as base as their other assertions. It was cold-blooded malice and the bitterest hate that prompted them. More than all else, they wished to destroy THE TRUTH SEEKER and to disgrace its editor for the present and all future time. Only partial success has attended their efforts. The paper still livs and has more friends than ever; and if the vile traducers hav found that the weapon with which they expected to destroy a hated rival has, like the boomerang, recoiled upon them and injured them quite as much as the party assailed, it is but a matter of simple and retributive justice.

Of course I cannot be insensible to the false and cruel things that hav been said about me. It is very unpleasant to be thus represented, especially by those one had a right to regard as friends. I am extremely regretful that I hav been at fault in the matter. Wherever I hav been lacking in the qualities of discretion and propriety, no one can be so sorry for it as myself; but base motives hav been charged upon me which I never entertained. Those who hav been so loud in denouncing me, and hav said such harsh and cruel things about me, may be purer and holier than the average of their fellow-beings, but I hardly believe it. I am quite positive that some of them hav committed deeds that an honorable man would be ashamed to be guilty of, and would never perform; but some seem to think that if they are only ready to condemn others, they will be thought spotless themselves. It may be a mark of Liberalism and of gentlemanly conduct to be hunting up the mistakes of a brother and blazoning them to the world, combined with gross misrepresentation, slander, and lies; but I do not believe it, nor that the cause of Liberalism is benefited by such a course. The occupation of plucking beams from our own eyes is probably far better than going insane over the motes of our neighbors' eyes. Bogus morality, like bogus coin and bogus jewelry, will be found out in time, and estimated at its real value. A malicious desire to injure another will not always pass for virtue and purity.

An attempt has been made to make it appear that Col. R. G. Ingersoll had denounced me and withdrawn his friendship from me, but I think it hardly the case. In a friendly letter to my wife, dated December 29th, he said: "When you write your husband tell him, for me, that I hav not and will not join in the cry against him. I am no Pharisee." From my heart I thank and bless that noble man. How much grander is he than those who play the part of self-righteous Pharisees and accusers!

Those men who hav done their utmost to ruin me and destroy my business had good reason to know that every dollar I hav in the world is invested in my publishing business, and that in destroying it a man and his family would be left penniless in his old age and without any means of support. They know I had toiled earnestly and honestly to build up that business. To use their talents to bring about such a result would seem to be quite as bad as writing a few indiscreet letters, and even cherishing a warm appreciation of the opposite sex. To purposely injure another in reputation and property is a blacker crime than to be too loving or to sometimes write indiscreetly.

But as these Pharisees unite with my Christian foes in insisting that THE TRUTH SEEKER is a very bad paper, and ought not to be patronized, possibly it may be so; but it is singular that the large number of people who read it every week should not also be able to discover it.

One of the principal charges against the paper is that it givs the unfavorable accounts of the misdeeds of some of the clergy. It would seem that the priesthood hav become such an immaculate class of men, so indispensable, and preach such valuable and important truths, are so far from cant and hypocrisy, that not a word should be said against them even though their offenses are of the grossest character. It is presumed, too, that not even the current reports of the daily and weekly press of the country against them must be repeated. It seems to hav been found also that the Bible is so perfect a book that no improper language can be found in it, and that to say anything to the contrary is very wrong. This is supposed to be cultured and improved Liberalism, and when duly accepted the approval of the Christian clergy and press is generally secured. A priesthood may be established in our own ranks with perhaps saints, bishops, and possibly a pope. THE TRUTH SEEKER, being a heretic, can hardly be expected to be regarded as an orthodox Liberal, and will of course be ruled out. It will, however, continue to speak out freely against what it considers the errors, shams, and hypocrisies of the age. But it will not object to the self-righteous Pharisees forming a sect by themselves.

It is quite possible that through inadvertance or otherwise some articles may hav appeared in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER which might with propriety hav been omitted, but I hardly think the good taste of the old-fashioned kind of Liberals has been grossly outraged. It is cheering that it still livs, and bids fair to continue to do so. Thanks to its numerous friends and patrons, the combined efforts of its Christian enemies and their allies, the godly Pharisees, it has not been crushed out. It will liv, it will grow. If it has made mistakes it will try to correct them. It will become better and better, and will continue to dispense the truths of nature and reason to the best of its ability.

I can say frankly I regret any and all imperfections and mistakes I hav committed. I am sensible that I hav not been faultless nor immaculate. I hav been thoughtless and indiscreet, and I am sorry that such is the fact, but I hope I hav not committed the gravest of crimes. I trust I hav not seriously injured one of my fellow-beings. To do so I believe to be the greatest wrong we can commit. I hav aimed not to harm others, and this shall continue to be my effort.

It seems to me my punishment is fully equal to my offenses. For mailing Mr. Heywood's argumentative and philosophical pamphlet, which great numbers of people hav bought and sold, and which thousands hav read without seeing any harm in it, I certainly am suffering severely enough. For the indiscreet letters I hav written I think I hav been sufficiently punished. If there is virtue in atonement, and if a man by suffering can pay debts of the kind under consideration, then when I am discharged from this prison I ought to be nearly as well purified as are some of the Pharisees. Time is steadily passing. Day succeeds day, and every one counts. Less than four months will complete my sentence, when I can once more be free. I think my patience and endurance will hold out to the end.

We are all pilgrims in the journey of life. With some it is quicker and shorter than others. Some of us continue the struggle till infirm with years. Varied are the incidents we meet with on the route, and varied are the qualities, peculiarities, and dispositions of the voyagers; variously do they perform the journey, and in varying degrees do they enact good and evil deeds while upon the way. Those do the most good and their account stands most in their favor who hav been the kindest and most humane to their fellow-travelers, and hav done most to relieve their weary fellow-pilgrims of that which tended to make them unhappy while on their toilsome journey. Few prove so perfect as never to make a mistake or misstep, to never commit a fault; but as the journey draws to a close, and accumulating years admonish the weary traveler that his journey is well-nigh ended, the fewer mistakes he has made, and the fewer faults he has committed, the fewer wrongs he has done to his companions on the way, the more kind acts and good deeds he has performed towards them, the more he has lessened their grief, and the more he has added to their comfort and enjoyment, the happier will be his reflections, the more joyfully will he near the goal towards which he so long has been tending, and the more placidly will he lay himself down to take the long sweet rest so justly due him. When that time arrives with all of us, may our reflections not be disturbed by memories of wrongs we hav done to those who have traveled the journey of life with us.

The holidays were dull with us here in prison. On Christmas and New Years the men did not work in the shops, but remained in their cells during the day. No meetings nor services were held. An extra dinner was served to the prisoners—on Christmas a chicken stew, and on New Years oysters. On the former day eight or ten apples and oranges were given to each one. These attentions were gratefully received, but they made poor amends for the deprivations of home and friends. I think I never passed so gloomy a Christmas and New Years, and never so unhappy a birth-day (Dec. 23d). Little did I think during the years I hav lived that my sixty-first birth-day would be passed within the walls and bars of a prison. But it is impossible to calculate the future, or tell what joys and sorrows lie in our pathway. Time only can reveal these things.

Our numbers hav been augmenting here considerably of late. One hundred and seventy-five new candidates for servitude and unhappiness came in during the month of December. The cells are nearly all filled, and the shops are well supplied with workmen. I feel a warm sympathy for the hapless men who are brought here, especially if they are advanced in years. I know well the sorrow and unhappiness they are destined to experience.

During the past few weeks I hav done comparatively little at my new book mentioned in my last. I hav not felt much like it, and I am fearful that there are not enough of my readers who care to engage a copy of the work to justify bringing it out at present. It costs a great deal to publish so large a work, and unless a certain number of copies are engaged it seems hardly prudent to press it just now. Let me, however, again call the attention of all to it. Those who wish a copy of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," an octavo of nearly one thousand pages, are requested to send a postal card to THE TRUTH SEEKER office giving notice of the same. If enough are bespoken to pay a certain portion of the expenses the work will be pushed vigorously, but if a few only wish the work, it will hardly be published at present. I think it will be a valuable work, and cheap at $3.00. I will make this proposition: Those who secure a copy and find they do not like it, or if it is not worth three dollars to them, I will take it back, if in good order, and giv in exchange other books of my publications to the same amount. Now, how many will hav a copy? It would, of course, gratify my feelings to hav it in fair demand, but if friends do not wish it I will not urge it.

Before closing let me again thank those who hav been so kind as to write me since I hav been in prison. Those letters hav been a source of great comfort to me. Those who hav written repeatedly will please accept a multiplied share of my gratitude. A good letter is the next thing to a personal visit, and is most acceptable. I thank every one who has written a friendly letter to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication. I thank every one who has spoken a kind and sympathising word in my behalf. I warmly thank every one who has contributed of his means to help keep THE TRUTH SEEKER running during my imprisonment. I regard such as true friends to humanity and the cause of Liberalism. I thank every one who has promptly renewed his subscription. Of such are the fraternity of Truth Seekers. I thank every one who has ordered TRUTH SEEKER books and pamphlets. Such spread truth and light and aid in helping on the good work. I thank every one who has exerted himself in obtaining new subscribers. Such are the apostles of truth, and are helping to spread its light over the world. I thank every new subscriber, whether for a year or for three months. Such are in a fair way to be happy and free men and women. May they so approve of the paper as never to wish to be deprived of it. And right here, let me ask those who are in arrears to do as those hav done who hav renewed, and particularly let me request those who do not wish the paper and to pay for it, to send word to the office to that effect, and to pay for the paper for the time they hav had it. Such a course is certainly the honorable one. I would be happy to take you all by the hand; you feel near and dear to me, and I can say in truth, I esteem you, yes, I love you. May your days be long in the land, and may your numbers never be less. I am heartily and sincerely your friend,

D. M. BENNETT.

Mr. Underwood and that Interview.

On his way West, Mr. B. F. Underwood called upon us. We were glad to see him, for there were several things which we wished to quiz him about, The letters he wrote to the R.-P. Journal we regarded as entirely uncalled for on his part, and we are still of the same opinion. The interview, as reported in the Inter-Ocean, we thought reflected harshly upon the mass of Liberals of the country, with whom THE TRUTH SEEKER is the favorite paper. We wanted to talk to him on these subjects. He had denied that the reporter of the Inter-Ocean had taken him down correctly, and we wished to know exactly what he did say. We do not wish to judge any one incorrectly, much less to form opinions and say things of a public man which are based on erroneous reports of incompetent and indifferent, if not hostile, reporters. Upon the subject of the letters, Mr. Underwood and ourselves will continue to disagree. He thought they were his business; we knew they were not. Until Mr. Bennett had answered the malicious charges it was but common decency and fairness for representative Liberals to withhold their judgment. If he had denied them, then the consensus of the "competent" could sit in judgment, if they choose, on the authenticity of the documents; but until he had been heard from, we contend that it would hav been proper and meritorious for outsiders to hav kept still.

Mr. Underwood evidently felt that he was bound to justify his interference in the matter; and the fact that he received "at least a dozen" letters urging him to go to Chicago at Bundy's behest is regarded by him as sufficient excuse. We do not agree with him. We think he made a great mistake. But we will let that pass. All men make mistakes, and it would be absurd to suppose our friend Underwood an exception.

Regarding that interview, we find from his own statements that he is somewhat misrepresented. There were several parties present besides himself, and their remarks are sometimes given by the reporter as his. It is, of course, manifestly unjust to condemn him for what other people may hav said. Just what he did say on the points to which the greatest exceptions hav been taken, we will giv in his own words, which were taken down. The reporter asked him as to what sort of a book "Cupid's Yokes" was, to which Mr. Underwood repled, "A very coarse attack on marriage, but not, in my opinion, an obscene production." "Has it," inquired the reporter, "had much circulation?" To which Mr. Underwood replied, "Owing to the foolish prosecution of Heywood and Bennett, there has been quite a demand for it." To the questions, "Why were the Freethinkers in sympathy with Mr. Bennett in selling this kind of literature?" and, "Is the Liberal party in favor of 'Cupid's Yokes?'" Mr. Underwood said—and this is the way he used the very offensive expression of rag-tag and bobtail: "There is no Liberal party; but if you refer to the Freelove element and to an illiterate class that is without any settled conviction, but is attracted by anything that is new and novel, a sort of intellectual rag-tag and bobtail element among Liberals, always ready to attack something—without any knowledge of the positive side of Freethought—I should say yes. But the great mass of Freethinkers hav no sympathy with Freelove. Indeed, the element I represent as little approved of the circulation of 'Cupid's Yokes' as did the orthodox Christians. Still we maintained his legal right to circulate, but thought he acted foolishly in doing so. This is the position of Ingersoll and the great mass of Liberals everywhere."

We were very particular about getting a correct statement of this, because we, as well as thousands all over the country, took offense at being called tag-rag and bobtail. We did not know that there was any such element, and we are still in doubt, as our friend did not inform us who composed this "intellectual rag-tag and bobtail element."

There are several things in this last answer that grate harshly upon us. We believe that Freethinkers, as a class, do hav settled convictions, and that even the much maligned Freelovers, mistaken as they undoubtedly are in some things, are not entirely ignorant upon the great subject which engages so much of their attention. When he speaks of an "illiterate class," we are as much at a loss to know to whom he refers as we are when he mentions the rag-tag and bobtail element. Freelove, as understood by those who, like Joe Cook, know nothing of it beyond the name, is synonymous with free lust, and as such is undoubtedly frowned upon by the great mass of Liberals. But we trust Mr. Underwood does not mean that Liberals are in favor of forced love. Just what element Mr. Underwood represents, or indeed any one man represents, is a ticklish question. He would not, we think, hav us suppose he represents the class of which Abbot is so conspicuous a member; and, according to his own statements, he does not represent the ragtag and bobtail element, or illiterate class, and so we must believe that he represents the great middle element. In other words, he is on the fence between the radical Radicals and the conservative Radicals.

The reporter also asked Mr. Underwood whether the Freelovers were numerous. Mr. Underwood replied: "I think not, although at this time, when one of their works is suppressed, and a Freethought publisher is in prison for circulating it, they make a good deal of stir."

The report as published in the Inter-Ocean would lead one to infer that Mr. Underwood regarded E. H. Heywood and Moses Hull as illiterate, while Stephen Pearl Andrews only refrained from avowing openly the dangerous opinions he had fathered from a fear of the consequences. This, Mr. Underwood assures us, is a mistake. What he did say was in answer to a question from the reporter as to who are some of the prominent Freelovers. He said: "Stephen Pearl Andrews is, I believe, in sympathy with their views, and is a thinker and the most scholarly man among them. Heywood, the author of 'Cupid's Yokes,' is another—an educated but erratic man. I may also name Moses Hull." One gentleman present said that Mr. Moses Hull should hardly be ranked as a representative of any social views; but the three names were reported. Mr. Underwood also said he should not accept Mr. Hull's challenge to debate. In regard to Mr. Hull's charges that at Paine Hall he misrepresented the advocates of Freelove, he said that on that occasion he did not mention friend Moses' name.

The reporter sent by the Inter-Ocean must hav been either very stupid, forgetful, or malicious, for his report and Mr. Underwood's statement of what he did say are very different. Mr. Underwood regards himself, as a public man, as a legitimate object of criticism; but he wishes to be criticised on what he says and not on what some reporter, who learned the language in a country somewhat given to blustering, may say he says. And we can but consider his wishes within the bounds of reason. From the conversation we had with him we believe his heart to be right; but he sometimes uses expressions and commits acts which we cannot but regard as ill-advised and ill-timed. We trust that nothing further will occur to jar the harmony which ought to exist between him and THE TRUTH SEEKER.

Action of the Rochester Liberal League.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: At a meeting of the Rochester Liberal League, Jan. 5, 1880, President Amy Post in the chair, Dr. A. E. Tilden, from a committee appointed December 22, 1879, presented the following report and resolutions, which, after careful deliberation and discussion, were unanimously adopted; one member only requesting it placed on record that he objected to the clause that declares, that "if it is the duty of the Tompkins County League to withdraw it is equally the duty of this and all other Leagues," etc. It was further voted that we request other Leagues to express through THE TRUTH SEEKER their views of the points made in this report.

A. E. TILDEN, Secretary.

Rochester, N. Y., Jan. 6, 1880.

REPORT.

To the Officers and Members of the Liberal League of Rochester, N. Y.

Your Committee to whom was referred the subject matter of a circular issued by authority of the Tompkins County League containing five preambles and four resolutions reported to that body December 1, 1879, and now awaiting action by them,

Respectfully report, That we hav given the matter as careful consideration as our circumstances would permit and are compelled to dissent from the views there expressed. Our brethren who advocate those principles are evidently actuated by conscientious motives which we cannot too highly commend, and however much we may dissent from the premises from which they draw conclusions, or from the conclusions from which they draw their premises, we shall honor their motives; and should they as contemplated adopt those resolutions and thereby sever their connection with the National Liberal League we shall part from them with sincere regret; for although, where the intellect reasons illogically, conscience may lead in an unwise direction, yet we hope that every public enterprise in which we shall engage will be under the guidance of those who will conduct them according to the dictates of an enlightened conscience.

The resolutions submitted to the Tompkins County League propose to sever their connection with the National Liberal League because they think that a letter of President Elizur Wright, dated November 22d, puts us in a false moral position because he says, "I shall regard every man whose own standard of morality does not lead him into practical conflict with the constitutional laws of the land as much entitled to honor in the League as I am," and because President Wright reasoning thus refuses the proffered resignation of the Secretary, Albert L. Rawson. Now, if it is the duty of the Tompkins County League to thus withdraw from the National League it is equally the duty of the Rochester League and of every other League to withdraw and thus break up the organization. We hold, as our Tompkins county brethren probably do, that members who intelligeutly sustain a society or association formed for the purpose of committing crime or moral wrong of any kind are individually guilty of that wrong, whether the society is ostensibly formed for the purpose of promoting moral, commercial, or any other interests.

Also, where a society was originally formed to do a good or lawful work, and shall, by official action, commit itself to sustain wrong, it is equally the duty of conscientious members to withdraw after unavailingly using proper efforts to bring the society back to its original innocence. It is not duty to withdraw in such cases till proper effort is made to reclaim the society.

If President Wright is too liberal a Liberal in saying, as he does in the letter above mentioned, that it is no part of his object to impose his standard of morals upon others, and if by any possibility his expressing such Liberal views could commit the National Liberal League to views more liberal than they are willing to sustain, still it would not be our duty to withdraw till we hav made proper efforts to cause the League at its next national congress to purge itself of the iniquity of being too tolerant of the opinions of others.

In resolutions adopted December 8th, and published in THE TRUTH SEEKER December 20th, we expressed our hearty indorsement of these very sentiments expressed by our venerable President, and we do not, after reading the circular of the Tompkins County League and further consideration, see any reason for changing our views. But if our brethren in the Tompkins County League can show us that President Wright's views are too liberal, and, further, that the expression of them in the manner he has commits the National Liberal League to sustain wrong, we promise to join with them in efforts to influence the President and—failing in that—the next annual congress to rectify itself before the world.

In the preamble to the Constitution of our League, which is declared approved by the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League, it is declared that the latter was organized to accomplish the "total separation of church and state;" that auxiliary Leagues should be formed "for the purpose of instituting earnest and combined agitation in favor of equal rights respecting religion;" and the movement is characterized, not as a religious or a moral one, but as "important and patriotic." Not one word is uttered in either preamble or Constitution requiring that members should hold to any particular view of politics, religion, morals, domestic or social life. All are invited, whatever their views upon any of these questions, upon which good and intelligent people differ, who are willing to act with us in this patriotic movement.

So far as we know, all the members of this auxiliary League, and of all other auxiliary Leagues, are in accord upon the subject of preserving our civil liberties, though differing perhaps upon all other points of opinions and practice.

It seems to us that if we should now attempt to impose our ideas of politics, morals, religion, or economic or social policy, upon the League after inviting them to join us on a platform so broad as to ignore all such tests of membership, we would be guilty of heaping both insult and injury upon members whose principles are thus invaded. And as to the question of accountability for the moral delinquencies of members, we cannot see how such a thing can be in a society that has no provision for keeping out or for excommunicating persons whose views of certain moral questions do not accord with our own.

There is no more reason in assuming that we are responsible for the moral delinquencies of individual members of the League than in assuming that the soldiers of the Union army engaged in putting down the late Rebellion were responsible for the moral delinquencies of their fellow-soldiers. And the appointment, by majority vote, of a man to do clerical duty in the League whose ideas of moral duty are unfashionable or not in accord with our own, no more makes us accountable than does the appointment of a man to do like duty in an army or in an association for commercial or mechanical purposes.

In any enterprise we would be glad to hav every officer and every member persons of good morals; and we hav a right to demand that the business of any association to which we belong shall be honestly conducted. Further than this we hav no right to go.

The second preamble in the Tompkins county circular says, "We regard the Liberal cause as eminently a moral cause," etc.

This is true in the same sense that the Union cause in the time of the Rebellion was a moral cause. The success of both alike we believe more promotive, indirectly, of good morals than defeat would be. But in no other sense could either be properly called a moral cause, unless called so because both were alike patriotic, as the League is declared in its preamble to be. But in every aspect our duties and moral responsibilities in both the Union cause and the Liberal League are the same.

If the League shall, by official action, change itself into an engine of corruption or oppression, our first duty would be to try to reclaim and bring it back to justice and duty. Failing in this, after proving that the case was one of hopeless apostasy, it would be our duty to withdraw, or we could be held as accessories to crime.

On the other hand, if the League is trying to promote or defend the right by just and honest means, it is our duty, and everybody's duty, to sustain it as we hav ability and opportunity.

Your Committee therefore recommend the adoption of the following resolutions:

Resolved, That we adopt the sentiments, reasoning, and views of moral duty set forth in this report as our own expression, and direct the Secretary to forward a copy to THE TRUTH SEEKER for publication and to call the attention of the officers and members of the Tompkins County League to the same as so published by notifying the Secretary, as requested in the circular.

Resolved, That we hope the Tompkins County League do not contemplate adopting the resolutions contained in their circular, but hav put them before other Leagues in order to call out expressions and reasonings that all may see more clearly that it is no part of our duty to be so illiberal as to attempt to impose our standard of morals upon others in such an organization as the League, that has no jurisdiction; either by divine right or by concession, over the views of the members upon questions other than those contemplated in our organization.

The above report is respectfully submitted.

Subjects for a Sermon.

To the Rev. Mr. Charles, Dear Sir: You will remember that as we walked up the street together, last night, you invited me to write upon paper my reasons for not believing in the inspiration of the Bible and the doctrines of Christianity in general, saying that from my paper you would deliver a sermon, and endeavor to clear the mist from our eyes, so that I and my fellow-thinkers might see the word of God as you see it. I do not believe that such a God as you would hav me believe in would inspire men to write lies at once the most absurd, ungodly, and ridiculous. I believe that the Bible starts out with a monstrous lie, the lie about creation. I do not believe that God made man, whose composition, it has been clearly proved, is of numerous gases—of nitrogen, of oxygen, of hydrogen, of carbon—and various primitive elements, such as potash, phosphorus, iron, salt, etc., enter into that composition. How he did it, in your sermon you will please explain.

You will further explain the process by which he created our great-great-grandmother Eve—whom we hav no reason to suppose weighed less than the average woman of to-day—out of a rib which could not hav weighed over seven or eight ounces at most. In the undoubtedly able sermon you are going to preach you will please tell us where the light came from which God created at the beginning, before the third day, when he created the sun—the great source or all light—and the stars. You will also tell us what motion the sun had, whether it revolved on an axis or moved in an orbit, or both, before that mighty general of Bible fame commanded it to stand still and it stood.

Will you be so kind as to explain the means by which knowledge can be otained from the fruit of trees? If you will show how this lost art can be restored you will bestow a great blessing upon mankind in general and me especially, for I am sure that I would rather obtain knowledge by eating delicious fruit than by years of tedious study acquire it from dull and musty books. And that serpent story! Why, Mr. Charles, had Moses, the author of Genesis, told me that a mouse had met a mastodon, and in fair and open combat defeated, thwarted, and overcome him, I would as soon believe it as to believe that that almighty, great, grand, glorious God, the creator of this vast universe, he who sends countless multitudes of large, busy worlds darting, spinning, and whirling through space, could hav been outgeneraled, defeated, and frustrated in his greatest attempt, his attempt to make man—man created in his own image—pure and holy, by a nasty, miserable, creeping snake, which, standing upright, with human voice and human words, taught Eve the way to obtain knowledge. Will you explain this story, and make it so plain and reasonable that we can all believe it? And then will you not hav to agree with me that the snake we so ruthlessly and disgustingly trample upon deserves deep and profound respect from us as the descendant of the first educator of our race?

How, my dear sir, how in the name of reason and common sense do you expect me—claiming as I do to be an intelligent being—to believe in a personal devil, with horns, a long tail, and a cloven foot, that goes roaring over the earth seeking whom he may devour, thwarting, defeating, and triumphing over God, who, though his creator, hardly deserves to be styled his rival? You will say that this description of the devil is only figurative. But will you explain how it was that a figurative devil could hav taken Christ upon a mountain and there hav interviewed him personally?

In the sermon you are going to preach, it will of course be an easy, a very easy, matter for you to explain how Noah managed to get the innumerable number of animals, two of each species, ranging in size from the mastodon down to the smallest of the animalcules, together and into one ark; how, with but one little window for ventilation, he kept them all alive and breathing for one year; how he collected the different kinds of food, and the quantity required for this vast and variegated menagerie to liv upon during that time; how he kept those ferocious animals from fighting and devouring each other; how, when the ark rested on the summit of Mt. Ararat, seventeen thousand feet above the level of the sea, the animals that were peculiar to and could liv only in regions of tropical heat survived, while at only five thousand feet above sea level it is intensely cold, and at twelve thousand feet ice is perpetual; how after the deluge was over he got the different species and families of animals back to their respective native localities—the rhinoceros to Africa, the kangaroo to Australia, the bison to North America, the llama to South America, and the polar bears to the polar regions.

And after fully explaining this flood story you certainly will not hesitate to tell us what was produced by the shining of the sun through falling rain, spray, or mist before God placed the rainbow in the heavens as a promise to man that floods should be no more. In that sermon I would hav you explain why it was that God turned the wife of Lot into a pillar of salt because she simply looked behind her, and let her daughters escape to the mountains, there to hold sexual intercourse with their drunken father, without—so far from salting them down for their monstrous crime—showing the least displeasure. Would it not, do you think, hav been and looked much better for Lot to hav had that intercourse with his wife rather than with his daughters?

Mr. Charles, you tell me that God is all-wise, that he knows everything, and always did; that he can foresee all things, and always could. You tell me that he is almighty, omnipotent, all-powerful, supreme. You tell me that he is good, kind, loving, gentle, and merciful. But the authors of the Bible deny these statements. If God inspired those authors, he himself denies them. If he was all-wise, why did he demand of Abraham the sacrifice of his beloved son in order to try the old man's faith? If he was all-knowing he knew all about it without trying that cruel experiment.

Why did he create the devil? He knew, if he had such great foresight, that the devil would become more powerful than himself, winning more than ten souls where he would one. If he is kind and loving why did he create a hell-fire, and a devil to entice us into it? If he is so loving and merciful why does he not kill the devil, sweep hell out of existence, and make us all holy and happy, righteous and perfect? God deserves the curse the devil receives. The devil is not to blame for the misery he has caused and is causing. God is responsible for it all. He made the devil. He makes him perform those fiendish deeds. He could put a stop to them if he would, for he is almighty. And he would were he not as fiendish as you say he is powerful. If the book you hold most sacred is true, such, my dear minister, is the being you worship, whose gospel you preach.

I will bring my letter to a close. God himself says, through the Bible—for you say that he inspired that book—that he is not all-wise, and cannot foresee all things, that he is a monstrous tyrant. That this last statement is a fact the Bible is full of proof.

I hav now given you a few of my reasons for being skeptical, having no belief in the inspiration of the Bible, and believing it to be a volume of lies from beginning to end. I believe it to be a story as ficticious as the Arabian Nights. You will get around these most absurd parts of scripture by saying that they are only figurative, but that will never do. No, sir; either none of it is figurative or all of it is, and so I shall always believe.

I hope I hav furnished you with abundant material for one good sermon, and if you wish I will furnish you with the same for many more.

Church Expenses.

It is not the province or desire of the Democrat to call in question the motives of those who are devoting their lives to the spread of religion. The inference is that it is a conscientious work and conscientiously performed. Yet when millions of dollars are uselessly being spent in this work every year; when every city is crowded with expensive churches; when many of these are hopelessly in debt to their builders and struggling along with half-paid pastors; when most of them do not average an attendance of one-third of their sittings—we may well pause to inquire whether this work is being carried on in the most profitable or successful way. It is not simply a question for church people. It is one in which everybody is concerned. Granted that the gospel is an inestimable advantage to society at large and every person, however humble or unbelieving, is interested. The hundreds of millions invested in churches and church service is so many hundreds of millions withdrawn from the channels of trade. It is untaxed property, and the cost to the community is the additional taxes they pay because of the exemption and the interest on the money invested.

In the consideration of this subject by "Citizen" this item is lightly passed over, being alluded to as a "shade" more expense. Let us see what this "shade" is:

|---|---|
| The value of church property ten years ago (it is since greatly enhanced) is given as..... | $354,483,581 |
| Interest per annum at six per cent..... | 21,269,014 |
| Loss by withdrawal from production..... | 21,269,014 |
| Total on account of church property..... | 397,021,605 |

Here, in round numbers, is $400,000,000 representing church expense which by "Citizen" is denominated a "shade"—a trifle. Very well. Now let us consider other trifles.

According to the official record of the government there are 63,082 church edifices and 72,459 church organizations. The regular ministers are given as but 43,874. It is begging the question, therefore, to allude to those "minor Christian bodies," whose "houses of worship are plain structures or none at all." These are especially exempt from count. These are under the head of church organizations, and number distinctly from the edifices 9,377, and more than the regularly ordained ministers by 28,605. That is to say, there are nearly twice as many church organizations as there are regular preachers given in the census. Yet, according to "Citizen," we hav over-estimated the number of ministers.

We hav no better record than the census of 1870. If the figures of ministers and church property and incidental expenses hav not greatly increased since then and, therefore far above this report, religion is going backward instead of forward.

But let us take another item on which "Citizen" disagrees with the Democrat—the recompense of ministers. We will not use the word "salary," since that excludes the dwelling in which the minister frequently livs, his furniture, sometimes his library, donations, etc., etc. It was first placed at an average of $1,500 a year. This "Citizen" thinks too large and proves it by La Crosse salaries. We might say it was too small and prove the assertion by New York salaries, where they range from $3,000 to 100,000 a year, besides almost royal perquisites. But we are not taking any single place to illustrate this item. The average was furnished the writer years ago by a prominent Presbyterian minister as an inducement to enter the service of the church. However, call it half that, or $750; which is ridiculously small, even if we include the army of itinerants not included in the census. Then we hav 43,874 ministers at an expense of $32,905,500. It is admitted by "Citizen" that other church expenses will run about the same—fuel, care of church, repairs, light, etc., though we believe the average will greatly exceed this figure. Then we hav the following table:

|---|---|
| Interest on church property six per cent..... | $21,269,014 |
| Loss of same in business, six per cent..... | 21,269,014 |
| To 43,874 ministers, at $750 each..... | 32,905,500 |
| For incidental care of churches, light, etc..... | 32,905,500 |
| Total..... | 108,349,028 |

This is given at the estimate of "Citizen," merely to see where it will lead us, not that the salaries and incidentals are not believed to be twice the amount. By our correspondent's calculation this is apportioned among "25,000,000 church-goers." Which would leave it a little over $4 a head per annum.

But right here comes the chief absurdity in his statement. There were only 21,000,000 sittings in the total church accommodations of the United States at the date on which the figures are taken. That takes more than half the then population of the country outside of the cradles, prisons, and asylums. Now one-half the people, men, women, and children don't attend church every week—nor one-quarter of them—as "Citizen" must know by observation. Nor do one-half those who belong to and are members in good standing in the church. When we speak of attendance we mean "average," the same as we hav averaged salaries, expenses, etc. Take this city for instance. According to "Citizen's" own showing but about 5,000 of this city of 15,000 inhabitants are church attendants. And yet, if La Crosse is to be considered a specimen, those who attend church will not average nearly a quarter of the population of the country. In cities like Chicago and New York there are not church sittings enough for one-fifth of the population, and the churches they hav are generally not more than half to two-thirds full. Take the vast stretches of agricultural regions, where there are no churches, or they are too remote, and the proportion is still less. The average church attendance cannot by any reasonable probability exceed 5,000,000, and this is an over-estimate. To prove this it is only necessary to say that the total increase of church sittings for ten years averaged but 253,631 a year. The disproportion between the increased number of converts and the alleged attendance reflects more seriously upon religion and the work of the clergy than we are willing to do. But these 253,631 are not converts—it simply represents the added capacity of the combined churches. To sum up, therefore, we hav 43,874 regularly ordained ministers in active service; double worked; half paid; a church expense of $108,349,028, and for what result?

To bring within the church walls, or to provide room (there is nothing to show that the added sittings are actually filled) for 253,631 souls.

Over $400 apiece for each one of these sittings.

That is to say, at the figures and estimates of "Citizen," it costs an average, instead of five and six cents a week, as he represents, at least $400 for every man to hear the gospel.

To be sure, there is a "shade" of cost of church property, but count out half of the estimate, take off the "shade" of $42,000,000 a year, and it still costs some $300 for each one.

There it is in the mildest way you can put it. There need be no difference between any one over church attendance. The increased attendance any one year could not exceed the added number of sittings. Once given the whole cost of the church service, and to divide it upon the additional number of sittings, is a fair statement of the expense of getting these persons under the droppings of the sanctuary.

The above is at the figures of "Citizen."

But the true estimate will probably more than double his. There is no allowance for the expensive colleges of the various churches, their costly faculties and fittings, millions of dollars for the maintenance of which are expended annually. No account is taken of the millions of dollars expended on theological educations. No estimate is made of the worth of the men who are drawn from the various fields of production for the ministry. Since every minister in the service of the church is so much brain and muscle withdrawn from other avenues of labor, he not only costs so much, but is a direct loss in the same amount. The same with regard to any money invested in a non-producing field.

When all these are added to the other expenses, it will be found that every soul brought within the reach of the gospel costs between $2,000 and $3,000; and for every soul converted to Christianity under our present system the people of the country pay a bonus of from $4,000 to $6,000.

Prayer and Aspiration.—The heart may aspire though the knee does not bend. Prayer and aspiration are entirely different things. Aspiration is to the new faith what prayer was to the old. Prayer belongs to superstition. It is asking for favors, begging for gifts, imploring for forgiveness or special consideration. It assumes the presence of an individual that answers. Aspiration assumes that knowledge, wisdom, truth, the perfect beauty, are real and attainable, but are yet unattained and must be sought for. This is what aspiration does for the new men and women; essentially what prayer did for the old ones. The radicals do not pray, but they turn their eager minds upward towards the light, as the flowers turn their leaves toward the sun. They do not bend the knee; they rather stiffen it, that they may walk the better; but they bow their heads before the truth.—O. B. Frothingham.

The Tompkins Liberal League.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I received a circular from the Tompkins Liberal League of New York, with series of whereases and resolutions in reference to the action of the president of the Nationel Liberal League in the case of the secretary, A. L. Rawson, who offered his resignation because of some qualms of conscience which he feared some of the more sanctified of the members might hav with regard to his course of conduct, made apparent by him in his explanation in answer to the charge brought against him by Mr. Abbot for immoral conduct practiced some twenty-three and twenty-eight years ago.

Now, what can a true Liberal think of the professed liberality of some of the members of the League? Here is Mr. Abbot, with a liberal supply of spite and malice, loses sight of the main object of the League, and stoops to the low and degrading position of hunting old records of twenty-eight years' standing to find a flaw in the character of his brother Liberal whom he does not love, thereby interrupting the true and harmonious course of the great work we hav in hand.

The brother charged gave a fair explanation of the whole matter, and in so doing honestly and conscientiously justified his conduct on the premises. He, however, offered his resignation as secretary of the League. The president would not accept of his resignation, and said he would much rather now (after the explanation) resign himself than hav Mr. Rawson resign. This, I thought, settled the matter, and supposed that all Liberals would be satisfied. Not so. It appears there are some more Abbots yet in the League—Christian Liberals they might be called, who, with a keen ear for slander against a brother, caught the sound of Free-love in Mr. Rawson's explanation; and now for another split—another secession of the righteous from the wicked.

Our brother, on sustaining his course of conduct some twenty-three years ago, hinted his opinion of the Christian marriage law at that time, and, in consequence of that expression of his views held twenty-three years ago, the Christian Liberal brethren of the Tompkins League take the alarm, and, for fear of contamination, cannot conscientiously continue connected with the National Liberal League without the resignation of Secretary Rawson is accepted. "Stand off! I am holier than thou!"

In the name of common sense, what kind of liberality is it that will not allow another to think as he likes? Is not our League established upon that basis—liberty for each to think for himself? The Liberal League is not a court of inquiry into our brother's actions in the past, nor his thoughts and opinions in the present, nor is it to be a court to pass judgment on our brother so long as he complies with the laws of the institution. Our work should be to meet our brother and help him out of his error, if we think he is in that condition; not shun him when we can do him good. Christians, to be consistent, should follow their leader. He associated with publicans and sinners, and bid his believers follow him. He associated with the wicked to reform them. He did not cast stones at the woman taken in adultery; he remained with her after her accusers had left her, and consoled with her in her trouble, and forgave, and told her to go and sin no more.

Our Christian Liberals should go and act likewise. Do, in the name of justice and liberality, let every man think as he pleases.

If he has in any way broken or violated the laws of the League it is time enough to call him to account. His opinions or his morals are no business of the League. If the League stops to question the opinions of its members on any matters outside of its main business, it will be shorn of its noblest supporters.

Our main fight will be in the political field. Do our Christian politicians refuse a vote that is given by an unbeliever? Catch them at it if you can. In the struggle for equal rights we must take every legal advantage that is honorable. We will find our opponents will not stop even at a dishonorable mode to accomplish their purpose, and if the League is not prepared for the struggle and meet the enemy if necessary with their own mode of tactics, we might as well giv up the work at once. We propose to work for the rights of equal liberties. Why then stop to question the right of our members to the exercise of that liberty? Look at our Christian opponents from another standpoint, and take a lesson from them. They are ever at war with each other upon the subject of creeds and ordinances, but just take notice how they unite against a common enemy. They do not stop to dispute about creeds when a common foe demands their united force. All are welcome to their ranks without question. I think I see them laughing at our folly in splitting our forces while we are quarreling over a chip in the porridge. Cannot we, like our opponents, concentrate our forces and efforts to gain our equal rights? Cannot we agree to disagree? Why not let our minor differences lie quiet till we effect the grand purpose of equal rights and liberty upon which we are all agreed?

Let us work in unity to secure the common rights of all. That work accomplished, those who wish can hav their own individual fights. We hav not a man to spare from our ranks, good or bad. If we expect to enlarge our army sufficiently to secure a victory, we must stop questioning individual opinions.

Traitors to our cause, to the advantage of our enemies, hav let go a torpedo, and instead of intercepting it in its progress in time, we suffer it to blow up our forts and shipping.

Abbot and Bundy, in the service of the enemy, hav started the respectability dodge; and the cry of obscenity, Freelove, murder, thief, is alarming the guilty consciences of saintly members of the League who cannot stand the test.

The Tompkins Liberal League hav joined the cry in a body, and the best men in the League are to be questioned in their equal rights to think as they please. "Hold on there! That fellow is obscene! I saw him passing by a house of ill-fame the other morning. There is another fellow. He cannot be respectable; he is a Freelover. I heard him say the marriage law might be improved. We cannot associate with these men. We must leave the League if these men do not resign. It will never do for us to meet in the same hall, or march in the same ranks." I wonder how it will be up in that heaven where the obscene, the Freelover, the thief, and the murderer are all assembled, through faith in the blood of Jesus. The Tompkins League will surely hav to leave if these do not resign their seats and golden harps, and will build a heaven outside.

The secret of the Tompkins League's respectability is evidently let out—yes, 'tis very plain to all truthseekers. None but the blind cannot see what their motto is. The secret is, the Tompkins League meet in the parlors of a Christian church. How can saints associate with sinners? How can the church be desecrated by the meeting of a Liberal League within its chambers? How can the Liberal League accomplish its work when the plan of operation is all exposed in the enemies camp? 'Tis a farce!

The church is our avowed enemy, and only offer such encouragement as will enable them the better to sow dissentions in our ranks. That is their mode of warfare; they cannot succeed in their opposition to the progress of enlightenment except by treachery, schemery, and deceit. No assistance to the cause can be hoped for from any auxiliary League who hold their meetings in a church where opposition to the cause is preached every week. Out upon such folly! Will reformers never be able to eradicate from their minds and consciences the deep-dyed, doctrinal errors of the Christian church? Can they never discover the deep-laid plots, the deception and schemery, practiced in all ages to preserve the church in its supreme consequence and grandeur, and prevent the exposure of its wickedness and deceit? Its Jesuits are the advance guards insinuating themselves into all societies for the purpose of revealing all the movements, and are prepared to meet all emergencies.

Our enemies are experienced in all kinds of warfare, and are watching closely our movements and seeking to destroy our united effort by spreading discord in our ranks about minor matters, and leading off our workers from the grand basis of operation—the establishment of Freethought, free speech, and free press. This work they know is bound to uproot the rotten system of the church, as well as state, and reduce them to an equal footing with all other citizens by the establishment of "Equal justice to all and favors to none."

I hope the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League will throw cold water on all efforts at a change of base. Allow this Tompkins League to pass quietly out upon its own merits; the National Liberal League is better off without such auxiliary Leagues; they will betray us into the enemy's hands, for they are in league with them.

Will the Tompkins Liberal League please accept this as an answer to their circular as to the mind of the Ogden Liberal League. Respectfully, John A. Jost, Sec.

Ogden, Utah, Dec. 27, 1879.

Not a Believer in Prayer.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In The Truth Seeker of Nov. 1st is an article over the initials W. E. L., which is intended as a criticism on Mr. Underwood's views of prayer, etc.

Now, I am not a believer in prayer, for the reason that I know of no one outside of man or woman who possesses the qualifications requisite to hear or answer prayer; and believe, with Thomas Paine, that if there was a being possessed of the qualities ascribed to him, or her, those qualities would prompt to the bestowal of every needed good; and hence prayer is impious discontent toward the direction of the thing prayed to.

W. E. L., after referring to evolution, asks, "Does not this prove that somewhere in nature, outside of man, there exists an intelligent force sufficient to produce all the wonderful intelligence we see in man?" I answer, It proves nothing of the kind. All intelligence will come to be understood to be a result, and not belonging to the family of causes at all.

Consciousness, including mind and all its manifestations, results partly from the normal action of physical organs, and partly from impressions made by external objects, which may, or may not, be forces, and in no wise can they be considered intelligent or controlled by intelligence except when associated with beings having nerve structures.

These wonderful faculties, and all manifestations of intelligence, will cease when the organs of the brain become deranged or the normal functions being suspended, as we hav daily experience in accidents, diseases, and death.

The elements of matter through the universe inhere in themselves resident energies capable, under favoring circumstances, of producing all the varied phenomena which it has so long been thought required a belief in a God to explain.

The innumerable developed forms of animal, vegetable, and mineral existences, with all their beauty and perfection, are but the expression of the force or energy engaged in their production, and the character and the physical capabilities of each particular thing will depend upon natural, physical conditions at the time of starting into being and the quantum of elemental entities combining and entering into the organized effort.

The realization of the entire capabilities of any given organism will of course depend upon the completeness of the environments of the several periods of the developmental stages through which such organism passes. If any important requisite of natural growth from first to last is wanting, a corresponding defect in the thing so involved must naturally ensue.

And hence there will be use for such noble, self-sacrificing men as Underwood and others who are laboring to compensate by extra educational efforts, to bring up the race of men to as near approximation to that state to which all would hav attained if more favorable conditions had environed them from the first.

It is well demonstrated that there was a time in the evolution of our planet when breathing things did not and could not exist. But as a reduction of temperature went on, and disintegration had brought the surface to a condition so that the elemental energies could find expression, vegetable life sprung into existence, and, after further changes, animal life also, each in its turn, in obedience to typal quantities of entities coming together by the affinities of co-ordinate energies striving for the highest attainment and perfection the conditions at the time permitted. If all the natural requirements of human existence had been literally complied with, perfection as far as possibilities of conditions would hav been attained.

Man is as much a natural, spontaneous production as a blade of grass. The "wonderful intelligence we see in man" is no more wonderful, nor as much so, as the delicate coloring of the rose, or the skill exhibited by the honey-bee, the delicate felt of the hornet's nest, the house of the otter, the spider's marvelous net-work, the jet covering of the twigs of the sparrow's nest, and a thousand other exhibitions of capacity in what is called the lower animals, all having the ability to secure to themselves in the greatest perfection every requisite essential to their well-being and happiness.

The vegetable world exhibits no less capacity to secure all the necessary requisites of existence, growth, development, and perfection. The minutest shrub, plant, or flower exhibits more discriminating judgment in the selection and appropriation of its food and capacity to supply its several wants than man with all his "wonderful intelligence."

The dog will scent his master by the wagon tracks on roads constantly traveled by other teams hours after the wagon had passed and when miles away, exhibiting intelligence far transcending the master's ability to trace the dog under the same conditions.

Most of the clinging vines exhibit most wonderful capacity to secure to themselves all the advantages their existence requires. If a grape-vine, for instance, be trained over a large glass with a hole in it, the clinger will sweep its length over the glass next to itself; finding no place to fasten to, it will pass through the hole and sweep over the other side; still finding no place to fasten itself, it will tie a knot at its end, pass back through the hole, bringing the knot firmly against the glass, and take up the slack by twisting itself into a double spiral spring, thus offering all its strength to the support of the parent vine.

I could go on illustrating the parallel existing between the various classes of organic existences, showing, I think, conclusively that this "wonderful intelligence" is dependent upon nerve tissues; and all manifestations of intelligence through all the gradations of animal and vegetable life result from the difference of complexity of brain structure.

Now, I think we hav stronger evidence that consciousness, intelligence, and all the distinguishing characteristics of the human mind, are results of the action of non-intelligent forces acting upon our physical organism; while the believers in the "somewhere in nature intelligence" profess to believe that consciousness, intelligence, and mind existed prior to organic existence; and this "wonderful intelligence" will continue to exist after the dissolution of the organism the same as though nothing in particular had transpired.

All religions hav pretended that "somewhere outside of man" an intelligence exists. Then it must hav existed when this planet was a fiery ball, rolling for ages in space; it must hav existed before our planet became detached from its associate matter; it must hav existed co-eternally with matter or the elements themselves. But to maintain that it exists independent of matter is a dogma upon which all beliefs in an intelligent first cause has always been predicated. And the idea of W. E. L.—that "somewhere in nature, outside of man, there exists an intelligent force sufficient to produce all the wonderful intelligence we see in man"—differs so little from the commonly expressed God notions that it seems like folly for any one to split hairs about it, but just call this outside something God, as all geologists do; it saves the trouble of thinking further in that direction.

It follows, as a legitimate sequence of W. E. L.'s idea of an outside intelligence, that at death the "wonderful intelligence we see in man" will return to the "somewhere in nature intelligence," As this somewhere-in-nature intelligence existed before man did, it must continue to exist after man dies; and this kind of logic is the pivotal point upon which beliefs are based in continued conscious existence.

The fact that a child at birth exhibits less evidence of consciousness or intelligence than many of the so-called lower animals, and that aged people who hav lived and worn out their mind, thoughts, and even consciousness itself, long before life is yielded up, is no evidence to the believers in the "somewhere in nature intelligence outside of man,"

I can truly say I hav no "distinctive" or instinctive desire to pray or to prey. There is not a Christian living that has a distinct conception in his own mind what he prays to; he has no more idea of what God is than a well-organized chimpanzee, from whom it is more than probable he sprung. B. W. Franklin.

Letters from Friends.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Here is my three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880. I am a little behind time, but hope you didn't think me one of the timid ones, who, to keep in repute with Grundy, must appear to go back on the grand old hero who founded it. I am sorry for the professed Liberals whose glass houses are so thin that they must be following up and pelting whoever they deem vulnerable for the sake of keeping the confidence of the regular pharisaic vigilants and preventing them from coming near enough to notice their domiciles. I did not suppose that either Abbot or Bundy (no, not even the latter, with all his pupilage) was so vulnerable as to need to be hunting-hound for these; that after professedly rejecting the old superstition he would outdo Comstock in zealous defense of its gossipy morals—descending to a degree of cowardly meanness which even that sneaking pimp of the old churchly "lady of Babylon" could only consummate through such a cat's-paw.

Let me say a few words to our martyr, friend Bennett. I read the so-called "exposure of your wickedness," and I said there must be a little fire with all that smoke, but that I would wait till I heard from you before making up my mind how much. I said, Well, if it is all so, it shows that you are not yet Infidel enough to be entirely free from the weakness of some of our old exemplars—the ancient patriarchs. I don't know as I could hav wondered very much if the influence of the reverend examples of "men of God" from one hundred generations back down to the present time should not hav been so far outgrown by you as to hav made it impossible for you to behave half as bad as some of them. A decade or two of "Infidelity" could hardly be expected to cure entirely the weakness left by these ages of hereditary disorders, stimulated into fresh activity, as they are, by the true inwardness of the most influential saints of our day.

I don't want to be hard on the saints of our day. I know that good old uncles, David and Solomon, who wrote part of the "Holy Word" for them to get to heaven by, were a little ailing in that way. The first wrote the "inspired psalms" for the saints to sing, and the latter rather eclipsed the luster of his illustrious daddy, though at one time he became fretty at the mighty task he had undertaken, and declared it "all vanity and vexation of spirit;" yet he rallied, after all, and wrote his very "chaste, divinely-inspired, Word of God, Solomon's Songs."

Our modern saints are tolerably successful in following their divine patriarch-ideals, though they can't quite come up to the originals. They come about as near to it as they could be expected to without miraculous inspiration to help them.

When I first read the famous Grundy-Bundy exposè I was inclined to credit you with more of the remains of patriarchal piety than you are entitled to. But I must still giv you credit for one of its virtues—you beat our modern saints all to pieces in "confessing." They hold that the greatest of religious duties, but they don't confess worth a cent, while you, not holding it a duty to confess to those not wronged, nevertheless own up all your weakness to the public rather than lay your lying enemies in the lie further than they are guilty of it. I don't know, though, whether to charge that entirely to your backsliding from "Christian morality," or whether to attribute it in part to the differing circumstances which surround you on the "Infidel" plane. If you had been a churchman, and as strong a worker for church-religion as you are for "Infidelity," all the "piety," "morals," "respectability," wealth, and government influence would hav joined to save your reputation for the sake of their cause ("for Christ's sake"), and thus you and they could easily hav blasted the reputation of any "presumptuous person" that dared to try to "impair your usefulness" for the "holy work of the Lord;" but disciples of nature's religion, "the Infidels," can't be depended on for this. The most bigoted of them, though abundantly supplied with the grace of bigotry, won't lie anybody into the wrong to screen their most favored champion. Somehow they hav got such an egotistical conceit of the strength of their cause that they think it will stand without lying to uphold it.

Then, again, you fail to fill the bill of saintly example when acting wickedly; you don't try to take your neighbor's wife from him, and you don't seek out and try to deceive young maids; in fact, don't seek out any, but wait till they come to you, and then take to those of middle age and thorough experience, and such as like your epistles well enough to answer and encourage them and receive several of them, and who can still play the offended virtue so as to make you two-thirds believe it real in spite of such winning ways as call out more letters from you the while. This don't come near up to the saintly standard of virtue and loving shrewdness. The fact is, you can't do it. Don't try again.

Not to be too delicate in expression, nor to spoil an admonition for "Infidel" relationship, I must say that you are hopelessly green in such graces, in fact, a botch at loving viciousness. You are a botch at each part of the work. If you meant to speak of any obscene intent in those letters, you failed so utterly that you left them fit to be published in the Index journal of "cultured Liberal purity," and in its echo, the Religio-Hypocritical. The only things in your letters too obscene for those journals to publish, it seems, were your quotation marks, which ironically imputed to the "lady's" accusations against yourself. These "pure" journals, of course, thought it more "chaste" to giv these passages without the quotation marks, so as to make it a confession on your part. Pshaw! you can't hold your own with such "pure" fellows and their "respectable" tactics.

Then, again, if, in your moments of greatest inspiration, you had any intent to be a rakish saint, you might hav known that you couldn't be one of the "competent;" your early training was not under a proper "consensus." Any half-developed "man of the world," to say nothing of a modern purity saint, could hav told you that you, an unsophisticated ex-Shaker, who left Shakerdom to marry, and worked hard ever since till sixty, instead of leading into love relations with you any young artless maid, would be caught by some sharp, experienced, designing woman, who would dupe and rob or sell you. Well, you wouldn't hav believed them, perhaps, if they had told you so, but you hav learned, and I'll bet on one lesson being sufficient for you.

Don't talk of withdrawing from editing THE TRUTH SEEKER; you hav just gained the experience needed to make it more largely useful. Your blunder will only drive off the coward Liberals. Let them go. Lord bless them, or, if he can't, we'll try. Yours for truth and right,

CALEB S. WEEKS.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The soldier who betrays his command is shot. Treason is done by giving information or armed assistance—briefly, by giving aid and comfort to the enemy. In war times the civilian may easily entangle his neck in a traitor's noose; and since this fleshy tabernacle in which the spirit of man is clothed hath stood upright, traitors and spies hav been deemed the lowest of the human race. Even he who betrays the bad in favor of the good meets with the cold shoulder among the advocates of the good with whom he would associate. And there is moral treason as well as moral cowardice. The cause advocated by pens and tongues may be betrayed as well as that maintained by bayonets and guns. What shall be said of those who were fighting in some cause together with their neighbors, and finding one of these neighbors, whom they hated, a prisoner in the enemy's hands, would giv information tending not only to injure the neighbor, but to render the cause odious among the unthinking masses or unprejudiced strangers?

It seems to me that the blow aimed at Bennett is a serious stroke against our cause. Here was an opportunity given to us by the enemy; here was the very rope taken by them which must hang them. Every Liberal in the world felt it. But at one fell blow from the hands of one of ourselves every advantage was taken from us and the camps of the enemy filled with loud shouts of triumph. No, Bundy, no Abbot, you hav betrayed our cause terribly. It must be that you are not with us. Never again can we trust you. As open enemies you are harmless, but, as apostles, your position gave you Iscariot's opportunity, and you took it.

CLARK IRVINE.

MISTAKES.

AUBURN, INDIANA, Jan. 1, 1880.

This is a world of mistakes; and men and women are rarely to be found on this planet who hav resided on it for sixty years and hav not some time in the course of their pilgrimage committed some errors, done many things which they ought not to have done, and left perhaps as many things undone which they should hav done. Even our best Christians are often heard to mourn over their shortcomings; and even those who are every day petitioning their Maker to lead them not into temptation are often convicted of making very serious mistakes. Holy angels in the highest heavens, according to the Christian Bible and John Milton, made a terrible mistake when they rebelled against their Creator, and undertook to oust him from the great white throne and run the universe to suit themselves. Even Deity himself, according to the same infallible authority, has made many mistakes since he undertook to raise a family of human animals upon this planet; but, to his everlasting credit, he made an honest confession of his sins, repented, and owned up like an honest God; and if all the Christian clergy would follow his example, and make an open, fair confession before the world, in my opinion there would be but a precious few left to throw stones. Strange indeed that rational men and women who hav had years of experience in this world of imperfections should manifest such wonder and amazement as they often do at the mistakes of their fellow-mortals. Christians who believe that the highest angels of light fell from grace, and who worship a God who has often made mistakes and repented of the same, will make but small capital by laboring to degrade a man who has lived sixty years in this wicked world, and only been convicted of one mistake. Certainly Christians should be among his last accusers, if they hav any regard for consistency. We are all so imperfect that it stands us in hand to be continually on the watch of ourselves, and to be very slow and cautious in our condemnation of others; for mistakes seem to be contagious and seem sometimes to spread like other diseases which flesh is heir to, one mistake often begetting others. Bundy and Abbot hav become terribly demoralized by handling this mistake of Bennett's; it was the greatest mistake of their lives, though by no means the first. When the assassins of liberty first hauled him to a Christian prison, these pretended advocates of Freethought stood by consenting to his doom; and it was apparent to the most superficial observer that they were much elated with the misfortunes of their rival; and when they saw the subscriptions accumulating every week to sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER, they meanly insinuated that Bennett had got the very position he had been seeking for, in order to have an excuse to beg money from his sympathizers. And when they got hold of these letters their emotions entirely overcame them—they were filled at once with the most ecstatic delight—so much so, that they "tint their reason a'thegither." In fact they were completely intoxicated; what little common sense they possessed vacated the brain, passed out, and their true inwardness was so completely exposed and so plain that common observers could easily discern the motives which controlled their actions. Then again, as if to cap the climax of their mistakes, they, without a shadow of proof or reason, labored to make the world believe that Bennett had always been a licentious man and a hypocrite, and that the TRUTH SEEKER office had ever been the headquarters of Libertines and prostitutes, a general rendezvous of unprincipled villains, who preyed upon and bled each other when short of fresh victims. And yet these men profess to be Liberals, and like Bennett publishing journals ostensibly devoted mainly to the same objects. These men, Abbot at least, had heretofore refused to soil the pages of his cultured sheet by recording the exposures of orthodox clergymen when convicted of criminal intercourse with the lambs under their charge. Such business was entirely too low for his dignity. But when these precious letters met his longing eyes there seemed all at once a thousand tongues in that belly of his, and every tongue was charged with slanders of Bennett. Thus these mistakes of Bennett, bad as they hav been, hav done some good. They hav pretty effectually settled the fact that Bundy and Abbot, the partners in distress, are so much absorbed and blinded in the contemplation of their own superior culture and purity that they never will be able "to see themselves as others see them." They make too many mistakes, and by their mistakes they are seriously injuring the cause which they claim to love. Quite a number of prominent Spiritulists, and even Underwood, hav seemingly through their influence sold themselves to the enemies of liberty, and are fast fitting themselves to become life members of the Young Men's Christian Association; and it is barely possible that some of them may hav the high honor of holding Comstock's victims while he puts on the iron boots and thumbscrews.

But, say some, do you mean to justify Bennett, and do you mean to say that he has done no wrong? By no means; no true Liberal will make any such claim. Liberals as a body are as much opposed to infidelity to the marriage relation as any other class of people. Our complaint is against those who hav manifested such a degree of gratification at his misfortunes and such a terrible anxiety to magnify his errors and to prove to the world that he is and ever has been immoral every way, and that he has ever lived the life of a hypocrite.

We believe he has been no such man. He has lived sixty years in the world, and has ever, all his life, been the fearless advocate of unpopular doctrine. He has been very aggressive, open, bold, and able to strike such blows as to make his presence a terror to his adversaries. Had there been any flaws visible in his moral character during all these years, his enemies (and he had thousands), some of them, would certainly hav found them. He says that he has never before transgressed the proprieties of the married life; and we believe he tells the truth, and we shall do what little we can to sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER. Whether Bennett shall continue to act as editor or not is for him to decide. A man who acknowledges his errors, and respectfully solicits his friends to forgive him, especially one who has so conducted himself before the world for sixty years as to be entirely above suspicion, should not be abandoned and thrown aside for one mistake.

BETHENA F. H. WILSON.

TIPTON, MICH., Nov. 27, 1879.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Madam: I hav just finished reading Mr. Bennett's confession. I am glad to see him come out so square, frank, and bold, and acknowledge that he wrote those letters. In doing so he has shown himself to be the first public man in the world that has ever had honesty enough to admit that he had ever done a wrong. Not even as pure a saint as Beecher would admit that he ever did wrong, but said he had only been nest-hiding. I tell you I am glad to see the frankness and manliness in which Mr. Bennett came out. It proves to me that he has got more manliness left in him than all his Christian persecutors. He has not only shown himself to be a hero of Freethought, but a hero of frankness and honesty. He has not been the first to make a mistake, but he has been the first with manhood enough to acknowledge it. Were all these men that are trying to pull Bennett down brought up before the great tribunal and told to answer the questions put to them, they would hang their heads in shame. Liberals, I don't think that we can afford to drop Mr. Bennett. He has done too much for the Liberal cause. His crime is not half as bad as that of Abbot and Bundy. Look at what they hav done. They hav done that which no decent man would think of doing. I will close by sending you a little motto that was in old Hacker's paper, of Maine, that I like very much.

"Bound to no party, to no sect confined.
The world our home, our brethren all mankind.
Love truth, do good, be just and fair with all,
Exalt the right, though every ism fall."

OTIS WHELAN.

OXFORD, O., Dec. 19, 1879.

DEAR FRIENDS OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: Yours of the 20th is received. I hasten to remit you $3 due you up to January 1, 1880. As I wish to pay as I can I send postal order for $5; that is, $2 for 1880; and if I were able I would surely giv THE TRUTH SEEKER a powerful business shove, but, alas! I am not. Tell Mr. Bennett to keep in good cheer, no stepping down and out in this case, bad as it is; indeed, I rather like that it happened just when it did, for Bennett's friends can now see plainly what they were before at a loss to understand—I mean the trouble between Abbot and Bennett. This very foolish letter writing, I am thinking, will stop short, never to be done again while the old man livs. He says so, and I believe him. I like him for saying so too. Go on as you hav been, saying just what you think, but as smooth as you can with truth, and you will be sustained in such a course. Abide your time as best you can, and I think you will be chosen to steer your (our) ship through, clear of the breakers; and should seas of inhumanity seem to overwhelm us, with D. M. Bennett at the helm, we will hav nothing to fear.

I believe it was Burn's that wrote:

"Is there for honest poverty,
Wha' hangs his head and a' that?
The coward slave we pass him by,
And dare be poor, for a' that.
For a' that, for a' that,
Our toil's obscure and a' that;
The rank is but the guinea stamp,
The man's the gawd, for a' that.

Then let us pray that come it may,
And come it shall for a' that;
That sense and worth o'er a' the earth,
Shall bear the gra', and a' that;
For a' that and a' that,
It's coming yet, for a' that.
When man to man, the wide world o'er,
Shall brother be, and a' that."

There, now, Mr. Editor, if you feel like dressing this up, or adding to it anything for the benefit of the cause, do so, and put my name to it.

JOHN M. STERN.

ATLANTA, TEXAS, Dec. 12, 1879.

Inclosed find post-office order for $4.50, for continuance of THE TRUTH SEEKER and a copy of Ingersoll's "Mistakes of Moses" I receive a copy of the Index. It reminds me of what Milton puts in the mouth of Satan, "If I can't get victory I will hav revenge." Infidelity is spreading everywhere, but policy or dishonesty keeps thousands from owning it. There is very little interest manifested for religion here, only the name remaining; still they try to starve an Infidel to death only because they cannot burn them as they once did. Put my name down for Mr. Bennett's forthcoming book, "Ancient Gods and Ancient Religions." I will remit as soon as I get the book or hear it is published. I shall want several other books after a while.

Yours for liberty and truth, J. B. EVERETT.

BERNE, IND., Dec. 28, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: In compliance with your request I let you know that your boyish notion does not lower you in my estimation. Dear sir, I am an older man than you. Without this friendship towards the gentler sex life would not be worth living, as friendship, to every willing mind, opens a heavenly treasure. There may the sons and daughters of sorrow find sources of real pleasure. Happy the man or woman who has a friend formed by the God of nature. Well may they feel and recommend friendship for their creator—nature.

Bundy and Abbot are only twitting you of the fate of the virtuous Joseph, who refused to comply with the request of his mistress and was cast into the king's prison. I hope there is not a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who will be led astray by the malicious slanders and falsehoods of D. M. Bennett's enemies. We all know they would sink him to the depth of profundity if they had the power. Let us not forsake the man who is standing up for our liberties, as Mr. Bennett is doing. It is not often we get a man that will sacrifice his interest for ours, as he has done. He has my most cordial wishes for all that is manly, good, and fair, Yours, J. W. BEBOUT.

KALAMAZOO, MICH., Dec. 26, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Having read the grave charges brought against our suffering brother, D. M. Bennett, also his manly letter of confession and definite explanations thereof, I, claiming to be a Liberal Spiritualist, consider it my duty as one of "said jurors" and a constant reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER to bid the editor-in-chief good-speed in the grand cause of liberty, in which he is so earnestly engaged, and I hav no desire to see him step down and out until some one can be found who is more worthy and who can prove to us, without the shadow of a doubt, after sixty years' battling with the adverse winds of life, that his record is pure and spotless, and he can truthfully declare to the world, Lo! I am without sin, having never even stumbled.

To such a one I hav no doubt but our good brother Bennett would cheerfully submit his life work and retire. But until such a person comes forward, I say, Go on, D. M. Bennett; we want THE TRUTH SEEKER, and you for its editor. No one can regret more than I that such disastrous circumstances should exist or be brought forth at this time. However, I hav no word of condemnation for either of the parties most interested. "To err is human," and I can but regard the whole drama as another publicly recorded proof that there is something wrong underlying the great social structure, of which we are all a part.

May the gods hasten the day when no woman will be obliged to sell her soul or body to obtain a livelihood! See to it, ye friends of Liberalism everywhere, that the noble cause of liberty, the emancipation from religious bigotry and superstition, be not retarded by the little social earthquake that has lately favored the Liberal planet, but rise out of the confusion into which we hav been thrown, and gird on your armor, determined to fight valiantly to the end, even though it should come to light that ten thousand of our brave soldiers had been guilty of love making or writing silly love letters.

There was never greater need than now of honest, earnest warriors and a united, concentrated plan of action. Shame on those who allow the firing of an enemy's gun to cause their retreat, leaving the fort in the hands of the enemies. Again I say, rally, each and every one, and join in the grand march to freedom for men, women, and children, ever remembering that "eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." Yours, for the greatest good to the greatest number,

IDA A. MCLIN.

HILL'S FORK, OHIO, Nov. 30, 1879.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Madam: I write you a few lines to inform you that I will not desert you in this dark hour of trouble. I hav always entertained the highest opinion of dear Brother Bennett, from the first acquaintance I had with him, and if he has erred to some extent I think the great amount of good he has accomplished far more than compensates for his little, trifling, frivolous errors. I do sincerely hope that all good Liberals will stand by him and help to bear him through his deep troubles. I hope THE TRUTH SEEKER will still continue to liv and flourish. I will do all I can towards its support, although that is but little. I am truly sorry to think friend Underwood has taken the course he has towards Brother Bennett; it is to be hoped he will see the mistake he has made, and repent of his errors. As for John C. Bundy and F. E. Abbot, I am not surprised at their conduct. I don't think there is anything too low and contemptible for them to engage in.

You will please continue to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER, and I will send you the pay for the subscription in a short time. I haven't the money now, but will hav it soon.

Your sincere friend, JOHN C. GOCKHART.

ROSEDALE, INDIANA, Dec. 15, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT, EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: My verdict is, Not guilty. Go on in the great work of reform in which you hav done such noble work heretofore, and all friends of liberty will stand by you; your name will liv and be cherished by future generations, while the names of such cowardly traitors as Abbot, Bundy, and Comstock will be despised and looked on by all true friends of liberty as enemies to the cause of human progress. The mean and cowardly attacks made upon a man locked up in prison for no crime whatever are enough to damn any man, or set of men, who will stoop so low. Such vile and contemptible wretches as this beautiful trio are, "Well might the sun in darkness hide, and shut his glories in."

Again I say go on, and the friends of liberty will stand by you in the noble efforts you are making in behalf of liberty, justice, and free thought, free speech, and a free press.

Yours truly in the cause of liberty, and justice, and the cause of truth, W. H. HALEY.

DOYLESTOWN, PA., Dec. 8, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: You wished all the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to say whether you should step down and out or not. You got thirteen months and $300 too much, by that Christian jury and judge, for daring to speak the truth. As you hav committed no crime, and are undergoing punishment, would it not be more honorable for Abbot and Bundy to hold their peace and let this sentence go against the mistakes they discovered you made years ago? or is it essential to kill THE TRUTH SEEKER in order to let their "kid gloved" journals liv? Liberalism is gaining fast, and we should not stop its growth by fighting among ourselves. I do not care to get along without THE TRUTH SEEKER, and care nothing for either the R.-P. Journal or Index. I have watched THE TRUTH SEEKER close since A. and B. made their assault on it, and cannot see but what it draws as much water as ever. "Long may she liv." Respectfully, A. J. READING.

LANARK, ARK., Dec. 8, 1879.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I see that the beast and his image are upon you again. They seem determined to chew you up. They are determined to stop your letter-writing. They don't like your letters to their master, nor the ones from "Behind the Bars," nor the ones you wrote to Bundy's young angel of spotless white. I want you to continue writing letters. I like them, and thousands of others like them. Your error was that you did not put them all in your paper. Continue those epistles; they are hurting the right fellows. Some of your subscribers may be too cultured to support you any longer, but not many. Wife and I think just as much of you as before, and more. We admire a man that strikes square out from the shoulder, as you did in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 22d. We will never leave you nor forsake you. You hav a place near the warmest corner of our hearts. With all your little faults we love you still, and ever pray (our way of praying) for a glorious triumph over your enemies.

Inclosed you will find one dollar, for which you will please giv me credit on my subscription.

Yours truly, T. H. MONTGOMERY.

OGDEN, UTAH, Dec. 25, 1879.

Inclosed please find P. O. order for ten dollars, five of which place to my credit, and the other five please apply on account of a monthly donation of one dollar per month, promised to sustain the TRUTH SEEKER while its worthy proprietor is behind the bars.

I shall want some more books shortly and will send when I get ready. Put me down for the present for one of the "Gods and Religions of the Ancients," to be issued shortly, now in course of preparation by D. M. Bennett.

Like many of your subscribers I too hav received one or more copies of the 5,000 variously distributed Indexes to the character of the man Abbott, in his departure from the rules of honor and integrity, in reference to the Liberal League and its members generally. and Bennett and THE TRUTH SEEKER in particular. It would appear that he appreciates the vileness of his actions to which his disappointed ambition has led him, as he seeks to make himself notorious by the gratuitous distribution of so many true indexes of the character of his actions. He surely (as the church would say) has got in the dark, and mistakes the character of the Liberal element, among whom he is seeking to establish himself by the exhibition of his notorious acts. In his darkness he has surely got in the wrong church, or outside of his ideal of the right one. He must think he is addressing a lot of dupes of church authority, who hav faith in the priesthood. He must be a dupe himself, and truly in the dark, if he thinks his low, depraved, churlish, spiteful character displayed in his acts of wickedness his Index points out—if he thinks there is any true Liberal will indorse his proceedings. Can he not see that his very dirt and filth, in opposition to integrity of purpose, are making his adversary stronger? The manly and truthful expressions drawn from the sad but honest soul of Bennett are the more endearing him to the lovers of truth and honesty. The diabolical acts practiced against Mr. Bennett by this Christian in disguise hav produced from the depths of his misery, in his lonely cell, the truthful acknowledgments of a devoted supporter of human rights, who is willing to sacrifice his all on the altar of truth, regardless of the loss, individually, of his own inherent rights as a citizen, a man, and a brother.

The acts of Abbot and Bundy two traitors to the cause of freedom, with their supporters, hav by their wickedness brought out more fully the true and noble hero in the cause of liberty and equal rights, and the more endeared, thereby, in the heart of the true lovers of humanity is the staunch and defiant D. M. Bennett, who dares the worst to accomplish the right. Who would forsake the cause of right, with such a hero at the head, at the false cry of disappointed ambition? Let echo answer, Who?

Now, my dear friend, made dearer to me and all the lovers of truth by the persecution you are suffering for the cause, your future is bright; brace up. You hav the magnetism of thousands drawn towards you for your support; this must strengthen you, and you will yet see the outcome, and it will be a glowing day! The victory of equal rights over the power of religion and gold.

SHELL ROCK, IOWA, Nov. 22, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT: A copy of the Index of October 20th was sent to me direct from the office, marked "Sample." How Abbott got my address I know not. It contained a long article copied from the R.-P. Journal, edited by John C. Bundy. The head-lines of the article read as follows: "Another Imposter Unearthed.—The Would-be Martyr a Foul-mouthed Libertine.—D. M. Bennett, the Apostle of Nastiness, professing Devotion to his Wife, teaches Free-love.—The True Inwardness of a Filthy Concern Never Before Published, and now Exposed only in the Interest of Truth and Decency by a Special Agent of the R.-P. Journal." When I read those letters I looked upon their publication as another raid on the life of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and to cast another lasting stigma upon its editor, and I still look upon it more in that light than I do to hav been published in the interest of decency. When I received your paper of November 22d, and read the confession you made, I confess that I was somewhat staggered; but when I came to realize that you, like every other human being, were liable to go astray, my nerves became quieted. Well, brother, I admire the frank and manly confession you hav made; now let John C. Bundy take pattern by D. M. Bennett and confess his many past crimes; or has Bundy been washed in the blood of the lamb and has no crimes to confess? And all your self-righteous, wide-mouthed crew that are ready to stab your enemy in the back when he is down and not able to defend himself, confess your faults; your scape-goat religion will be of no account to you over there.

Now, Bro. Bennett, you wished your friends to write and let you know how they feel in regard to supporting your paper and yourself. I can only speak for one. Your paper is what may be rightly called the people's paper, or at least the thinking part of the people throughout the country. Its columns hav always been open and free to both friend and foe. For one I shall continue to support the paper as long as it is published, or as long as I am able to pay for it, notwithstanding what Mrs. Grundy may say to the contrary. That old lady and I had a falling out forty years ago, and hav never made up. When I am satisfied I am right, I am going to go ahead if all hell rises up against me. Yes, I am going to stick by your paper and you. If Mrs. Bennett can forgive why should not the world?

Now a few words to John C. Bundy. If you mean to charge D. M. Bennett with advocating Freelove, or, more properly, free lust, through his paper, you are guilty of a gross lie; and again, you insinuate that Mr. Bennett purposely brought the prosecution and imprisonment upon himself for the purpose of bleeding the people that must sympathize with him as being persecuted. Another stab at him. I don't uphold Mr. Bennett in writing the letters he did, but when I see the object of John C. Bundy in coming out as he has and when he did, it is enough to call out the sympathies of any person possessing the least feeling of humanity. John C. Bundy gave us not the name of his agent, but it is quite evident to my mind who his agent is in this case. Again, Bundy appeals to R. G. Ingersoll, B. F. Underwood, Dr. Peebles, and quite a number of others, asking them if they can labor longer in the same harness with D. M. Bennett. I don't know how they can well help themselves unless they face about and go with the church. The most of those men that Bundy appeals to hav been heart and soul with Bennett in laboring to free the human mind from priestly superstition and bigotry. If they continue in their noble work I am sure they will work shoulder to shoulder with D. M. Bennett. Mr. Bundy, your mask is too thin. I can see through it as easily as through an old sieve.

I hav written these few lines hoping that the best minds of the country will be as merciful towards a brother that errs as they would like to hav mercy shown to them under like circumstances. Yours in love, J. W. CUNNINGHAM.

OAK POINT, WASH. TER., Dec. 12, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: While you are imprisoned in a Christian dungeon we are trying in this remote corner of the globe to see if we could not cheer you a little by being prompt to renew our subscription and make a small donation for your defense, and comfort your sorrow that this warfare is going on in the Liberal ranks, for as long as we cannot set a better example than our Christian persecutors we ought not, to boast of superiority. I am glad to see that the Liberals hav cut loose from the old, rotten political thraldom and decided to work on independent principles. I hav dropped party politics for a good many years, and hav made a rule to ask our candidates for office a few questions concerning equal taxation and the like. If they would pledge themselves, I would support them and use my influence among my Liberal friends for them, and if not, I would rather stay at home; and, acting upon that principle, the result has been that church property has been taxed to a certain extent and the adoption of as liberal a Constitution as was ever gotten up by mortal man, and the foundation is laid for this territory when it is admitted as a state, to be the home for Liberals and Liberal principles, and to prove it I will giv a few extracts:

1. Declaration of Rights, section 4: "All persons hav a natural and indefeasible right to worship God according to the dictates of their own consciences; no person shall be compelled to erect or support any place of worship against his consent, and no preference shall be given by law to any religious society, nor shall any interference with their rights of conscience be permitted; no religious test shall be required as a qualification for office, nor shall any person be incompetent to be a witness on account of his opinions on matters of religion or finances."

Section 2 says: "All taxes shall be uniform upon the same class of subjects within the territorial limits of the authority levying the tax, and shall be levied and collected under general laws, which shall present such regulations as shall levy a part of valuation for taxation of all property, real and personal."

Section 3 says: "The property, real and personal, of the United States, and the property of the state and counties, property of municipalities, common school property; cemeteries not ordered or used for private or corporate profit, and public libraries shall be exempt from taxation, and all laws exempting from taxation property other than hereinbefore mentioned shall be void."

On education section 12 says: "No religious test or qualification shall ever be required of any person as a condition of admission into any public school or educational institution of the state as teacher or pupil, and no sectarian doctrines shall ever be taught in the public schools in this state, nor shall any funds set apart for educational purposes be appropriated for the support of schools controlled in part by any church, religious society, or sectarian denomination, and no appropriation from the common school fund shall be made for the support of any private school or seminary whatever."

By this you will see that priest and church rule hav seen their day. Whenever we are admitted as a state, if you could make room for it, I would like to send you a copy of our Constitution to be presented in THE TRUTH SEEKER, for I think it would interest a good many of your readers, especially those who would like to get away from a narrow-minded, priest-ridden community. But I will not trouble you any further and will proceed to business.

Inclosed please find $15.00, to be credited as per card order. Yours respectfully, S. C. SCHARNHARRT.

NEW ORLEANS, LA., Dec. 5, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I take pleasure in acknowledging your book, "From Behind the Bars," and I herewith inclose a postal order for the same.

I esteem you for the honest confession of your sins, and I am truly glad of your sincere repentance for the same. I shall continue to take your paper, but I shall drop Bundy. I love and sympathize with every honest man, and I believe you are one; but I hav a withering contempt for the man who can pounce upon one who is bound or in prison. I think there is nothing so cowardly and mean or more malicious.

I am as well convinced that life is continuous, and that after our bodies decay, die, and fall, we shall find ourselves again just as we shall hav made ourselves, intellectually and morally, as I am of my present existence. So, therefore, I am neither a Materialist nor an Atheist. But shall I hate you and try to destroy you because you hav not this knowledge? No, never!

I am pleased with your "Open Letter to Colgate." A withering sarcasm glares out from under the gentle garments of your thoughts. If Colgate and his society had not an alligator's hide they would writhe with horrible contortions under your last, but the devil has no common sensibility. You could not flinch him unless you should pierce his great sciatic nerve. So with Colgate—he of vaseline fame. "Verily, verily I say unto you, he shall receive his reward." And this law is universal.

Very respectfully yours, U. R. MILNER, M.D.

RICHLAND, MICH., Nov. 30, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT: Inclosed find three doliars, which place to my credit for the paper. I should like to make it more but cannot at this time.

I want to giv in my verdict, as I believe I hav it made up. Having read most of the evidence on both sides, I find for Bro. D. M. Bennett, first, believing from the letters alone that he cannot be the hardened sinner that Abbot and Bundy claim, but rather a novice in the art, and not by any means up to the equal of some of his enemies. Second, no woman who had what she considered of great value to lose would hav taken the best means to advertise to the world that some one, she thought, wanted what she had not, and try to extort money because he was foolish enough to think she had it. Third, that Abbot and Bundy's course plainly shows that it is only jealousy that leads them to strike him when he is not able to defend himself, and the meanest kind of jealous rivalry at that. A fair, open business competition challenges the respect of all men, but the course pursued must forever brand Abbot and Buddy as moral cowards and assassins.

Now then, Bro. Bennett, keep up good spirits. You will liv to come out of this honored, respected, and loved, while your assassins will be despised by every lover of justice and rights. Yours for free soil, free speech, free press, free mails, free money, free men, free women, free religion, and a free God. WM. S. LOGAN.

Thomas Paine.

BY A. O. GENUNG.

Thou hero, sage and martyr, well combined,
Brave friend and benefactor of thy race,
Immortal Paine!
We honor thee again.
Once more the busy round of mother earth
Renews in us the memory of thy birth.
With reverent hands we place
Thy name among the worthies of our kind,
Misunderstood, neglected, and maligned,
But for all rancor, hated and forgot,
Brave, generous Paine,
Whose lofty soul despised all selfish gain,
A hundred long, unjust, ungrateful years,
Each in its turn replenishes our tears.
For thine's, alas! a sad, unhappy lot,
Mankind's best friend abandoned by mankind.

No marvel that earth's sordid priests and kings
Delight to tarnish o'er the name of Paine,
Bold, fearless Paine.
Thy blows on wrong fell fast as April rain;
The blazing luster of thy name shall stay
When priests and kings shall all hav passed away.
Ah, power, and place, and mercenary gain,
Bring not the recompense that grateful memory brings.
How soon the peace of those brave men takes wings,
Who dare to brave the evils of their day,
Firm, dauntless Paine,
Thou too must share this necessary pain,
Alas! that still a sordid, surpliced band
Controls the fortunes of our native land!
And sad the fate that finds the moldering clay
Robbed of the fruits that faithful service brings.

Who leaps to praise the soldier's crimson steel,
To juster claims of others oft grows blind.
Kind, gentle Paine,
Whose trade was not to swell the numbers of the slain,
But whose long life was spent
In gaining others' comfort and content.
Is left to bear the many thrusts unkind,
And bitter blame, that none but martyrs feel,
Who envies him his spoil who stoops to steal
The laurels green from off a dead man's brow?
Unselfish Paine,
Despite traducers' art thy fame shall never wane;
For while mankind remains a loyal few
Shall keep the memory green of one so good and true,
And all our children shall remember how
Thy tongue and pen cut like Damascus steel.

January, 1880.

My Jewel.

BY ANNIE PIERCE.

There is a gem that was sent to me—
A gift from the Father, full and free,
But 'twas dropped by the messenger on his way
In a wilderness wild, where it hidden lay.

A casket contained it of lovely mold,
And brighter by far than the glitter of gold;
A casket well formed to please the eye,
For possession of which full many might sigh.

The gem within was mine alone,
And the casket, too, was all my own;
But another first found the jewel rare,
And quickly gathered a thing so fair.

Too late! I came to find my own
Close locked away in a house of stone
With bars of iron and bolts of steel,
Which only a glimpse of its wealth revealed.

I knew in an instant the gem was mine,
Sent by the Father, priceless, divine;
But I could not prove that 'twas my own,
And 'twas locked away in a house of stone.

And what makes it harder for me to bear,
This priceless gem, this jewel rare,
Is a living, loving, human soul
Incased in a form of lovely mold.

And it cries to me in agonized tones,
Release me, release me! I am thine own!
But alas! I cannot; I am powerless, too.
And the agonized wail my heart pierceth through.

I can only watch through bars of steel
With eyes that dark despair reveal.
Ah, the gem is mine, and mine alone,
But 'tis locked away in a house of stone.

I can only wait till we reach the shore
Where bolts and bars are known no more;
Where each may freely claim his own;
Where love is king, and love alone.

REFERRING to the state of parties in France, The Bystander, a monthly review which has just appeared in Toronto and said to be under the auspices of Prof. Goldwin Smith, speaks as follows: As to the church, whatever her power may be, her fidelity to the cause of reaction need not be doubted. From the language of her champions it is plain that she has lost and knows that she has lost her hold on the intellect of the world; her domain, as her chiefs must be conscious, now nearly coincides, as far as simple and sincere faith is concerned, with the absence of popular education. But in two characters she is still strong, and knows that she is strong; as the asylums for minds which seek in blind submission a refuge from religious doubt and as the patroness and oracle of resistance to progress. In progress of any kind, political or social, as well as intellectual, is her bane; of that she is doubly convinced since the ill-starred attempts of Pio Nono to lead reform in Italy and of Lamennois and his school to unmoor her from the social past and set her afloat on the rising tide of democracy. . . . It is quite as much political reaction as mental infirmity that gives her so many converts among the aristocratic class in England. On our continent it is only in the character of a savior from religious doubt and perplexity that she is likely to win converts among the educated. Here she will always hav a hard life. Miracle and relic hav hitherto been very wary in visiting the New World; and the recent incursion of St. Emilius with his bones has produced results which must hav led the saint to doubt the wisdom, though he may glory in the boldness, of his enterprise.

MANY who attended Professor Huxley's lectures in New York three years ago were unable to understand the stress laid by him upon the evidence which the genealogy of the horse affords in favor of the general doctrine of biological evolution. His prediction that this evidence, decisive even as he advanced it, would be confirmed by fresh paleontological discoveries, until even those least able to follow his reasoning would be convinced, was made a subject of especial ridicule—ridicule well justified in one sense, though not exactly in the sense intended. The prediction has been amply confirmed, so far as the discoveries Huxley anticipated are concerned, but he was altogether mistaken in supposing it would convince those ignorant of comparative anatomy. They reject, as of yore, the evidence which satisfies better-informed persons, though it is to be noticed that they limit their objections to objurgation, avoiding (as in their case is wise) the more effective weapons of reasoning and argument. Science owes to an American paleontologist the additional evidence which Professor Huxley promised. The English scientist was able to show only the more recent ancestors of the horse, carrying back the series to the protohippus or hipparion, and the miohippus or anchitherium, the former three-toed, the latter having three toes and the splint of a fourth. In the hipparion the additional toes had already become too small to be of service, but the anchitherium may perhaps hav been able to use all three toes in walking, though probably not in rapid running. Professor Marsh, of Yale College, has added to the series some remoter ancestors of the horse, as the mesohippus, which had three usable toes and the splint of another on each foot; the orohippus, which had four well-developed toes on each of its fore feet, but three only on the hind feet, and the eohippus, which had four well-formed toes and the rudiments of another on the fore feet, and three behind. It is noteworthy that as the animal changed gradually by development from a five-toed ancestor (not yet discovered, though no one competent to form an opinion now questions its existence) to the present one-toed form, it increased gradually in size; noteworthy also that in recent cases of reversion, as in the famous "eight-footed Cuban horse" (really two toes on each foot), the animal thus abnormally formed has in every case been below the average hight. —Herald.

A LESSON IN MYTHOLOGY.

I read to her, one summer day,
A little mythologic story
About the maid who laughed at love,
And ran a race for love and glory.

I closed the book. She raised her eyes,
And hushed the song she had been humming;
Glancing across the shady lawn,
I saw my wealthy rival coming.

"These ancient tales," I gravely said,
"With meaing wise are often laden,
And Atalanta well may stand
As type of many a modern maiden.

Minus, of course, the classic scandal,
But with no less of nimble grace,
How many dainty slippered feet
Are running now that self-same race!

And when Hippomenes casts down
His golden apples, is there ever
A chance for love to reach the goal?"
With saucy smile, she answered, "Never!"

I rose to go; she took my hand;
(O Fate, you ne'er that clasp can sever!)
And, "Stay," she said, with sudden blush,
"You know that I meant 'hardly ever.'"

READ THIS LIST OF STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

CHRONIC DISEASES.

Embracing those of the Blood and Nerves, the Diseases of Men, the Diseases of Women, and the various causes, physical and social, leading to them are plainly treated by that plainest of books, PLAIN HOME TALK, EMBRACING MEDICAL COMMON SENSE—nearly 1,000 pages, 200 illustrations by DR. E. B. FOOTE, of 120 Lexington Ave. New York, to whom all letters from the sick should be addressed. In its issue for January 19, 1878, Mr. Bennett's TRUTH SEEKER thus speaks of DR. FOOTE and his medical publications: "We know him (Dr. Foote) personally and intimately, and we say, with all the assurance that knowledge imparts, that he is a man of the highest incentives and motives, whose life has been spent in instructing and improving his fellow-beings by giving such information as is well calculated to enable them to be more healthy, more happy, and to be better and more useful men and women. His medical works possess the highest value, and nav been introduced and thoroughly-read in hundreds of thousands of families, who, to-day, stand ready to bear willing testimony to the great benefit they hav derived from the physiological, hygienic, and moral lessons which he has so ably imparted.

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Price, paper, 75 cents; cloth $1.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

It is worse than useless to deplore the irremediable.—Symonds.

Whole communities may be insane as well as individuals.—Bishop Butler.

But past, who can recall, or done undo?
Not God omnipotent, nor fate.—Milton.

The aphorism of Lavater is good. Trust him little who smilingly praises all alike, him less who sneeringly censures all alike, him least who is wholly indifferent to all alike.

He who does not rise when it is time to rise, who, though young and strong, is full of sloth, whose will and thought are weak, that lazy and idle man will never find the way to knowledge. —Buddha.

A millstone and the human heart
Are driven ever round;
If they hav nothing else to grind,
They must themselves be ground.
—Longfellow.

By ourself the evil is done, by ourself one suffers; by ourself evil is undone, by ourself one is purified. Purity and impurity belong to ourself. No one can purify another.—Buddha.

We must beware of admitting into our souls the belief that there is no soundness at all in arguments. Let us rather believe that it is we ourselves who are not sound; but let us act like men and bestir ourselves that we may become so.—Socrates.

If a fool be associated with a wise man all his life, he will perceive the truth as little as a spoon perceives the taste of soup. If an intelligent man be associated for one minute only with a wise man, he will soon perceive the truth as the tongue perceives the taste of soup—Buddha.

We would gladly see the good qualities of humanity strengthened and increased, but the dwarfing fetters of creeds we would see destroyed. Humanity works for the good of men and women here on the earth, the creeds struggle for the good of a God above the clouds. The former is far to be preferred.—D. M. Bennett.

The word trivial, in its etymological origin, is loaded with a forcible lesson. It is derived from the Latin word trivium, which denotes the meeting place of three roads, a place where idlers spent their time, loitering to see what passed and to discuss the worthless items and gossips of the day. How much weightier are the suggestions of the word solitude!—W. R. Alger.

Death is better than life! ah, yes! to thousands
Death plays upon a dulcimer and sings
That song of consolation, till the air
Rings with it, and they cannot choose but follow
Whither he leads. And not the old alone,
But the young also hear it and are still.
—Longfellow.

Circumstances often determine how much show a man shall make. To be famous depends on some fortuities; to be a president depends on the acute smellers of a few politicians and a mysterious set of wires; to be rich depends on birth or luck; to be intellectually eminent may depend on the appointment of Providence; but to be a man, in the sense of substance, depends solely on one's own noble ambition and determination to liv in contact with God's open atmosphere of truth and right.—Star King.

When two goats meet upon a narrow bridge over deep water, how do they behave? Neither of them can turn back again, neither can pass the other because the bridge is too narrow; if they should thrust one another they might both fall into the water and be drowned; nature, then, has taught them that if the one lays himself down and permits the other to pass over him, both remain without hurt. Even so people should rather endeavor to be trod upon than to fall into debate and discord one with another.—Luther.

When I am assailed with heavy tribulations, I rush out among my pigs rather than remain alone by myself. The human heart is like a millstone in a mill; when you put wheat under it it turns and grinds and bruises the wheat to flour; if you put no wheat, it still grinds on, but then it is itself it grinds and wears away. So the human heart, unless it be occupied with some employment, leaves space for the devil, who wriggles himself in, and brings with him a whole host of evil thoughts, temptations, and tribulations which grind the heart.—Luther.

Learning depends on the learner. No more truth can be conveyed than the popular mind can bear. Death is seen as a natural event, and is met with firmness. A wise man in our time caused to be written on his tomb:

"Think on living,"
"The name of death was never terrible
To him that knew to liv."

The saying of Marcus Antoninus it were hard to mend: "It were well to die if there be gods and sad to liv if there be none."—Emerson.

I would ask how or by what unerring rule a man is able to know when he has got the "true church or the spirit of the Holy Ghost in him?" Thousands hav in all ages fancied that they knew they had these things, but of these confident believers great numbers afterwards found out that they were mistaken, owned up that they had deceived themselves, and little by little they outgrew the faith of childhood and adopted the broader, grander, and nobler views of plain, practical common sense, which knows no god higher or better than good men and brave women, no heaven happier than pleasant homes here in this beautiful world; no hell worse than the consciousness of an erring, misspent life.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

The rage for pottery painting has had its day. After all, the fine esthetic taste of the Boston girl has come down to the belief that baked beans are the best decorations for dinner-plates. —New Orleans Picayune.

It was a very mean man who slipped his hand between the heads of a young man and young lady in the front seat as the train entered a tunnel. He said afterward the young man's beard was very stiff but the pressure on the other side of his hand felt like the tips of a fur tie.

An English undergraduate at examination, on being asked to repeat the parable of the Good Samaritan, thus did it: "A certain man journeyed from Jerusalem to Jericho and fell among thieves." Then he stopped. "Go on, sir," said the examiner, "And—" "And what? Go on, sir." "And the thieves sprang up and choked him!" triumphantly ended the youth.

THE SERENADE.

Only a maid at the window
Waiting her lover's call;
Only an old spring bonnet
Made over for use this fall.

Only a blue-eyed bulldog
Pacing the garden path;
Only a pair of coat-tails
Bear witness to his wrath.

Only the maiden's fellow
Sitting within his room;
Only some seatless trousers
To tell of the bulldog's boom.

MAUD MULLER ON ICE.

Maud Muller, on a winter's day.
Went out upon the ice to play.

Beneath her Derby gleamed her locks
Of red banged hair, and her crimson socks.

She skated about from ten to two,
And then a hole in the ice fell through.

On the bottom of the pond she sat,
As wet and mad as a half-drowned rat.

A man with a hickory pole went there,
And fished her out by her auburn hair.

And her mother is said to hav thumped her well,
Though just how hard Miss Maud won't tell,

And hung her over a stove-pipe to dry,
With a thumb in her mouth and a fist in her eye.

Alas, for the maiden! alas, for the hole!
And 'rah for the man with the hickory pole!

For the truest words of tongue or pen
Are, "A skating girl's like a headless hen!"

A TRUE STORY ABOUT ANIMALS.

One damp afternoon the turtle came waddling out into the big room to borrow a little sand to lay his eggs in.

"My friend," the elephant said, "yours is a very hard case."

"Yes," the turtle replied, "but while there's life there's soup."

The elephant was greatly astonished, for he didn't know the turtle was given to that sort of thing at all; and all the other animals grinned, because, you see, it wasn't often the elephant met anybody in the menagerie who could talk to him.

"Well," said he, after a pause, "it's a good thing your back is so broad."

"Yes, it is," replied the turtle, "because there's no telling what make comb of it."

The animals cheered softly, and the elephant looked amazed.

"Well, old-go-as-you-please," he said, presently, "you pay as you go, don't you."

"Oh, yes," the turtle said; "I hav to shell out every once in a while. How's hides?" he asked, cheerfully.

"Oh, they're easy," the elephant said; "a little loose, maybe, but nothing to worry over. House-moving business keeps up, I reckon?"

"Yes, yes," the turtle said; "Nothing rushing particularly, but I'm in and out all day. Nothing unusual in shawl straps, is there?"

The animals cheered at this delicate allusion to the trunk business, and for the first time in his life the elephant looked as though he were going to lose his temper, but he rallied, and said:

"Oh, no; much the same as usual; just a kind of hand to mouth business. By the way, didn't I see your father's old overcoat up in front of the restaurant yesterday?

"I guess you did," said the turtle; "he wasn't the kind of a man to die and make no sign. Going down into the billiard room pretty soon?"

The elephant said no, they'd hav to excuse him; but if they'd "wait till the hyena came along, he'd hav some native whine with them." And then the turtle said, "all right, he'd drop in about tusk." And the menagerie went to supper that night with the greatest enthusiasm. But the elephant was very quiet, and only spoke once, and that was to ask the ostrich where he supposed the turtle grew to be so cute? And the foolish bird of the desert tossed an iron bolt-head down his throat and replied: "Picked it up, I reckon."

And then children, the elephant grinned, and said there seemed to be an epidemic in the menagerie, and he leaned up against the centre-pole and went to bed.

Doctor M. L. Fellows is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician.

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good Doctor is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

THE Liberal League of Wilmington, Del., has free discussions at half past ten every Sunday morning and sometimes lectures in the evening. Materialists and Spiritualists heartily unite in these meetings.

IN the town of Berlin, Canada, there are fourteen churches—one for each 400 of the population. The people claim that there are more churches and less religion, more drinking and less drunkenness, in Berlin than in any other town in Canada. The population is mostly German.

E. CAMPFIELD challenges "each and every minister in the state of Kansas" to debate the proposition, "The Bible is entirely of human origin, absurd, and unscientific, and teaches a defective code of morals." As that proposition is manifestly true, we pity the minister who undertakes to dispute it with Mr. Campfield.

The Eleventh Annual Convention of the New England Labor Reform League meets in Science Hall, 718 Washington street, Boston, on Sunday and Monday, January 25th and 26th, three sessions daily. A. H. Wood, Angela T. Heywood, Mrs. M. S. Townsend Wood, Dr. J. H. Swain, A. D. Wheeler, E. H. Heywood, and other speakers are expected.

ONE of the prominent religious papers of this city is so impressed with the importance of sailing under the banner of "Peace on earth, good will to men," that it prints as its motto, "With malice toward none and charity for all." In a recent issue it accused a minister of its own denomination of "a gross misstatement of fact," and in the issue of last week accused him of "giving as facts things that are not facts." The accused brother retorts in good style.

THE following incident of the severe weather in Paris is related: "On Sunday evening more than 100 workmen appeared in a body at the Police Office of the Palace of Justice, most of them leading by the hand wife and children, and stated that, having neither work, food, nor shelter, they wished to be detained as vagabonds. The request was refused. They then proceeded to a Commissioner of Police, who acknowledged the justice of their plea, and granted their request."

THE prospectus of THE TRUTH SEEKER, a truly bold, independent, Liberal journal, appears in this issue of the Blade. THE TRUTH SEEKER should be in the hands of every lover of Freethought in the land. Its columns teem weekly with the most crushing blows against that popular superstition which has for so many weary ages chained the consciences of men and smothered reason. It would be of inestimable value to mankind if a good Liberal journal could be sent to every home and fireside in the land, and there is none better qualified to do good than THE TRUTH SEEKER.—Cloud County Blade.

A STORY is going around; we trust it is not a fact, but faith we'll print it. A gentleman of this town ordered an article of a certain merchant. Another merchant in the same line of goods called upon the gentleman who had ordered the goods and remonstrated with him for having given the order to his (the merchant's) rival, claiming that he should hav had the preference, as he was a member of the same church as the gentleman, whereas the merchant who had received the order was of a different denomination. The order was countermanded and the church member made happy. If it has indeed come to this we would suggest the necessity of our merchants hanging out their signs, "Presbyterian Hardware Store," "Methodist Grocer," "All Baptist Horses Shod Here," etc., etc.—Corning Courant.

THE fact that the New York Bible Society is publishing an edition of the scriptures containing numerous errors has occasioned an animated dispute between the society and Henry Ward Beecher. The latter declares that he will not giv one cent toward the support of an organization that publishes a Bible which is false, and the society replies that better judges than Mr. Beecher declare the edition of which he complains to be all right. If the society makes any mistake it is in publishing the Bible in its entirety for general distribution among families. The book might be wonderfully improved by leaving out a large part of the Old Testament, for there are pages and pages of that Testament so grossly immoral, that no father having the welfare of his children at heart would permit them to read them. There is nothing in "Cupid's Yokes"—for sending copies of which through the mails Bennett was committed to the penitentiary—half so corrupting and demoralizing as many passages in the Old Testament that might be mentioned. Why people will denounce obscenity in one case as degrading and praise it in another as elevating and refining is a puzzle. —Dubuque Herald.

ACCORDING to Hubner's "Statistical Tables of the Countries of the Earth," there are in the German Empire 25,600,000 Evangelical Christians, 14,900,000 Catholics, 28,000 Orthodox Greek Christians, 512,000 Jews, 6,000 of all other denominations or of none. In Austro-Hungary there are 23,800,000 Catholics, 3,600,000 Evangelical Christians, 7,220,000 Greek and other Christians, 1,365,000 Jews, 5,000 Mohammedans and others. In France there are 35,390,000 Catholics, 600,000 Evangelical Christians, 118,000 Jews, 24,000 Mohammedans and others. In Great Britain and Ireland there are 26,000,000 Protestants of various denominations, 5,600,000 Catholics, 26,000 Greeks, etc., 46,000 Jews, 6,000 Mohammedans and others. In Spain there are 17,500,000 Catholics and 180,000 adherents of other denominations. In European Russia there are 56,100,000 Orthodox Greek Christians, etc., 2,680,000 Evangelical Christians, 7,500,000 Catholics, 2,700,000 Jews, 2,600,000 Mohammedans, and others. In Belgium there are 4,920,000 Catholics, 13,000 of the "Reformed Church," 2,000 Jews, and 3,000 belonging to other denominations. In Sweden and Norway there are 4,182,000 members of the Evangelical Church, 4,000 Greek Christians, and 2,000 Jews; the number of Catholics is not officially given; it is estimated at about 1,000.

ON Sunday evening the Congregational church of Brantford, Ontario, was thrown into a state of turmoil by some personal allusions in the Rev. S. P. Barker's farewell sermon. A large number of people were present. The reverend gentleman, in giving his reasons for his departure, charged a portion of the choir with having placed obstacles in his way, saying that he had never had an hour's peace on account of the actions of some of them. This aroused the ire of a gentleman in the choir, who promptly arose, and from the choir gallery—directly opposite the pulpit—he called upon the speaker to desist, as he was insulting every member of the choir. This, as may be surmised, created quite a commotion. The preacher instantly ordered the interrupter to sit down. The latter retorted that if any further insults were offered he would "turn on the organ" and drown the preacher's voice. During this controversy a lady parishioner in the center portion of the church fainted. In the midst of "Giv it to 'em, Barker!" were heard in Cries of "Sit down!" as the minister laid on the lash. The front seats as the minister laid on the lash. Some of the members—those more directly pointed at—arose to leave the church; but as a heavy shower was prevailing at the time, they had to remain in the lobby, where they had the satisfaction of hearing all that was said.

THE theological arithmeticians are again at work with tape measure and blackboard, taking the area of heaven. Some time ago a Lutheran minister gave the world the benefit of his calculations, which showed just how many persons the heavenly city would accommodate, giving each one of the redeemed a room about the size of a hotel bedchamber. Another genius is now heard from in the New York Observer. He is not so literal in the matter of accommodations, but makes his reckoning for "standing room only." This expert in mathematics states that the heavenly city will hav an area of 2,250,000 square miles, which equals 98,010,000,000 square feet. Allowing three square feet for each person, would giv standing room for 10,890,000,000 persons, and two square feet for each person would giv such space for 24,502,500,000. According to such a computation, heaven will hardly be a desirable place. The Lutheran calculator made it something like a jail or a cheap lodging house. The Observer's man makes it as uncomfortable as a street car. It is not very encouraging to a company of weary and rheumatic old Christians, sorrowing over the ills of the present, life to tell them that there is a glorious heaven before them where each one will be allowed a space of two or three square feet to stand in. The weary might reasonably hope that they would at least be provided with something soft and substantial to lean against.

AT the last meeting of the Wayland Liberal League, the following action was taken: Mr. G. W. Morehouse said: Mr. President: William M. Totten, our friend and co-laborer in the cause of truth and liberty, is no longer among the living. He has gone to his eternal rest in full sympathy with all who are working for the complete emancipation of mankind from any and every form of mental and physical bondage. His thoughts were entirely unfettered by fear or superstition. He died as he had lived, a sincere and earnest man. He, like all men, had his faults: but no one can truthfully say that they were not more than balanced by his virtues. His ideas were original, and often brilliant. There was not a single grain of hypocrisy in the man. If it be a fault to giv fearless utterance to that which we honestly believe to be true, that, then, was his great fault. He spoke right from the active, impulsive brain his honest emotions on every subject. His life-history is ended. His words and work liv. He has done nothing for which any human tribunal would punish him for a single moment, and we hav no reason to think that any possible superhuman judge could be less lenient, merciful, and just. To the last he was the friend of Liberals, and counted them as his true friends. Though his sickness was long and trying, he never for a moment swerved from the best convictions of truth reached by him while yet body and brain were in the full vigor of mature manhood. We will, all of us, continue to regret his loss. It is fitting and proper that the members of this League should giv expression to our consideration for his memory, and our sympathy for his bereaved wife and children. I therefore offer the following resolutions: "Resolved, That by the death of William M. Totten, occurring the 29th of December, 1879, the Wayland Liberal League has lost a useful and respected member, a worker in the cause of humanity, and its members hav lost a true and tried friend. Resolved, That in expressing our sorrow for his loss, and in offering this tribute of respect to his memory, we also extend our most sincere and heartfelt sympathy to his afflicted family." The resolutions were unanimously adopted, and were ordered printed, together with the introductory remarks.

Paine, the Political and Religious Reformer.

AN ADDRESS BY B. F. UNDERWOOD.—CONCLUDED.

We may not approve all the views advanced in the "Age of Reason," but while candor and courage and disinterestedness are admired among men we cannot but respect the motives which impelled Paine to give the work to the world, and the lofty spirit which sustained him in the personal sacrifice which its publication demanded. He was not a man indifferent to popular favor, but he loved truth better than he loved the approbation of his fellow-men, and he was less anxious to receive the applause than to improve the condition of mankind. He saw great and pernicious errors firmly rooted in the popular mind, sanctioned by ages of ignorance, and regarded with feelings of reverence by millions. An exposure of these errors involved an attack on the cherished convictions of the American people, that were then speaking his praises, and of millions in Europe who regarded him so highly that, had they the power, they would have raised him to a level face to face with earls and dukes. But the man who had defied the British monarch, and called upon the feeble colonies of America to rise in rebellion against the mightiest government on earth, was not to be deterred from giving to the world any opinions that he thought would make mankind better and happier. He could face the prejudice, bigotry, and hatred of the multitude in exposing their superstitions as courageously as he had attacked the pretensions of kings and asserted the sovereignty of the people. With a disinterestedness never surpassed and rarely equaled he bequeathed as his last gift to the world his thoughts on religion, knowing that his motives would be impugned and his name covered with reproach by the millions from whom he had received such signal honors for his great and acknowledged services in the cause of political freedom. Under these circumstances the publication of the "Age of Reason" was the bravest act of his life.

"To side with truth is noble when we share her wretched crust,
Ere her cause bring fame and profit and 'tis prosperous to be just.
Then it is the brave man chooses, while the coward stands aside,
Doubting, in his abject spirit, till his Lord is crucified,
And the multitude make virtue of the faith they once denied.
For humanity sweeps onward; where to-day the martyr stands
On the morrow crouches Judas, with the silver in his hands;
For in front the cross stands ready and the crackling fagots burn,
While the hooting mob of yesterday in silent awe return
To glean up the scattered ashes into History's golden urn."

Paine's fidelity to himself and his continued devotion to humanity cost him his good name. From the time the "Age of Reason" appeared, the author became an object of aversion, hatred, and slander. His great services in the cause of popular government were ignored or disparaged, or, if admitted, the purity of his motives was denied. Most of the old companions, from fear of losing their own popularity, forsook him. Unfounded falsehoods were circulated respecting him. The clergy painted him as a hideous, horrible monster. And when death came, and the grave had received him, his memory was insulted, and he was represented to the multitude as a depraved and miserable wretch who,

And because he wrote the "Age of Reason," giving to mankind his honest thoughts on religion, the Christian world is still unwilling to do him justice, to give him even his meed of praise as a Revolutionary and pre-Revolutionary writer. His name is rarely mentioned in our Fourth of July addresses. The books used in our schools for exercises in reading and declamation, which contain extracts from the addresses and writings of the other prominent actors in the Revolutionary drama, have no paragraphs from Paine, although "Common Sense," the "Crisis," and "Rights of Man" abound in beautiful, brilliant passages, inculcating lessons of loftiest patriotism. His portrait was not long ago denied a place among those of his compatriots that adorn the walls of Independence Hall, in Philadelphia, the very city in which he wrote his "Common Sense," the work which "led the people," as Samuel Adams says, "to call loudly for independence." It now, I am informed, occupies its proper place. Our orthodox literature still uses its influence to conceal the merits and blacken the character of Paine. Thousands of tracts are in circulation, intended for the ignorant and credulous, that repeat the stale falsehoods about his life and death. The orthodox clergy, to diminish the influence of his works, still disparage and vilify him, while the great mass of Christians are yet accustomed to regard him as blasphemous scoffer, a vulgar, profane writer, and a moral monster, whose life was one continued career of drunkenness and debauchery, and whose death was one of unutterable terror, made so by the remorse which filled his guilty soul and the fate which he saw awaiting him beyond the grave.

Surely, if we wished to prove the truth of the adage that "republics are ungrateful," we would not have to travel to distant lands nor go back to ancient times for an illustration.

It was the power, directness, and irresistible logic with which Paine attacked revelation that caused the influence of his work to be dreaded and himself to be so bitterly assailed. He examined the Bible with the same fearless spirit with which he had examined the English Constitution, and he exposed its errors and absurdities, and refuted its claims to a superhuman origin, in the same clear, concise, and forcible style that had proved so effective in his attacks on monarchical government and the pretensions of kings. He took the arguments which had been confined chiefly to the learned, which had been used by those who, like Collins and Bolingbroke, had written for the educated class, and made them, by the simplicity of his language and the clearness of his illustrations, easily understood by the common reader. Writers more learned had preceded him in the same field, but none who possessed the same happy faculty of engaging the attention, exciting the interest, and convincing the understanding of all classes alike.

Paine had studied the Bible carefully, and was familiar with every part of it, let the clergy say what they will. He produced a work which contains arguments that are among the strongest that can be brought against the divine origin and authority of the Bible. Modern research and modern scholarship have added arguments to those which he employed; the scientific discoveries of the past fifty years have put into the hands of the Freethinker new weapons with which Paine was unacquainted; but it may be safely said that the reasons he adduced against revelation are among those which to-day are regarded as the strongest that can be urged from the Theistic standpoint. It is to me suprising that a work written nearly a century ago, and by one whose mind was so busily and earnestly engaged in other fields of labor, should be so free from errors, have so few inconclusive arguments, and so little to which Freethinkers to-day can take exception.

It is true that Paine lacked a university education, and was acquainted with neither Hebrew nor Greek; but he wrote for the many and not for the few, and appealed to the understanding rather than to the learning of his readers. He founded his arguments on common sense, which is confined to no language, and not on philological interpretations, concerning which but a few are competent to form an opinion. He could not have written a work better adapted to the effect intended had he been familiar with all the languages of antiquity.

Several attempts were made to answer the "Age of Reason," but they were so unsatisfactory to the friends of Christianity that their circulation was discouraged. I have seen two of these old works, one written by a clergyman of Newport, R. I., and the other by a clergyman who lived in the state of New Jersey. They are learned and theological, prosy and prolix. I should think they would have the effect, if read, that Benjamin Franklin tells us resulted from the perusal, by him, of certain works against "Infidelity," which, by acquainting him with the arguments of the authors referred to, confirmed him in his position as a Deist. Of all the answers to Paine the only one known in this generation is "Watson's Apology." That is no; regarded as a very valuable work for circulation An orthodox Christian would hardly be willing to have Paine's "Age of Reason" and Watson's "Apology" bound in one volume, and generally read Liberal publishers have circulated them in this nanner.

As Freethinkers, we are as much indebted to Thomas Paine as to any other writer in the English language. The works of no other Freethinker have had such a wide circulation or done so much toward destroying superstition and contributing to the present condition of Freethought. The advocates of the Christian religion seem to be aware of this fact, and as long as this religion has the power to manifest its spirit, it will not cease to curse the memory and blacken the reputation of the man who had the ability and courage to give to the world the "Age of Reason."

Let us here notice briefly the prominent intellectual and moral characteristics of Pane. No man can become acquainted with his wrtings or the course of his life without being convinced that benevolence was one of the most prominent traits of his moral character. His strongest desire and his loftiest ambition seemed to be to elevate the condition of his fellow-men. To this end he employed unremittingly all the powers of his gifted mind, from his appearance in public life till death ended his career. He cared not for office, and was indifferent to the attractions of wealth. "I have," he wrote, "no occasion to ask, nor do I intend to accept, any place or office under the government. There is none that it could give me that would in any way be equal to the profits I could make as an author could I reconcile it to my principles to mae money by politics or religion. But I must be in everything as I have ever been—a disinterested volunteer."

He gave the copyright of "Common Sense" to every state in the Union, when, had he been so disposed, he could have realized a handsome fortune by the profits accruing from its sale. He gave up the copyright of the "Rights of Man" in favor of the public, after refusing an offer of a thousand guineas from a publisher. "In a great affair," he wrote, "when the good of man is at stake, I love to work for nothing, and so fully am I under the influence of this principle that I should lose the spirit, the pleasure, and the pride of it were I conscious that I looked for a reward."

Another instance of his disinterestedness was the publication of "Public Good." Virginia was making a claim for unoccupied Western territory. Paine thought—and rightly, too—that this territory should be kept for the general government for the rapidly-growing population at large, and he published the work named, opposing Virginia's claims, when a proposition was before the Virginia assembly to remunerate him for his Revolutionary writings. He was at this time very poor. His needy circumstances, attracting attention, were the cause of the unsolicited proposition. But he would not giv up advocating a just measure, although he knew the result would be a loss to him personally.

Paine's philanthropy was as boundless as it was disinterested. "The world is my country; to do good, my religion," he wrote in his "Age of Reason." His labors in these countries for the happiness of the people will ever remain proof that this noble sentiment came from his heart, and was the mainspring of his life.

His moral courage has already been mentioned. This quality was most conspicuously shown while he was in France. Ordinary men would have yielded to the public clamor, or at least have remained quiet, where Paine boldly stood up for the principles of justice and humanity at the risk of his life. His whole career was a grand exhibition of unswerving devotion to what he conceived to be right, regardless of personal consequences. He felt contempt for every kind of cowardice.

His independence of character never forsook him. He maintained his self-respect and manly dignity when his former associates had abandoned him, and when his books and a few faithful friends were his only companions. He was stung to the heart by the ingratitude manifested toward him in his old age, but he never made the least effort to recover his popularity by one word, one line, or one act that was not consistent with his principles and in harmony with the whole tenor of his life.

Paine was a man of incorruptible integrity. Not one act of dishonesty stained his public career, nor have his most bitter assailants been able to point to one act of injustice toward any man during his long and eventful life.

Paine was a man of simple habits, unostentatious manners, and republican tastes. "I had rather," he wrote, "see my horse Button eating the grass of Bordentown or Morrisania than see all the pomp and show of Europe."

As a writer Thomas Paine undoubtedly deserves to rank among the ablest in our language. We are familiar with the saying of a witty Frenchman, "The object of language is to conceal our thoughts."

Paine was ignorant of the art of writing so as to conceal his real thoughts. Every sentence from his pen was stamped with his intense individuality, and luminous with the light of his own mind. Aristotle says, "He who would be a teacher must think as wise people do, but speak as the common people do." The thoughts of Paine were those of a sagacious and profound mind. He gave these thoughts to the world in a style peculiarly his own. So plain and lucid, so terse and vigorous, that a child can grasp his meaning, while there are but few men who can peruse his works without profit. In the simplicity of his style, as Jefferson remarks, he resembles Franklin; but his style is more nervous and vigorous than that of the great philosopher. There is truth in the statement of Croly, the author of the "Life of George the Fourth," who says, "Paine, like a young Spartan warrior, went into the field stripped to the last thread of prudent conventional disguise, and thus not only fixed the gaze of men upon his intrepid singularity, but exhibited the vigor of his faculties in full play." He uses but few embellishments, but he never lacks for a happy illustration with which to convey the full force of his thought. All his works abound in passages full of compact thoughts beautifully and elegantly expressed. There are few, if any, writers whose works contain more noble, generous sentiments. He used wit and sarcasm freely, but to his credit it must be said he never used these weapons against any person or principle unless he thought they were opposed to the interest of the people. Some who have paid a high tribute to Paine as a political writer have condemned him for the use of irony and sarcasm in the "Age of Reason." But it should be remembered that "Common Sense" and "Rights of Man" are works on which these weapons are as freely used as in his religious writings; and since he believed the dogmas of Christianity to be as false and pernicious as the pretensions of kings and the principles of monarchy, he cannot be censured consistently for ridiculing the story of Jonah and the whale when the sarcasms he hurled against the titled nobility of England are unqualifiedly indorsed.

Paine's views on the subject of religion were mild compared with the radical views of the majority of those who honor his memory and celebrate his birthday. "I believe," he wrote, "in one God and no more, and hope for happiness beyond this life;" and I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy."

One object he had in giving the "Age of Reason" to the world—the first part of it—was to fix in the French mind, then agitated by revolution, and in hostility to the corrupt religious system which had robbed and enslaved the people, a firm belief in a Supreme Creator of infinite power and perfection. He regarded this belief as necessary to a firm and correct system of morality. Paine's "Address to the Theophilanthropists" is a defense of the existence of a God; and the arguments therein employed are as conclusive, probably, as any that can be used.

To-day thousands who, owing to their early education, feel uneasy when the name of Thomas Paine is mentioned, and who are considered and call themselves Christians, hold opinions substantially the same as those expressed in the "Age of Reason." They have outgrown the errors which Paine assailed, while they are yet influenced in their unjust estimate of his character and writings by the misrepresentations and slanders which his criticisms called forth, and which have been preserved and handed down to these times. Not only are his political services unknown to millions who are enjoying the fruits of his labors, but his name has not ceased to inspire dread in the hearts of men and women who would feel insulted if they were suspected of believing the principal errors which Paine assailed. And yet to him more than any other man are they indebted for their escape from the mental slavery of their earlier years, for it should be remembered his "Age of Reason" has exerted an influence by no means limited to those who have read the work.

Paine was a self-made man. Shakspere says some men are born great, some achieve greatness, and others have greatness thrust upon them. Paine, most emphatically achieved greatness. He inherited no ancestral name, and could claim neither wealth nor distinction by birthright. He was not suddenly pushed into a position of honor, nor was a reputation made for him by his friends. He started in life with no other resources than a clear head and a brave heart. With these he carved out his own fortune. He organized victory out of his own subjective forces.

The son of a Thetford stay-maker, born poor in a land of titled nobility, he rose by his own efforts to distinction; helped establish the freest and most magnificent republic that ever existed; wrote his name in large letters in two of the first nations of Europe; associated his name with the progress of republican principles for all time, and found time besides to perform a work in the cause of Freethought of incalculable value, for which Freethinkers in every land whose shores are washed by the Atlantic have celebrated the day that gave him birth, and recalled the story of his life.

Thomas Paine died in New York in 1809, at the ripe age of seventy-two. The world will yet do him justice. "History," to use the words of a review, "issues no sentences that history may not repeal. Time fights the battles of truth—an unimpassioned and unwearied ally. Every hour there are new evidences brought forward, mysteries unraveled, and reputations restored." Men will wonder in the future at the ingratitude that has been shown Paine, and will respect and honor him for his worth the more because so great a wrong has been done him. No marble will be thought too costly for his monument, no gold too pure for his epitaph, and his memory, enshrined in the hearts of millions, will endure when his slanderers, sunk beneath "the breezeless ocean of oblivion," will be known no more forever.

Discussion.

Debate between Prof. W. F. Jamieson and Rev. Jacob Ditzler, D.D.—Continued.

MR. JAMIESON'S CLOSING SPEECH.

This closes my part of our earnest but pleasant debate: "The Christian religion and the Bible tend to immorality and the injury of society." At the outset I think I proved that men of the finest culture, have tried Christianity and found it wanting. The charge against Infidels—that they are ignorant of Christianity—is shown to be utterly without foundation. Many of the finest intellects in this world, after a full, patient examination of Christianity; after many years in teaching it, having formerly believed it true, now deliberately give their testimony against it. Christianity, as a system of faith and practice organized in the Christian church, with a bloody history back of it, is dying a lingering death, and to millions is dead already. No one denies the good which it has done; but the evil, the persecution, the sorrow, the darkness, it has brought to the race no one can fully estimate. I think I have shown that it is a clog to the progress of science, and in this way tends to the injury of society. It is still a tyranny over the minds of many. It has been shown, that its beliefs are false, demonstrably so; its appeals are mainly to fear instead of reason; while it sneers at scientists, it makes blind faith in its "bloody-mouthed God," Bible, and church the highest virtue; it directs the gaze to a heaven no one knows, nor professes to know, anything about; it frowns upon the innocent pleasures and enjoyments of this world, and approvingly smiles on the devotional souls who prostrate themselves before an imaginary ruler in heaven; it undermines natural morality; it denounces good deeds unless accompanied with religion; it denies the possibility of human virtue through its great doctrines of depravity and atonement; it teaches that the consequences of evil deeds can be escaped by faith in Christ; it encourages people to believe they can do evil without suffering for it; it treats with contempt the idea of natural justice, and insists that all the commands of its God should be obeyed, whether in accordance with human reason or not; it requires a man to hate his kindred in order to love Christ; it makes an exclusive bond among Christians of more importance than the brotherhood of the race; it has always proved to be a despotism when allied with civil power, whether as Catholicism or Protestantism; it is opposed to freedom of speech and of the press, even in this day, and is continually grasping for more political power; it is opposed to purely secular education; it proclaims human nature as lost, ruined, and growing continually worse. Such is Christianity as it is in fact and in history. My friend, by his silence on those important points, confesses himself unable to grapple with the counts in this truly terrible indictment. Every statement which I have made has been sustained by quotations from Christian literature, the correctness of which has not been denied. It would have better pleased my opponents had I dealt in mere assertions without proofs.

As to the Bible, the foundation of Christianity, I have proved the utterly unlovely character of the God of the Bible. He is partial. "Thou art a holy people unto the Lord thy God: the Lord thy God hath chosen thee to be a special people unto himself, above all people that are upon the face of the earth" (Deut. vii, 6). Proofs were given in abundance to show he is cruel, fickle, unjust, murderous, indecent, lying. He playfully told us that a small boy could answer all the objections I brought forward against Christianity and the Bible. Why did he not bring on the small boy, then? I wish the big, old boy had even tried instead of telling the people how easily it could be done.

Scarcely an attempt was made to answer these proofs. My friend says there was not time. He undertook to reply to a few. Here are the samples of his replies. He justified God in killing people (1 Sam. vi, 19) because they were disobedient. Why not kill all the disobedient? He failed to notice what an immoral influence a God killing his creatures would have upon the people. In another case, where disobedience could not be alleged (God commanding the killing of children—Num. xxxi, 17), my friend resorted to this "explanation:" He said it was a merciful act; that God had them killed in order to prevent the infants from starving to death. In the language of Mr. Ditzler, "Great God!"

I will not attempt to enumerate all the texts which he failed to notice, such as Ex. vi. 7; xix, 6; Ps. xxxiii, 12; Deut. xiv, 21, and scores of others. I proved that the God of the Bible sanctioned lying (1 Kings xxii, 22, 23); that he deceives (Ezekiel xiv, 9); that he sends strong delusions for the purpose of having people believe a lie (2 Thess. ii, 11); that he was engaged in the slave trade (Joel iii, 8); that he directly authorized polygamy (2 Sam. xii, 9); that he is indecent (2 Sam. xii, 11); that he caused little, inoffensive children to be butchered (Num. xxxi, 17); that he authorized the most heartless cruelties, and which were imitated by the Spanish Inquisition (Deut. xiii, 6–9).

Such is the God of the Bible. As my opponent declared that "the objects we love, admire, and worship, we develop our characters therefrom" (and it is true), what are we to think of the effects upon mankind of worshiping such a being? Just what history teaches us: we have had hate, bitterness, persecution, fiendishness—all in the name of God and religion. Blood has drenched the earth through the mandates of such a system; rapine, murder, lying, stealing, persecution—all authorized by the Bible.

I have proved that the Bible teaches slavery, adducing many texts to prove it: Ex. xxi, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 20, 21; Lev. xxv, 39–54; Joel iii, 8; 1 Peter ii, 18, 19, 20; Col. iii, 22, 23; Eph. vi, 5–7, and others. What is the moral tendency of such teaching?.

We have proved that the Bible is not a temperance book, measured by the strict total abstinence principle of modern times. The Bible does not teach such a principle; hence total abstinence was originated, like other reforms, outside of the Bible, proving that human nature is far in advance of the Bible. Several texts were given to show that the Bible, on the contrary, is in favor of drunkenness (Prov. xxxi, 6, 7; Deut. xiv, 26). Even in the woes God was to bring upon nations, drunkenness was to be a part of the affliction (Jer. xxv, 27, 28). They were to be so drunk as to spew, fall, and rise no more. Pretty drunk. Made drunk by God. "Ye shall certainly drink." I did not hear that exclamation from a pious brother in the audience, when my friend was reading some extracts from a book written by an Infidel, and which he failed to show was indorsed by anybody except the writer himself, "My God!" There were passages from that Infidel book, he said, which he dare not read before this audience. I proved that there are many passages in the Bible which he dare not read; and, unfortunately for his side of this question, the Christian world generally indorse them. He indorses them himself, and has defended them in this debate.

He "explained" again that the vulgar words and phrases in the Bible are technical. For the most part, so they are in any book which he condemns as immoral. But I proved that there are whole chapters in the Bible which are obscene; that is, I referred you to them, in Ezekiel, Jeremiah, Deuteronomy, Songs of Solomon, etc. Many passages throughout the whole Bible are vulgar (as Webster admits); too vulgar and too offensive and too indecent to be read in the presence of females; "offensive to delicacy and even to decency," says Webster. I showed that there were many portions of the Bible which contain bad, immoral doctrines (Deut. xxvi, 1–5; 1 Cor. vii, 5, 36)—doctrines which you profess to indorse.

Particular attention was called to 1 Cor. vii, 36, as containing very bad advice to young ladies and gentlemen. No parent would advise the young to follow out such doctrine, even on the condition that they should marry afterwards. I have shown that this book is full of polygamous and Freelove doctrine, faithfully practiced by the patriarchs and other servants of the Lord.

My friend tried to conceal himself under a bad translation; notwithstanding, it is the translation which is preached from, read in the family, read in the Sunday-school, and which has been palmed off upon the English-reading nations as the veritable "Word of God." When it comes into public discussion, then the other side is compelled to admit that it is mostly the word of man.

For my opponent to cite us to Shakspere and Homer and other authors who wrote in different languages, and who should have their writings judged by the original languages in which they wrote, is no escape from the difficulty. If there are to be found no originals of the writings of those men, then you are left to conjecture what they did write. If translations cannot be depended upon, as my friend declares, and which I have not disputed, then copies cannot be relied on, either. Moreover, the claim is made for the Bible that it is the infallible word of God. My friend, it is true, admits that those who read only a translation have never had the infallible word of God. But I have shown that there is not an original writing of the Bible in existence, and have quoted the most eminent Christian scholars to sustain the position. To meet this withering fact, my courteous and learned friend said that if we had no more than "Thou shalt love the Lord thy God and thy neighbor as thyself," that is amply sufficient to guide us in all the duties of life and bring us to heaven. Our Christian friends in this audience appeared to think that was a happy stroke, but it amounts to rejecting the whole Bible with the exception of a few words. If love to God and love to man was instruction enough, why did we have any more? It is discarding nearly the whole Bible for the sake of saving the remainder. You begin to see that the less of it you indorse, the better you are off. But to discard so much is virtually saying that it is nearly all a work of supererogation. If an Infidel says the same thing he is censured. [TO BE CONTINUED.]

Another Split.—Which is Switch?

I am glad I didn't die last week! I should hav missed such a piece of rollick and fun—such an "ordeal of laughter," and a high old time. Very few Liberals here in New York take the Index, and they who do were fortunate, for they had a chance to lend it and—never see it again. As it passed from hand to hand in Liberal circles, wearing and tearing as it went, readers smiled a very audible smile. As Liberals met in their accustomed haunts, some early bird, out picking up news, would say, "Hav you seen the Index?"

"No."

"Well, then, you hav missed the richest thing of the whole Liberal season."

One said, "I hav a copy, and I am going to keep it, too, till the corner-stone of the next World's Fair is laid."

"What if there don't be any fair in the next world?"

"Oh, not so far away as that; I mean Coney Island, 1883."

"Oh! I see—corner-stone of a chicken coop."

"How so?"

"I understood you to say necks twirled!"

"Well, you are incorrigible, but I accept the suggestion. The corner-stone of my next chicken coop shall contain this week's Index as the one sole curiosity of the day. Posterity has got to know of this. It is too good to keep all to one generation of vipers. My great-grandchildren will want to laugh too, and they will hav nothing in the twentieth century so rich as this."

"Well, what is it all about? What is in the wind—I mean the Index?

"Well, first, Abbot, senior partner, has taken Joe Cook into the concern.

"Second, Joe Cook has gone in.

"Fourth, Abbot tickles Joe Cook.

"Fifth, Joe Cook and Abbot mutually admire.

"Sixth, the style and title of the new concern now is, and henceforth will be, Abbot, Bundy, Comstock, and Joe Cook. Negotiations are pending to make Joke Ook President of the Free Religious Association. Adler must go."

But let us not giv ourselves wholly over to the laughter side of the "ordeal." There is logic to be applied as well. Answer a fool both ways if you want to finish him, according and not according to his folly, for the reasons given by the "Wisest Man."

Mr. Abbot publishes the whole of Joe Cook's "Prelude," "Is American Infidelity Liberalism or Libertinism?" and indorses it in a leading editorial, entitled, "Two, and Not One." The following is the opening paragraph:

> There are two kinds of "Liberalism," as wide apart in purpose, spirit, and tendency as the North Pole is from the South Pole. They both go, and will inevitably continue to go, under the name "Liberalism," simply because this is the general term which includes all practical efforts to increase "liberty," for any object whatever. The difference of the two kinds lies in the objects for which increased liberty is sought. The one kind seeks increased liberty for the purpose of conforming human life more closely to the laws of natural morality, and of governing conduct by a still higher and purer code than that which has been incorporated either in church or state. The other kind seeks increased liberty for the purpose of escaping all responsibility whatever to moral law, of overthrowing all regulations both of church and state which recognize morality as a social necessity, and of abandoning conduct to the control of sentiment, caprice, or passion. Church and state alike embody only the average conscience of a given period; the one kind of Liberalism demands a higher conscience than the average, while the other kind demands a lower. This is the essential difference of the two, constantly illustrated in the history of mankind; and it is illustrated to-day.

Now all this is good Liberal doctrine. We hav learned it here long ago, and it is part of the League literature. The only question that can be raised by it is, Who are the Liberals—which is "the real original" and which the "shop over the way?" Small, narrow, exclusive bodies ever since the world began hav been in the habit of assembling themselves together and shouting,

> "Resolved, That the earth is the Lord's and he givs it to the saints.
> "Resolved, That we are the saints.
> "Resolved, That the righteous shall inherit the earth.
> "Resolved, That we are the righteous."

But the assumption gets disputed, and the old, old question recurs to-day, Who is turkey and who is buzzard? which is eel and which black snake? But he who has the wisdom of the serpent as well as the harmlessness of the dove finds no difficulty in making the discrimination.

Here let us make one point clear. Readers will turn back and see how Mr. Abbot constrains himself to do honor to "the laws of natural morality." But that is the last of it. In the rest of the long article he drops natural morality out of sight and every further allusion to morality is lauded as "public morality." He says, "Is not the inference natural, however false, that the vast majority of Liberals sympathize with the National League in its warfare on public morality?"

Again he says, "Whoever takes pains . . . will find abundant cause for mortification in the apathy that prevails among Liberals themselves on questions of public morality."

Once more he says the conduct of Liberals and the position of the Leagues "go to confirm the stock argument of the pulpit that Christianity is indispensable to public morality."

This is the same trouble we had with the professors at Cornell University—they wanted us to fall down and worship public morals. They wanted Rawson to resign in the interests of "public morality."

Now, will Liberals just stop and think a moment what is implied by "public morality." Public morality indorses frauds in elections, gamblers in Wall street, corporations grinding down their workers to the last penny upon which they can exist, coal combinations to raise the price of fuel. Public morality causes and then indorses the daily defalcations, the fraudulent bankruptcies, the embezzling treasurers, like those of Fall River and elsewhere; indorses the great, rich, and pious Gilman forgers, and pardons them out of prison as soon as possible; while, on the other hand, that same public morality shuts up and mercilessly keeps in prison Freethought editors who hav committed no crimes.

Last, most significant, and doubly damned with everlasting infamy, public morality promotes, sanctions, and provides a place in its system for fifty to one hundred thousand prostitutes in the city of New York, and pro rata for every other city and town in the country. I say from fifty to one hundred thousand because no census taker has ever entered upon the work of numeration and it is not known to a figure how widespread the evil is. Public morality does not dare to find out, nor to tell if it knew. But this is the kind of morality that Mr. Abbot, Prof. Oliver, Joe Cook, and all that crowd take for the guide of their lives. It is to this style of morality that they call upon the National Liberal League to sing anthems of praise. They hav started the tune themselves, and on an uncommonly high key; but I reckon they will hav to wait and toot it alone awhile before we chime in. Natural morality and the 8th Demand of Liberalism are good enough for us, if Mr. Abbot does hav the honor of originally making it and the dishonor of now repudiating it.

Now, what next is the matter with the Index? Well, here are two minor items which it will be well to sandwich in. The Index givs a nice little Freelove item about Prof. Jaeger, of Stuttgart in Germany, and how he gave a lecture, part of which was devoted to the relations of the sexes. Some of his audience were ladies; but this sex question he thought not suited for the ears of ladies, so every time he came to a ticklish place about sex, he said it in Latin. The other item is an English letter comparing "Cupid's Yokes" and "Fruits of Philosophy."

Now another important article, and most singular for so cultured a paper as the Index, is an elaborate essay on "Fourierism," by Albert Warren Kelsey, editorial contributor, giving a little biography of Fourier, the titles of his works, the attractions of his scheme of Socialism, and enlarging quite eloquently on his integrity, his great learning, and the grandeur of his character. The curiosity of this fact is that this editorial contributor, some three years ago, signalized his mounting of the editorial tripod by some slashing articles denouncing Socialism as the sum of all corruption. T. C. L., at that time in favor with the Index, and F. S. C., an old Brook Farmer, one of Boston's first families, and a thoroughly informed Socialist, took this Kelsey in hand. One rapped him on the knuckles, the other hit him over the head, and both showed up the profundity of his ignorance. In that sore state he took himself off to Europe, went to studying Socialism, especially Fourierism, as we recommended him to do before he wrote any more on the subject. He went to scoff, but returns to pray. He comes back cocked and primed with Fourierism, and pours out his fresh acquirements through the Index as news. Another funny side of it is that many of the older Liberals, for whom Mr. Abbot has no better stigma than Freelover, learned their Freelove from Fourier primarily, and at second hand from his American disciples, Ripley, Channing, Emerson, Dana—Brook Farmers all—and from Brisbane, Greeley, and the Tribune here in New York. One of the very text-books of the Freelovers is "Love vs. Marriage," by Dr. Mark E. Lazarus, a prominent disciple of Fourier in the early days, who draws all his inspiration and most of his quotations from Fourier in support of his vindication of "Passional Attraction" and his onslaught on marriage.

Some time about 1849 or 1850 Mr. Greeley and Henry J. Raymond, respective editors of the Tribune and the Courier and Inquirer, conducted a famous discussion of Fourier's system, each writer stipulating to prepare twelve articles, all the articles to be published in both papers. Mr. Raymond, by general consent of all the Competent, had the best of the argument because he remorselessly pushed to the front Fourier's theory of the "Passions" and "Passional Attraction," which Greeley endeavored vainly to prove had nothing to do with Fourier's theory of Association.

Of course this dose of Freelove in one column of the Index and denunciation of Freelove in another don't at all "consist;" but poor Abbot is as innocent as a lamb in the matter. He don't know anything about it. He never studied anything but theology—knows nothing of the thought of the world on the most important science in it, Sociology, and thus is liable to be easily sold. This Kelsey has put him in a false position more than any other of his contributors. He is the beauty who, two years ago, outdid Comstock and seriously proposed searching the mails for private letters. Poor Abbot had to apologize for him and get him out of the untenable position under an "inadvertence." As against the Kelsey stripe of Liberals, Mr. Abbot sadly needs a Freelove assistant editor who knows the article when he sees it, so he can prompt and forewarn his principal and help to keep the Index clean and sweet.

But the central rose in this fragrant-smelling Index bouquet is a little editorial trifle entitled "A Misplaced Switch." This article THE TRUTH SEEKER copies in part in another column. It speaks for itself. It reveals that "sunthin' is broke" in the Free Religious Association, and our dear old minority Abbot is again in a minority—this time a minority of one. It shows another split, but this time split down to so fine a point that it does not seem possible to split any further. And yet we do know that Mr. Abbot does often disagree with himself, and it perhaps will be unsafe to predict that he may not, like Hans Breitman's "Snitzerl on His Philosopede," get "quardered indo dwo." It is as wonderful in its way as Handy Andy's silver fork, the first he ever saw: "He'd be d——d if he ever saw a spoon split up that way before."

But now, after this fulmination, we see Adler and Higginson and Clarke and Jane P. and Sara Ann, and the "General Agent" and the "Office Committee" and the "Executive Committee" assembled in caucus inquiring, with blanched cheek and pallid lips, "What shall we do? We can't go on without him, that's clear. We must knuckle right under, and let him run this Free Religious machine or he will be accusing us of a 'plot to capture' the Association and will be calling us a 'Freelove ring'—which we aint anything of the kind."

And yet we don't know what on earth to make of the closing sentence of the "Misplaced Switch." Can we believe our own eyes? There they hav been holding hands—and in "love" too! Who would hav "thunk" it? And Abbot don't want to let go—no fault of his if he does. She'll hav to let go first, and on her be all the blame.

But enough for this time about this wonderful Index. The next thing to going to a good play where you alternately laugh and cry yourself almost to death is going to a bad play, and so badly acted that you cry and laugh all the same. This Index is of the latter class. Liberals everywhere should send for it and see for themselves—price seven cents. We hav been afraid that the Index would die. We fear no more. We liv in hope. This number will giv it a new lease of life. Babes and sucklings will cry for it, and Liberals must hav it. Price seven cents. No Freelovers need apply. Seven cents to all who are up to the standard of "public morals."

But the sum of all is, at Syracuse the obscene goose roosted lower. Now his goose is Cooked. So mote it be.

T. C. LELAND.

Hon. Elizur Wright's Challenge.

REV. JOSEPH COOK, Dear Sir: I see by the Golden Rule, just at hand, that you hav ventured to read to your audience the three resolutions of the Cincinnati Congress of the National Liberal League, and though you took more time to prepare your comments than accorded with the terms of my challenge, and selected a different channel of publication, I shall hold myself bound to pay $10 to any charity you may please to designate.

Your comments are surely indicative of a zeal and disregard of consequences worthy of a better cause. Your utter disregard of the facts in the cases of Rawson and Bennett makes you a soldier worthy of that forlorn hope of Christianity in which you are enlisted. Now suppose the "Infidels" in this republic should happen to hav a majority, and, thinking, as they sincerely do, that the doctrine of the atonement is essentially immoral and tends to corrupt society, they should pass the practically silly law of excluding your lectures from the mails, wouldn't you quote the Golden Rule against them, and even the United States Constitution? No, Mr. Cook, our withers are unwrung. Our words speak for themselves. We are pleased with your comments, especially your favorite term, "cancer planter." We remember a cancer in this country—they were not Infidels who planted it—which some of us attacked forty or fifty years ago, and our publications, trying to prove that it was contrary to the sacred Scriptures, and particularly to the seventh and eighth Commandments, were taken out of the mails in Charleston, S. C., and burned. Even slave-holding Senators were then honorable enough to say that the Constitution gave Congress no authority, nor the Postmaster-General any, to meddle with the morality of anything intrusted to the mails. They called on our states to hang or suppress us. Then they were right if we were wrong.

Now, Mr. Cook, you know as well as I do that, if there was ever anything obscene in this world, it was one of the rites of religion authorized in the Bible. And if there was ever a "cancer-planting" publication, it is the sacred book of Esther. Show us some moral good in that book, at your next lecture, or else confess that even Rawson and Bennett, bad as they themselves and their fellow-Infidels hav painted them, are not worse than the fellow who wrote that part of the Bible, or some others of the "inspired" authors. I well remember when the stilettos of the slaveholders threatened us, and the mobs broke our windows, the "cancer" was defended from the Scriptures by Rev. Moses Stuart, of Andover. I can show you his letters, addressed to myself in 1834, if you hav any desire to see them. They would read well in your lectures, though I was ashamed to print them.

Now, Mr. Cook, I hav as much respect for all the good—and there is a vast deal of it—in the Bible as you hav, or any other man, and so hav nearly all the Atheists and Infidels I am acquainted with. When you say we are trying to corrupt the young, you say what you do not know, and I am sincerely sorry for you; you are breaking the ninth Commandment.

Hoping to hear from you soon, as to the disposition of the $10, I am, Yours truly, ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Boston, Mass., Jan. 2, 1880.

A Lecturer's Suggestion.

Would it not be well for our Liberal friends to make arrangements for lectures at least two months in advance? I hav received calls for Paine celebrations in three different places at the same time, and unable to accept any of them on account of prior engagements and long distance.

Discussion of the National Financial System.

MR. TRUESDELL'S THIRD LETTER.

I note with pleasure, Mr. Morrison, in your third letter a slight back-down from the position taken in your second; but how extensively you recede I am unable to tell from the fact that you cloud my victory by a claim of insincerity. Hereafter I hope you will "inject no more irony" in your arguments upon this question nor make any statements that you are unwilling to father as intended facts. Let us both say what we mean and mean what we say.

You accuse me of dodging the question, while you hav persistently dodged the very first question raised in this discussion—the question of all questions; i. e., What is your new measure? How is it to be defined and by what gauge? If you hav abandoned this ignis fatuus, why don't you handsomely acknowledge the fact instead of charging me with evasion?

Remember, Mr. Morrison, you hav the affirmative; you advocate a new financial system, a new monetary unit or measure of value, and unless you explain what that new system is and define your new measure so that the financial world will understand exactly what you mean, there is no foundation to your imaginary structure.

I sincerely hope you may be able to giv our economists some new light upon this important subject, and I promise to oppose you only when I think you are in error. As I said in my first letter, I am aware of the fact that we hav not reached perfection in any of the branches of finance; still I am not prepared to do away with our present monetary unit or our national system of banking until a better one can be put in the place of it.

Among all of the arguments against the national bank system I hav ever heard or seen, those appearing in your last letter are the most remarkable. How you could possibly jumble up figures in one conglomerate mass and pervert statistics so grossly is beyond my comprehension. I cannot conceive how you could dare to rush into print with a pretended national bank statement showing but a fraction of one side of the ledger, thereby totally disregarding every known principle of bookkeeping.

If you are not an accountant, you should hav submitted your statements to some one who is. There are thousands of boys less than twenty years of age who read THE TRUTH SEEKER and who will discover that it is utterly impossible to justify your conclusions from the figures you present by any known principle of mathematics.

You speak of the national bank system as a monopoly, yet in the same article you admit the fact that it is free to any five men who wish to engage in the business. You claim that an investment of $30,000,000 loaned to the government by the national banks yields an annual income of $18,000,000 exempt from taxation, equal to 60 per cent.

You quote the following figures from the Comptroller's Report for 1873. September 1st, number of banks, 1,955; capital, $488,100,951; surplus, $118,113,848; net earnings for six months, $33,123,000; circulation, $353,968,279. Then you deduct the whole currency from the capital, to which you add the surplus earnings accumulated during the life of the system, and upon these few garbled figures alone you proclaim that "the net earnings for the six months amounted to over 24 per cent, or nearly 50 per cent a year," declaring, Quixote like, that "the above figures cannot be controverted."

Now, Mr. Morrison, not only every bookkeeper in the country will controvert your figures, but the Comptroller of the Currency does in his official report to Congress for the year 1873. (Page 55, first part—where you got your figures.) If you had quoted his entire statement, instead of attempting to manufacture one of your own from a few garbled extracts, you would hav discovered that the net earnings of the national banks for the six months ending September 1, 1873, were only 5 46-100 per cent of their capital and surplus instead of over 24 per cent, as you hav it.

But these figures are largely in excess of any net earnings made by the national banks since 1873. From the elaborate Official Report of the Comptroller of the Currency for 1878 (page 89, part first), it appears that the average net earnings of the national banks, from 1873 to 1878, is but 7 3-10 per cent per annum on their capital and surplus.

I quote the following from the official record referred to: Ratio of earnings to capital and surplus

| | | | | | | | |
|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|---|
| For six months, | ending | March 1, 1874, | 4 8-10 | per | cent. |
| " | " | " | " | Sept. 1, 1874, | 4 9-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | March 1, 1875, | 4 7-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | Sept. 1, 1875, | 4 6-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | March 1, 1876, | 3 6-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | Sept. 1, 1876, | 3 2-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | March 1, 1877, | 3 1-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | Sept. 1, 1877, | 2 5-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | March 1, 1878, | 2 8-10 | " | " |
| " | " | " | " | Sept. 1, 1878, | 2 3-10 | " | " |

Thus it appears, Mr. Morrison, that your claim that "the national banks are making nearly fifty per cent per annum upon their capital and surplus" is an exaggeration by about six times the real amount. Your statement in regard to the profits upon circulation are equally as erroneous. You frantically call upon our "dear readers" to examine this question, and I sincerely hope they will listen to your appeal. Let them carefully examine the Comptroller's report for 1876 or 1878.

The former is the most elaborate official document ever emanating from the Comptroller's office. In every report, however, the reader will find published in detail and aggregate a correct statement of the condition of every national bank in the union. If you, Mr. Morrison, had stopped to risk one eye at these official records in detail before attempting your summary, I am confident you would not hav risked your reputation upon the unwarrantable statements you hav made.

It is this lack of information that afflicts the great bulk of the Greenback party. While they recognize the fact that no one is fit to shoe a horse, to build a house, to deliver a lecture, run a steam engine, or properly set a broken limb, without some preparation or practical experience; yet when it comes to the science of finance amateur economists of mushroom growth spring up in every quarter and mount the political platform with unblushing impudence, or rush madly into print with the insane idea that they are to reform the financial world. One of the most popular financial fallacies of the present time is the belief entertained by many that the government can profitably repeal the National Bank act and substitute greenbacks for national bank notes. This proposition has many adherents even among those who do not believe in an intended issue of government currency. They argue that no inflation will be produced by the change—that a direct saving to the government and the people will be effected of the whole interest on the bonds owned by the national banks now pledged to the government as security for their circulating notes. The average value of national bank currency in circulation for the past ten years is three hundred and ten millions. The bonds pledged for the security of this amount bear interest varying from four to six per cent. A fair average is five per cent, which yields an annual revenue of $15,500,000—the whole sum which the enemies of the national banks propose to save by wiping them out of existence.

Were we to stop right here (where most of the inflationists close their arguments upon the national bank question) without presenting the other side of the ledger a very fair case might appear as against the banks, but before crediting this $15,500,000 as a net saving to the government let us stop to inquire the cost. By the Comptroller's Report for 1878, page 44, part first, it appears that the national banks hav paid back to the government and the people during the last ten years, in state and United States taxes alone, $169,081,812, averaging very nearly $17,000,000 per annum or three and sixty-seven hundredths per cent of their average capital. The municipal taxes paid by the national banks are variously estimated from one to two and one-half per cent of their capital. The average capital for the last ten years is $446,000,000. The low estimate of one per cent for local taxes would be over four and one-half millions, which added to the $17,000,000 of government and state taxes will make $21,500,000 per annum which it will cost the government and the people to save $15,500,000, showing a direct loss in the operation of $6,000,000 annually.

It may be argued, however, that a destruction of our present national banking system will not destroy capital, that the same capital will still exist from which the same revenue can be derived. But how weak is this argument in the light of facts! Every dollar of national bank capital is now reached by the assessors in all parts of the Union. Not only the par value is assessed, but often the surplus fund, the accumulation of years, pays its full proportion of the state and local taxes, while it is a well known fact to all business men that hardly one dollar in ten of the aggregate personal property of the country pays any tax at all.

PROFITS UPON CIRCULATION.

A very erroneous opinion prevails among the greenbackers in regard to the profits derived by the national banks upon their circulation. The privilege of issuing currency is supposed by many to be a very valuable one. The national banks are often accused of enjoying a great monopoly in this respect. To refute this claim it is only necessary to state that the national bank system is entirely free to all who wish to engage in the business. It is a noteworthy fact in this connection that since the repeal of the law restricting the bank currency to $354,000,000, by act of Congress, January 14, 1875, bankers hav not availed themselves of the privilege to increase their issues, as the following statement will show:

National bank currency in circulation,

|---|---|
| March, 1875 | $324,525,349 |
| March, 1876 | 307,476,155 |
| Jan'y, 1877 | 292,851,351 |
| March, 1878 | 300,926,284 |

The national bank system is not a monopoly in any sense of the word, neither is it wholly the property of rich capitalists. Upon this subject the Comptroller, in his Report for 1878, page 8, says: "Among the shareholders may be found persons in every station of life, and great numbers of women and children rely for their support upon the successful management of these institutions. The elaborate tables which appeared in the Comptroller's Report for 1876 showed that there were only 767 persons anywhere who held $50,000 each of national bank stock; that more than one-half of the whole number of shareholders held each but $1,000 or less of such stock. . . . Of the shareholders owning not more than $1,000 each there were 32,235 in Massachusetts alone, 12,784 in New York, 14,621 in Pennsylvania, etc., etc. It is not probable that the stock of any other class of corporations in the country is more widely distributed among the people of moderate means than is the national banks. It is also distributed largely among members of all political parties, and, as a rule, is free from the control of partisan influence."

Yet in the light of all these facts, Mr. Morrison, you close your unwarrantable tirade against the national banks in the following words: "This national banking monopoly bribed their way into power; they hav never been willing to be governed by the will of the people. I now declare that the above arraignment of the national banking system is true, and not all of the truth either; then am I not justified in saying that this system is a fraud?"

Now, Mr. Morrison, I hav shown conclusively by the highest authority in the land—the official records at Washington—the undeniable fact that your tirade is not true; and I further appeal to every intelligent reader who is interested in this question to consult the authorities I hav cited; and I ask you to look again more closely into the statistics bearing upon this subject and tell me in your next letter if there is not really more fraud in your random statements than there is in the national banking system.

That some system of banking is absolutely essential to commercial prosperity I believe the most ardent inflationist will hardly deny. Banks are an outgrowth of civilization; they are the product of necessity; they pick up and utilize small balances, amounting to vast sums in the aggregate, enabling them to assist enterprises that could not be accomplished without them. The banks of issue giv us an elastic currency, expanding with the demands of trade, and contracting by redemption when not in use, thereby making it stable and of comparative uniform value.

As no new or improved system of banking has been proposed by any of our acknowledged economists, nor by you, Mr. Morrison, or any of your soft-money friends, the question at issue appears to be, Shall we maintain the present safe, economical, well-tried national bank system, or drop back into the old, extravagant, dangerous way of banking under the conflicting state laws?

Those who recollect the great currency panic of 1857—the wide-spread financial distress endured by the people in consequence of an unsecured bank-note circulation—they who can recall the fact that nearly all of the bank currency of the country was redeemable at a discount varying from one-eighth of one per cent to one or two cents on the dollar, and that the currency issued by many of the Western or wild-cat banks had no security whatever; the merchant who can remember paying an exchange to the banks upon all of his collection paper varying in amount from one-half of one per cent to one or two cents on the dollar, surely such people will not welcome a revival of the old system.

Under the present wisely-arranged national bank system we hav a uniform safe currency, receivable alike in all parts of the Union. The exchange between the most distant parts of the country has been reduced in price to one-eighth or one-tenth of one per cent. The price of transferring balances from one part of the country to another has been reduced so low by the national system as to make a saving to the people of many millions of dollars annually.

There are no secrets in the national banking system. "He who runs may read." Five times each year the Comptroller calls for a sworn statement, taken from the books of the bank at some prior date, showing their exact condition. These statements are by law published in the town, village, or city where the bank is located. A government examiner or detective visits every national bank in the Union at least once each year, going through with the minutest details of the business, a report of which is also transmitted to the Bank Department at Washington. Every safeguard that can be thought of is thrown around the banks for the protection of the depositor as well as the bill-holder. When we consider the fact that during the last fifteen years the national banks hav maintained an average circulation of three hundred million dollars, and not one dollar of their notes hav been lost to the holder, it is, to say the least, a compliment that we can pay to no other system of banking heretofore inaugurated.

In my next letter I will discuss the subject of interest on money and other financial questions necessarily crowded out of this article.

Notes by H. L. Green.

A. N. SOMERS, a young man now residing in Shrewsbury, Vermont, and who has recently graduated at a "divinity school," has abandoned the idea of preaching "Christ, and him crucified," and proposes to preach, in the place of such nonsense, the gospel of humanity, or, in other words, enter the Liberal lecture field. He has already delivered a number of Freethought lectures that hav been well received, and I bespeak for the brave young man a generous welcome into the Liberal ranks.

A LIBERAL convention will be held in the Universalist church in the city of Titusville, Pa., February 7th and 8th. It is expected that the Hon. William Barnsdall, the mayor of the city, will preside, and large delegations from neighboring towns will be present. The speakers announced are Lyman C. Howe, of Fredonia, N. Y.; O. P. Kellogg, of Ohio; Mrs. Hannah T. Sterns, of Titusville, and the writer. I hope to meet many of the Liberals of western Pennsylvania at that meeting.

I AM gratified to learn that Prof. B. F. Underwood has recently delivered in the city of Milwaukee an able address in defense of the principles of the National Liberal League. He also, in the same lecture, criticised the distinguished liar Joe Cook in this manner: "The misrepresentations of such men as Joseph Cook—who is himself a compound of genius, insanity, and 'pure cussedness'—in connecting the cause of state secularization with obscenity will defeat themselves; and we shall yet hav a republic in which there will be no disabilities or privileges on account of religion, and in which shall be guaranteed to all equal and exact justice."

PROF. CHAS. H. GODDARD, of Swan Lake, Dak. Ter., the committee man of that territory, has established a school in that town, which he "hopes will one day become the nucleus of a radical 'Infidel' college or perhaps university." Prof. Godard requests Liberals to aid him in making his school a success. He has heretofore been the principal for seven years of the public school of that town. He has procured three hundred and twenty acres of land upon which he proposes to erect some fine school buildings. He is now organizing a Liberal League. He writes like a man who believes he has a work to do, and intends to do it.

The Benefits of Religion.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In a recent sermon a certain Boston clergyman gave, by name, street, and number, a complete directory of all the dens of infamy in his city. This method of advertising is certainly a valuable and profitable one, at least to the listeners and persons advertised, though doubtless the short-sighted and reverend advertiser intended it to be otherwise. It is a widespread and well-founded belief that the principal patrons of the houses of ill-fame in our large cities, as well as the most profitable customers of the many abortionists that flourish in our midst, belong to the pious and over-fed congregations of our fashionable churches. The attempt to bring to justice the celebrated Madam Maxwell, one of New York's most notorious abortionists, some years ago, brought out some facts that tended strongly to establish the truth of this conclusion. She held in her possession proofs of crime in high places, damning facts concerning the immoral private lives and deaths in the families of our leaders in fashion, politics, and religion, that convinced the authorities that to press her case to trial would seal their political doom. So they refrained, and she returned to her business benefited by a free advertisement in the news columns of the leading papers throughout the country.

The sermon of which I speak, which was preached by the Rev. Henry Morgan in October last, must hav been an interesting one to his congregation. There was no napping then, and the gentlemen, at least, must hav been sorry when the adventurous and reverend explorer came to the end of his delectable list. Such sermons cannot be classed among "glittering generalities." It is all very well to say, in the conventional non-commital manner: "Beware! the city is full of temptations. Avoid them." But how much better, how much more interesting, to young men as well as to venerable and hoary-headed Christians, it is to say: "At No. 49 Blanque street, room 5, livs Polly Perkins, a young damsel of easy virtue; beware of her; she may lead you astray!" How interesting it must be to unwise maidens, over-wise matrons, and penny-wise Lotharios to hav their ears tickled with the announcement from the pulpit that at the corner of Dark street and Shady Place dwells Madam Vaseline, abortioness!

Of course this is all right. It concerns only the congregation, the preacher, and the persons advertised. If they are content, outsiders ought not to complain. If a church sees fit to pay a preacher to keep them posted on affairs among the demi-monde, and the prospects of prostitution generally, we should only look on and smile. It is none of our business whether the parson expounds the Bible or the bagnio, so long as we are not forced to listen to the exposition; but if a newspaper should dare to print such an advertisement as that published from the Rev. Mr. Morgan's pulpit, no decent family would patronize it longer, and the Society for the Protection of Vaseline would bleed it of a few thousand dollars of "hush money." Things may be said in the pulpit, done in the church, and read in the Bible that law, public opinion, and common decency would not tolerate elsewhere. So who that has a leaning that way would not be a church member and enjoy the full benefits of religion?

Another method of advertising much in vogue is that of using the church front as a bulletin board for the coffin maker, who also officiates as sexton. On many of the churches of this and other cities may be found, spiked up at one side of the door, a neatly painted sign board, proclaiming to the public the solemn fact that Mr. Paul Bearer, sexton and undertaker, resides at No. 73 Hearse avenue. On the other side of the portico of the house of God may be found the parson's sign, giving his street and number. To complete the significant trinity the physician ought to hav his shingle above the door. His services are required to bring the congregation, individually, into the world; it givs him and the parson a fat living to get them through the world; and when they are ready to leave it, or are forced to leave it unready, it takes all three, doctor, parson, and undertaker, to get them out of the world in the orthodox method. By all means let the doctor nail his sign board over the vestibule, and share, equally with his co-laborers, in the benefits of religion.

While I am on this subject I will relate, as nearly as I can remember it, a fragment of conversation I overheard on a Brooklyn ferryboat, the other day, between the editor of a religious newspaper and another gentleman. As I am not familiar with musical nomenclature I may not get the technical terms correct, but I giv them as nearly right as memory will allow:

"Sharp, is he?"

"Sharp! sharp's no name for it. Why, he never opens his mouth in prayer-meeting that he doesn't ring in some puff of his pianos. Talk about making a business of religion! he makes a religion of business. If he ever gets to heaven, and he will if he can trade a piano for a through ticket, he will persuade the heavenly orchestra that their harps are discordant compared with his pianos, and he'll hav a piano factory in full blast inside of a month."

"But how does he take so well among church people?"

"He plays the pious dodge, and he does it well. Let me tell you how he worked it at our last revival a few months ago: Going into the inquiry room he found there several repentant sinners, willing and anxious to receive salvation. He undertook to show them how to come to Jesus. As soon as he got a chance to speak, he began, apparently addressing his remarks to a neatly dressed young man in the opposite corner of the room: 'Young man, all you need is faith. You must take Jesus at his word. Believe and be saved. Salvation costs you nothing but belief—the greatest prize in the world for merely willing to believe. Suppose I should tell you that if you come to my show rooms—which are as fine as any in New York—suppose I promise you that if you come there I will giv you a magnificent $600 Warris Hawters square grand piano, rosewood case, elegantly finished, style 4-11-44, seven octaves, weighing a thousand pounds on a full giraffe scale, fine rosewood case, round corners, beautifully carved limbs and liar, solid rosewood case, heavy serpentine and top molding all around the elegant rosewood case, back finished same as front, very latest full iron frame, horizontal bars and braces, magnificent rosewood case, improved new counter-scale and overstrung thorough bass, grand French action, fretful desk, celebrated rosewood case, carved pedlars, solid rosewood ca—that is, moldings, ivory keys and keyholes, capped claw-hammers, giraffe treble, and first-class rosewood case, and every improvement that a long and broad experience can suggest—suppose I tell you I will giv you this magnificent $600 piano for only $300. Would you believe me? The man of faith would take me at my word, and he would come to my show-rooms and find it exactly as I represented, ex-act-ly as I represented. The skeptic, the unbeliever, the man of little faith, would sneer, and pass on, and say I was offering too much for the money.

"'My young friend, it is just so with salvation. Christ offers you salvation if you will only come to him, hav faith in him, and believe what he says. The man of faith believes what Christ says. He takes him at his word. He comes to Jesus, and he receives salvation. The unbeliever, the man of little faith, sneers and passes on. But he finds out too late that he is wrong. My friend, my dear young friend, you must hav faith.'"

The boat struck the pier, the conversers hurried up the wharf and disappeared in the crowd, and I lost the rest of the conversation. Who this religiously inclined piano-dealer is I did not learn, but he evidently knew how to reap the full business benefits of religion. It was a happy thought of his to compare his piano to salvation, and himself to Christ. He killed two birds with one stone, or rather, he advertised two marketable commodities with one neat little speech; and he did not forget to mention his "solid rosewood case." H. J. T.

Minnesota.

The Dacotahs meant, by the word minne, water, and sotah sky-tinted. Sky-tinted waters is therefore the signification of the word Minnesota, a poetic name for a poetic land—a land of lakes, eleven hundred!—a veritable fairyland of lakes, cascades, rivulets. No man deserves the name of traveler who has missed a sight of the upper Mississippi. Here are to be found dells, and vales, and bluffs in magnificent profusion, as if nature had in this region emptied her apron of her choicest glories.

Leaving Prairie Du Chien on Monday last, I crossed on the railroad pontoon bridge to McGregor, then steam cars to La Crosse, thence, recrossing the Mississippi, sped along the Minnesota side to Lake City, most of the distance close to the river, bluffs in some places so near at hand that they could be almost touched through the car window, and being several hundred feet high, occasionally shut out a view of the moon, which was well up in the southwest. An American who travels through Eastern lands before he has visited his own picturesque America, "'tis a folly and a shame unto him." Reader, hav you never visited this wonder land? O ye invalids from Eastern slopes and harsh winds; here is your "land of promise!"

Ah! breathe deep with me the pure, dry air of this invigorating latitude and altitude. Drink deep with me the cool, sparkling spring waters! My Christian friend, why be in haste to go to heaven before you hav seen the Falls of Minnehaha? the Dalles of St. Croix? St. Anthony Falls? Bridal Veil? (Romantic couples hav been married behind the falling spray.) Lakes Pepin, White Bear, Minnetonka, Como, are noted places of resort. This happy land is free from malaria and kindred diseases. Chills and fevers are unknown, unless some guest consents to take within the border his parting shake. Bilious fevers are dismissed unceremoniously. In fact, Minnesota has one of the healthiest climates in the world. Physicians in former years advised consumptive patients to go South, to Florida, Islands of the Sea, Cuba. The warmer climes did not, as a rule, justify expectations. Of late years, the recommendation of informed physicians is, "Hie away to Minnesota!" If you are too far gone your stay will be more pleasant while you do remain.

A few words about the cold weather. We hav it. You sometimes see it reported that we hav forty degrees below zero. Therefrom people draw erroneous conclusions. They imagine that is the average temperature. The fact is the thermometer rarely indicates that degree of cold. Only for four or five times during the four months' winter do we hav twenty degrees below zero, lasting two or three days at a time. Again, thirty degrees below zero is more comfortable here than ten degrees below in the Eastern states. Moreover, during the prevalence of the coldest days here the air is in motion but little, and the sun shines brightly. I hav spent three winters in this state, and hav traveled in open conveyance, often from twenty to eighty miles in the dead of winter, and experienced more comfort and less fatigue than when moving half the distance in Michigan, Illinois, and Iowa. The air is drier here, and the cold is consequently agreeable and bracing. Pleasanter winters I never experienced in my life. A long, damp, drizzly spring, such as pesters the life out of the misguided dwellers of New England, is entirely unknown in this "land of the blest." When we are done with winter we are done, and joyously leap from our cheery Boreas plump into the lap of glorious Summer. Practically, we hav but three seasons—the peerless Minnesota summer; its warm middays and cool evenings, nights, and mornings, with but few exceptions. Just the climate for the boon of sound repos for the laborer; and especially for the brain workers. Its long autumn—aglow with the splendors of the rainbow colors, purple and gold and crimson. Nature holds carnival; and as the sun slides behind the curtain of night, the stars twinkle with a brilliancy and richness of color in this clear atmosphere unseen in the haze of the East, and Aurora joins to lend enchantment to the scene.

God in the Constitution? Never!

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There is a general attempt on the part of the churches, the Y. M. C. A., and other church auxiliaries, led on by a howling, frightened, but cruel clergy, to put God into the Constitution. The M. E. Church Conference has lately passed resolutions urging Congress to speedily amend the Constitution, so that the Bible Jehovah can be put into it, and this they suggest as the most successful way of closing the mouth of the skeptic.

To put God into the Constitution would defeat and destroy the unanimous desire of the continental fathers, who framed and fashioned the wisest constitution of the freest republic on earth. Will some clergyman answer this question? Who will be benefited by putting God into the Constitution? Is it God's work and for his sake that you interest yourselves so much to put him in the Constitution? Is he such a puny, doll-dummy baby that he needs this special act of Congress to bolster him up and add a little strength to his gigantic incompetency? Can it benefit God for Congress to so amend the Constitution as to squeeze him in with his horns and bloody robes? Laying aside all jokes, we insist upon an answer, Can it benefit God for Congress to pass such an amendment? Could it benefit him? could it help him? would it make him wiser or better? It might license him to commit crime and deviltry like of old, when he enslaved and prostituted women, ravished little girls, and slaughtered innocent ones by thousands. But we press the question, If God has anything to do with this clerical trick, by what authority does he ask, in the evening of the nineteenth century, to be put into the Constitution of this grand republic? He had nothing to do with the discovery of this country, nor with the framing of our laws. The man who discovered America was imprisoned and shamefully treated by his vice-gerents and embassadors, while the noble, brave, skeptical creators of our free laws hav been slandered and libeled by his later embassadors. He got himself mixed up in the politics of Palestine about 3,500 years ago, according to the book which never lies (?). For 1,500 years, according to this book, he was kept in the Jewish Constitution. During this time he waged two hundred unjust and cruel wars, slaughtered in cold blood ten million innocent men and women, ravished little girls, prostituted wives and old mothers, established the most infamous systems of slavery on the face of the earth, robbed and plundered all the surrounding nations, and, after running his government into all the vices of the age, he run it hopelessly into debt, his son to the cross, and then left it in poverty and weakness to go to the devil. Now, for such a God, who, for ignorance, cowardice, and tyranny, has never had an equal, to attempt to crowd himself into the Constitution of a great government like ours is impudence not paralleled in history; and for the clergy to attempt to put this God into the Constitution shows either ignorance on their part or else designing cruelty. But as the Bible Jehovah is only a myth, created by man in his ignorance, and worshiped by man in his ignorance, it is not likely he has anything to do in this cunning trick of his so-called embassadors. It is evident that this entire work is the work of the churches—a scheme gotten up by the clergy to save themselves from further loss, and regain, if possible, what they hav already lost in the conflict with modern skepticism.

It is said that in olden times God visited this earth and spent no little time with his beloved and sinful children. In the summer season, when the young women wore low-necked dresses, his visits to earth were very frequent and quite lengthy. In those days he got into the Constitution of the nation, when he at once began to interfere in all little domestic quarrels and social secrets. He would frequently giv directions as to how the maid-servants should bake pie-crust and the men-servants skin calves. If he wanted to show his power or spunk he would make a river run up stream or a mountain dance a whirligig. He would sometimes amuse himself in drowning a world, burning up a city, turning a woman into salt, or filling the belly of hungry bears with the blood of little children, just because they laughed a little at a bald-headed old hermit, who wore neither hat nor wig. In these good old days God always accompanied his soldiers to battle, until the enemy appeared in view, when he would place in the front a little box, called an ark, which he claimed would do as much good as he himself (and in this we believe he was right), while he retreated to the rear, where he would hav important business. If the fight waxed very warm, he always had business in heaven. But it was a comfort and great encouragement to his followers for him to accompany them to the battle field, if it was only to hurrah and run, for the old religionists, like modern religionists, would rather hav a cowardly God than no God. But since the birth of modern skeptics, since men hav dared to think and reason for themselves, God has fled from the earth, and to-day his religious army has no leader but a mystical nobody, who hasn't any sense, who is afraid of everybody who has any sense, and he far up in the skies, at least far enough to be out of the reach of the skeptic's arguments; consequently his army has become frightened and discomforted, like any army would at the flight of the boastful general upon whom they had relied. And what is passing strange to me is that these church people should cling to God after his forsaking them, refusing to answer their prayers (because he can't), and under no circumstances showing himself as long as there is a bald-headed Ingersoll on earth. But the priests hav staked their all, and the churches hav accumulated large properties, and all this they hav done in the name of God; and now to save the property and the office of priest they seek to bolster up God (for it has been in his name they hav robbed the laboring poor for ages) by giving him either a Republican or Democratic boost, that they may continue in their ignoble and dishonorable business of worshiping and preaching a myth—one which they know by experience cannot and will not help them—one whose history is one of cruelty, cowardice, and shame. All this we are willing that they should do, nor would we legislate to prevent them from so doing (for we believe in all men worshiping and preaching what they believe is right); but when it comes to palming this God of treachery, cowardice, and filth upon thinking men and women by law (when they would rather worship the devil a thousand times over, believing him to be a thousand times better), we raise our earnest, solemn, and determined protest. We who believe in the God of Reason and no other god surely hav as good a right to do so as our orthodox neighbors hav to believe in a god of cruelty and blood; but it would be treason to all the principles of liberty for Infidels to attempt to put even such a god into the Constitution, and thus impose by law upon others that which they do not believe. But this is something that Infidels would not do, for such things are done in this country by Christians or not at all. For Congress to put this Bible God into the Constitution would virtually be Congress disfranchising every Infidel and skeptic in the land. Such infamy will not be tolerated in this country, and this the priest might as well learn now as at any other time. Such an amendment to the Constitution would raise the ire of five million American citizens, who hav tasted freedom and would rather die than submit to such an unjust imposition. Such a law would be resisted unto death by thousands of the bravest, noblest, wisest, and purest of the land. It would be the inauguration of a reign of terror more fearful than the one of old, when France was baptized in blood. The citadels of orthodoxy and the thieving centers of monopolies will go down in ashes and up in smoke, and the places where the ill-gotten gain of the Lord, like imposing wealth, are covered and furnished with costly work will be leveled, yea, more than leveled, that the poor may walk over the ruins and industry arise out of idleness.

The great work for Liberals for 1880 is to acquaint the American voters with the God the churches are trying to put into the Constitution; for no man can acquaint himself with the Bible Jehovah without loathing his very name. Let the cry be, "Down with the gods! but arise, O ye men!"

The Mirror Held up to "Dreamland."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: A correspondent in your columns, signing himself J. S. Thompson, writes to Col. Ingersoll a letter from dreamland. Mr. Ingersoll is able to answer for himself; therefore anything I may say in this letter Col. Ingersoll is in no way responsible for.

"When hope sees a star," doubt finds the star a fancy. When hope and fancy lead men to see things that are not, doubt comes to their aid with the logic of facts to show them that that which they see in fancy is not, while the reality they see not. "Listening love" can hear more than the "rustling of a wing." It can hear the fancy-trumpet sound and songs of praise to the imaginary king. When imagination runs into wild fancies then hope, love, and folly make worlds behind the verge of time and space, which their devotees call the "higher school over there."

Your correspondent does not sigh for immortal life, but, like a man of true courage, demands it upon the universal law of supply and demand. If it is right for him to demand, it is right for me to demand.

Here are my demands, and if they could be realized, all the world would go with my demands, upon the principle that "a bird in the hand is worth two in the bush:" I hav enjoyed life, youth, and beauty upon this earth. Life, youth, and beauty I know to be stern realities, not fancies. I hav tasted their joys; with your correspondent, I demand a full meal, upon the principle of universal supply and demand—life immortal upon this earth, to enjoy immortal youth ever surrounded with immortal beauty. Let fair earth become our "higher school." Then we can stop here, and not wish to go "over there."

Your correspondent says the sun is his father and the earth is his mother; the mother is in the arms of the father, and he is in the lap of his mother earth; yet he wants to leave his mother and go to his father. Why not be content, seeing that he is in the lap of his mother and in the arms of his father? Unless his father is changeable, I am afraid his lot after he has slipped from the lap of mother earth will be the same as it was before birth. He knew nothing before he came upon the lap of his mother; how can he expect to know after he has left it?

That which is eternal must hav existed from all eternity. That which comes into existence in time will go out of existence in time. To talk of life beginning to be, and existing to all eternity, is just as wise as to talk of a walking-stick with one end. That class of men who are not content with this life, will they be content with what they call the "higher" life "over there?" or will they be demanding a "higher school over there?" If the father is the same to-day, to-morrow, and to all eternity, what will they receive by any demand? Does he answer their demands to-day? then how will he answer to-morrow? The father answers no demands, no prayers. He neglects or mocks you to-day; he will do so to-morrow, and through all eternity. Whether you believe in the father or not, you must liv the life of a practical Atheist in the world, without your God father. If the father exists, then let him do his duty to the true and loving sons of earth.

He has made them, both physical and mental; he has made every quality and aptitude. He has made their physical surroundings. He has made them what they are. He alone is responsible, because he is the maker. The thing made is never responsible for the maker, but the maker for his work. Then our duty is plain—if the father exists, to tell him to do unto others as he would hav others do unto him. If he is a father, let him be as good as a father to his earthly children—giv them health instead of sickness, intelligence instead of ignorance, plenty and happiness instead of want, poverty, and misery. If he is happy, why not make his children happy? If he is intelligent, why not make his children intelligent? If he is abundantly rich, why not make his children rich? As he will never die, why let his children die?

Will your correspondent kindly look over the lap of his mother earth and see how many demands her children hav upon that father, of whom he speaks nobly but unwisely, and see those demands not answered?—look at the supplies sent but not wanted? I hav seen supplies sent and demands ignored.

When supply and demand is a universal law between earth children and the imaginary father, then your correspondent may write his rant of poetry and it answer for a logic of fact. Charles Audley.

Obscenity.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: This topic will stick in my mind so long as Bennett is in prison on that pretext. We feel inclined to turn over the pretext and look at it on every side. The rational inference would be that as the church has such holy horror of obscenity, and stretches her authority so far as to pervert all law on the subject, and to procure convictions through thick and thin, right or wrong, for the purpose to repress alleged obscenity, she (the church) is free from the moral taint.

The old artist painters, such as Raphael, Michael Angelo, Titian, etc., following their own tastes, might sometimes hav painted nude figures, but not obscene ones. It was at the instigation of ecclesiastics that on various occasions they painted on cathedral and church walls what we would call obscene pictures. It is on church and abbey walls almost exclusively that obscene pictures by the old masters occur. Most of them hav been obliterated, and quite a number hav only been whitewashed over, and could be restored at any time. This whitewashing process is very ecclesiastical. Never mind the obscenity on the walls or in the character; a little whitewash hides it all. I need scarcely again refer to thirty or forty skeleton forms of nuns at Battle Abbey that had broken their vows of chastity, and were immured in stone niches and the solid wall built over them, there to starve and stifle to death. No holy friar would break his vow or suffer if he did; a little church whitewash would purify the friar, but death to the nun. The inquiry set on foot by Henry Eighth of England into ecclesiastical doings revealed such an amount of lascivious obscenity that it was a scandal to the whole country, and so he suppressed monastic institutions.

But our modern church—the reformed, the pure, the tolerant, the enlightened—it might be argued, must not be compared with the old monastic church. This is just the comparison we wish to make. Did any one beside myself read in The Truth Seeker, not more than a year ago, the doings of Christian pastors in obscenity and crime—the names, dates, localities, and crimes by the Christian pastors for one year? The leaders and exponents of Christianity had behaved more atrociously than any other class of equal numbers in the community—murder, rape, forgery, and every imaginable crime. Any one of these charges, if false, would hav subjected Bennett to suit for slander. But the church dared not bring a suit against any one charge of the hundreds, because they were all true. Like the clergy of Henry Eighth's time, they are the most scandalously bad set of men in the whole country. And is this the stripe of men to sit in judgment on the acts of Bennett? Is the Young Men's Christian Association, with its representative, Comstock, not separated even by a little whitewash from the nude girls, nor from his smut-bag of filth, ostentatiously carried around for inspection? Is this the stripe of men to condemn Bennett for obscenity?

Not all the quibbles of law, not all the whitewash you can mix, not all the dirt the church can revel in or throw, not all the excuses possible, can hide the deformity of this outrage on American liberty, committed against the person of D. M. Bennett, the church victim of the Albany Penitentiary. F. J. Emary.

Profit.

The idea of profit controls the actions of the human family very largely. For the profit of a long and pleasant life the preservation of health is attempted. For the profit of a permanent situation in the Christian's home in glory Bible stories are read, interpreted, and wholesale condemnation of unsympathetic sinners indulged in. For profit whisky and tobacco are sold, and for supposed profit these sources of disease and delirium are used. Free trade is favored or opposed according to hope of profit. Men are honest, believing that course profitable in the long run. Lies are told, pockets are picked, banks embezzled, governments defrauded, and sermons are preached for profit. War, slander, and murder are the works of profit seekers. Benevolence givs because pleasure is experienced in giving and seeing need relieved. The Truth Seeker seeks and publishes truth that the world may profit by it.

A Prayer:

OFFERED AT THE OPENING OF THE MEETING OF THE LIBERAL LEAGUE OF NORTHERN IOWA, HELD AT SHELL ROCK, BUTLER CO., IOWA, NOV. 22, 1879.

Reposing no confidence in, and having no respect for, the gods of wood and stone set up by a designing priesthood, for the purpose of enslaving the more ignorant but far more honest masses, we worship not at such a senseless shrine. And having no confidence in any of the thirty thousand ideal gods set up by ancient mythologists for the same base purpose, we make no pilgrimage to any of their altars. Neither adore we the "golden calf" worshiped by ignorant dupes of old, although it has now grown to be a monstrous beast, with more than ten horns, owning the popular churches of all creeds and the political dynasties of all lands, trampling into the dust everywhere love, liberty, and labor; truth, justice, and humanity. We scorn its adoration. Nor hav we confidence in the imaginary creations of designing men, who hav pictured gods after their own image, and in their own likeness, for the purpose of exalting themselves and enslaving the more ignorant and honest of mankind. We hav no prayers to such imaginary creations. And regarding it as vain and foolish, we offer no prayer to the eternal and immutable principles of matter, which govern and control all atoms and worlds, and which change not at the bidding or beck of any priest or potentate, notwithstanding his professed familiarity with the gods; and which eternal principles never find it necessary to resort to crime in order to repeat themselves or perpetuate their own existence. We offer no prayer in this direction. But having great confidence in humanity, we pray you, brothers and sisters, that as your minds are divested of error and prejudice, and imbued with the principles of truth, justice, and humanity, that you stand up nobly as men and women, in defense and for the honor of those noble principles. When dark wrong and hateful oppression seek to strangle liberty and enchain the free-born mind, close up your ranks, we pray you, and let not a single heart quail. But may we all rest assured that, if we but do our duty, the right must ultimately come uppermost. May we ever "feel for those in bonds as bound with them," confident that

"He's true to good who's true to man; wherever wrong is done
To the humblest and the weakest, 'neath the all-beholding sun,
That wrong is surely done to us; and they are slaves most base,
Whose love of right is for themselves, and not for all the race."

As lovers of liberty, virtue, and truth, we pray you that you ever hold in utter detestation and abhorrence slavery and every species of oppression, from whatever source it may come. Hand in hand and shoulder to shoulder, in the cause of right, may you ever march forward, until hateful error and damning oppression are forever banished, and liberty and truth shall reign

——"Where'er the sun
Does his successive courses run."

Amen.

Taxing Church Property.

We print on the last page of this issue of THE TRUTH SEEKER a petition for the taxation of ecclesiastical property in this state. We hope the advocates of separation of church and state will cut it out, attach blank paper to it, and get as many signatures to it as possible. We hope they will work early and late, and that such an array of names will be presented to our Legislature as will compel that body to take more than a passing notice of it. When all the names that can be obtained hav been placed upon it, send it to Edgar M. Sellon, 12 So. Division street, Buffalo, N. Y. If any friends in other states want it, if they will notify us of the fact, we will change the name of the state to correspond, and print it for one week for that state.

The justness of the demands of the petition must be conceded by everyone not so thoroughly arrogant in their claims for religion that they are willing to see it propagated by any means, whether fair or foul. Church men who would use their power to exempt, at all hazards, their property from bearing its just share of the burdens of state are but very little removed from their brethren of olden times who spread their religion with sword and flame. It is very important that this work should be done now, before the Christians get their God into the Constitution. Once let that be done and church and state will snuggle together so closely in their marital bed that it will be very much harder to separate them.

In this demand the Liberals hav already on their side many of the secular press, and a very few religious sheets. The latter, however, do not advocate this from any sense of justness, but because they are afraid of their sister church, the Catholic. Once let this subject be thoroughly agitated, and we shall find a host of people and papers come to our aid. In a sermon about a year ago the rector of Christ's church, this city, gave utterance to the following, which is good so far as it goes, and shows that even in the most aristocratic churches we shall find some support:

"I would like to see all church property in this country taxed to the last dollar's worth, not merely as a matter of justice but in the interests of religion itself. The effect of anything like compulsion in the matter of religion is to engender prejudice against it. The church cannot surrender her proud position of being a kingdom not of this world without suffering for it in the blight of her spiritual life. The churches may fight this question, but sooner or later the battle will go against them, and their retreat, I fear, will be with not only dented armor but with banners soiled."

In a little tract on the subject E. Campfield has collected the utterances of several secular and one sectarian paper. The first is from The State:

"There is no justice whatever," says The State, "in taxing the humble mechanic, who has barely his little home, and whose constant struggle is to preserve it for the benefit of his family, while at the same time magnificently adorned churches extensive church property, and expensive accompaniments to ecclesiastical opulence are exempted from taxation. There is no argument in favor of taxing citizens to support a church indirectly by means of exemption from its unjust burdens which cannot be used in favor of taxing them to support a church directly by an appropriation of money."

"What if it be argued," continues the same writer, "that churches are a benefit to a community in a material as well as a spiritual sense? If we are to extend our exemption favors to enterprises which promote the prosperity of a community, and so increase the amount of taxable property, why stop at churches? Factories promote the prosperity of a community; shall we exempt them? A costly dwelling improves a neighborhood and enhances the value of property near it. Should it be exempt? The state has nothing to do with supporting religious establishments. It simply guarantees to all religious sects a right to enjoy their freedom of worship. If it be said that taxes of houses of God and prayer would be unjust, why not insist, then, that exemption shall be granted in favor of those special Christian homes which are houses of prayer and worship in the light of performing religious obligations."

The Chicago Times' remarks are a powerful argument, and should be brought to the attention of all advocates of exemption. It says:

"Church property receives precisely the same protection from the government as does the property of private individuals, and there is no good reason why the burden of taxation necessary for the support of the government should not fall equally upon church property and that of the citizen. In this country, where the establishment of a state religion is forever prohibited, each congregation can, in law, be regarded as a voluntary association of citizens, which can possess no greater rights than any other voluntary association of citizens. It is begging the question to argue that their property should be exempt from taxation because it is used to promote the public good, for the question is one of law and not of religion. The constitution which secures to every citizen liberty of conscience does not extend to the domain of religion, and recognizes no religion. It guarantees to every one full liberty to determine for himself whether the church does or does not promote the public good, and no other man or congregation of men has the right to determine that question for him. It is his right, if he chooses, to contribute to the support of a church, or he may spend his money for the dissemination of the doctrines of Atheism, Pantheism, Paganism, Infidelity, or Freethought. That is precisely the right which is guaranteed by the guarantee of liberty of conscience. It is a right which it is too late to re-argue or to attempt to limit. It was argued out and fought out long ago, and the result cannot be disturbed, nor would any thoughtful man at this day attempt to disturb it. It is a right that must be respected.

But what is left of liberty of conscience if those who believe may tax the unbelieving for the support of the churches? That is precisely what is done by the exemption of church property from taxation. To church property no less than to secular the protection of the government is extended. The expenses of the government are defrayed by taxation. When church property is exempted the whole burden falls upon other property, and by so much the taxes upon Freethinkers, rationals, and unbelievers are increased; besides the direct benefits of the use of church property are not enjoyed by the whole people. In the churches whose property interests are most valuable the sittings are private property, which the general public may no more appropriate than it may any other private property. Where the seats are not sold the use of the churches is not enjoyed by the general public, but only by the congregation; and the congregations of all the churches do not aggregate one-tenth of the population of the state. It is doubtful if they average five per cent of it. The taxes that would fall upon church property, were taxation distributed equally upon all property, are part of the expenses of maintaining the churches. With what propriety, then, can the people that use the churches ask the nine times as many people who do not use the churches to be taxed for any part of the expenses of maintaining them? The question is one of justice, which lies at the basis of every faith. Is it right, is it just, to impose a burden upon other people that belongs to the congregation themselves? and will not the atmosphere of the churches be better when they assume this burden which belongs to them, and by force of law exact nothing for the support of that faith which they teach it is the highest and most sacred duty to maintain."

"Church structures for all taxable purposes are absolutely dead capital to the state. The corporations owning them enjoy the protection of the law, and the cost is levied on other property by an increased rate of taxation beyond what would be necessary if these structures were taxed in common with other property.

. . . . Exemption in its practical effect is indirect appropriation. It compels taxpayers to contribute towards the support of religious organizations, and this is contrary to the general principles on which our political institutions are based."

The Trinity corporation of this city owns $15,000,000 of property, of which $9,000,000 pays no taxes. This church is usually credited with having fifty or more millions, but it is incorrect. In making a careful estimate, taken from official records, The New York Times found that the sum we hav given is the right one. They pay taxes on $6,000,000 of real estate, much of which, in the lower part of the town, is occupied byrum-sellers and brothel-keepers. In view of this fact, the favorite argument of exempters—that church property is used for moral purposes—falls to the ground. Trustees of church property do not care to what uses their property is put so long as it brings in the money. And it would be difficult to convince some unregenerate people that those structures which are used for ministers to preach in contribute in any tangible way to the furtherance of public or private morality.

The Catholic church under this system of exemption, and by having its members voted into authority by the overwhelming Catholic majority of this city, has reaped a rich reward. Within the last eleven years there has been donated to it $5,827,471.19, an average of $529,770.10 each year. Prior to 1870 there was a law of the state imposing a perpetual tax of $250,000 a year upon this city for the support of parochial schools. In 1869, under the Tweed ring, nearly $800,000 was donated to different Catholic institutions. The Protestants received smaller sums, just how much is not known, but probably not far from $200,000, making a total of $1,000,000 robbed from the taxpayers to go into church coffers. As only about one in five of the population attends church it is easy to see what gross injustice was done the non-attendants, many of whom are not believers in either sect. Most of the Germans of this city care nothing whatever for religion, and they are robbed every year by our officials to support the churches. The block on which is built the grandest cathedral of this country was given the church by the city, together with nearly $33,000 in money. This land, without the building, is worth about a million and a half of dollars. For one dollar a year the city leased, by two leases of ninety-nine years, two blocks in this city worth another half million. This is a practical gift. By a similar process of chicanery another block worth $200,000 was given to the church. A $300,000 block was leased for $1 per year, making a total of $3,500,000 worth of land given by the Catholic officials of the city to the church. The Protestants would dip in as heavy if they should get the chance. In this state there are about $110,000,000 worth of church property which is policed by the municipalities and protected by the state, and which never pays a dollar into the treasury. This imposes, to supply the deficiency caused by its exemption, and to guard it, a burden of several millions upon other property. This is paid mostly by other real estate, and the owners, to make themselves even, add to the rents, and it comes at last out of the pockets of the poor.

Many Protestants, to strike at their arch-enemy the Catholic church, would pay their own taxes, and it may be necessary to turn the guns of the two sects upon each other before the Liberals get justice done them. One can be played off against the other in this fight. Each is so jealous of the other that it would be willing to put its hands in its own pockets to compel the other to disgorge a little.

The work of placing church property upon an equality with secular property is emphatically one for Liberals to do, and we hope it will not be allowed to languish. Every successive legislature should be petitioned until this end is accomplished. Legislators should be labored with and every means used to bring about a measure not only just but, if allowed to be perpetuated, fraught with the gravest consequences to our country.

Is the Bible Fit to Be in Our Public Schools?

This question is coming up all over the country. Upon it the Catholic and Protestant sects are constantly at war. Protestantism demands that it shall be read and taught, while Catholicism excludes it. But it is not because of any love of fairness that the latter is opposed to it. It is because the church is opposed to the layman knowing anything whatever about the book except as they learn of it through the priests. In medieval times the Bible was chained to the altar and opened only by the priests. With the introduction of printing, copies so multiplied that it was impossible to keep it from the people, but the Catholic church has a special version. Luther's fight with the pope was on the individual's right to private judgment—that is, to read and judge for himself whether the Catholic church was established by God. He contended it was not, and for that he was denounced by the church from which he seceded. But Luther's right of private judgment was but another name for persecution. People were to hav the right to read the Bible but not to disbelieve it if, after reading, they came to the conclusion that it was false.

In Massachusetts the school war is being fiercely waged. Bishop McCloskey has issued a decree in his diocese forbidding Catholic parents, "under pain of refusal of absolution in the sacrament and penance" from sending their children to public schools when there is a parochial school in the town. In Connecticut the fight is of several years standing, and it has been carried into politics. The question is fast being brought up for discussion all over the country. We welcome it, for we feel assured that the more widely the Bible is read, the better it is known, the more familiar the people are with its contents, the more unwilling they will be to hav the unformed minds of children warped and twisted by its teachings. The scholar is told that the Bible is infallible, but when that tells him that the earth has "corners" and the teacher tells him it is round he sees that there is something out of the way. Either the teacher and the text-books are wrong or the Bible is not infallible. When he calls the attention of the older people to this he is met with, "Hush! it is wrong to doubt. You must read your Bible and ask no questions." Such answers confuse him, and soon develops within him the first seed of hypocrisy. The truth, as near as it can be arrived at, should be taught; and to allow the pupil to fill his mind with fables which he must unlearn when older, or else strain his mind or bury it altogether, we believe is almost criminal. By the Bible he is taught the horrible doctrine that he is totally depraved, that God made him so, that he could hav made him different if he chose, but as he did not he is a vile wretch unworthy of anything good, and it is only by a great stretch of his mercy that he is allowed to liv. But at the last moment, if he repent and believe he can get to heaven. Such teaching is a direct premium on a life of crime. His wicked heart, given him by God, is responsible for the commission of all his bad acts, and as a few minutes devoted strictly to repentance at the last moment will float him into paradise with a pair of wings, he puts off reforming till the within five minutes of train time, then grabs his carpet-bag and rushes on board. The black cap is always drawn over the face of a Christian of a few days.

The Bible is the inspiration of bigotry; the consolation of the murderer; the reference book of intolerance; the source of superstition; the fountain from which flows narrowness, jealousy, and sectarian wrangles.

It should be indicted as particeps criminis in the wars of the church; as accessory before the fact in the midnight assassination of Freethought.

We do not believe that any one can gain the truth by studying a falsehood, or become virtuous through reading an obscene book. Ingorance, though gowned and spectacled, can never instruct.

Schools supported by the people should be for the people and not for a part. If we send a load of wheat to be ground into flour and the miller sends us back a bagful of plaster of paris we should find fault with the mill. We would hate to be taxed to support the miller. Yet if an Infidel sends his child to school he never can tell but what some theological thief will steal its reason, and in the place of an unclouded intellect send it back fettered with the fear of hell. A friend of ours has a little four-year-old that until the other day never heard of hell. At that time a minister came in, and taking the little one upon his knee told her how God hated goodness without religion, pictured to her the glowing hell into which she would be cast unless she loved God, described the devil and the darkness in which he dwelt, told her about the "spooks" which caught all bad little girls, and wound up by asking her if she was not afraid of being caught some dark night by the devil. Her father had been busy doing something and did not pay attention to what the minister was saying till he heard the little one begin to cry; and then he commenced to preach. His sermon was so eloquent that the minister left his house. That night the little girl was afraid to go to bed. She was afraid of the devil, of the glowing hell, the inky darkness she had heard about.

Can any one devise a crueler scheme, a more perfidious religion, a baser church, than that which frightens innocence by peopling the darkness with leering devils and the light with ghosts. It is infamous, and yet every child in our public schools must read and feel the influence of this book which drives the laughter from the lips and pales the cheek with the coward's fear.

Before the Bible can ever become a fit book to be read it must be demonstrated that it is the truth.

Its teachings on the formation of the world must be eliminated. To say that God created it by a word is unsatisfactory to the child, for even a child's reason will question the manifestly impossible. Who created God? comes as naturally to its lips as the question what he made it from. The child who has seen the wriggling snake trying to crawl under a stone by the roadside as he came to school has hard work to understand how it ever talked; and it will take all the authority of infallibility to make him believe that the forefather of the donkey cropping the thistles in the field ever preached a sermon to a man. It is cruel to make him say he believes this or go to hell. That 175,000 birds, from the humming-bird to the vulture; 3,600 animals, from a mouse to a mammoth; 1,300 reptiles, and about 2,000,000 insects, were crowded into a box 550 feet long, 92 feet wide, and 55 feet high, with provisions enough to last over a year, and that they lived with only what air they could get from a little hole twenty-five inches square on the top, is very hard for the most youthful mind to understand. To be compelled to do this or go to hell seems to us as very cruel.

Although it has been revised a great many times, yet the Bible has page after page of filth which is certainly not calculated to do young minds any good. It is the corner-stone on which is built the debasing institution of polygamy. If Freelovers took any stock in arguments quoted from divinity, they could draw authority from its pages for their views. It givs licentious priests a chance to retort upon their accusers: "If it was right for God's favorites to hav mistresses, it is right for us." The handmaidens of old were their masters' concubines. It indorses slavery, promiscuity, deceit, and hypocrisy.

No book which teaches such things is fit for children to read. It is at war with every text-book that they study. It was written when knowledge was from 1,500 to 3,000 years younger than now. It teaches a resurrection of the body—an arm from the Indies, a leg from the ocean, all to come together at the sound of a trumpet. That is hard for the children to understand, yet they must believe it or burn. It tells of making a man of dirt, a woman from a rib; and yet every child must feel in its heart as it kisses the loving woman who born it that it is a lie. Their astronomy teaches them that the earth moves round the sun, yet they read in the word that flowed from the pen of God that the sun stood still. They know that water always seeks its level, but they will burn unless they believe the Red Sea once piled up straight like the side of their father's barn. Their philosophy tells them a man cannot liv without air, but they are lost forever if they doubt that a man lived three days under water in the belly of a whale.

If it is wrong to teach a falsehood, those who force a book filled with errors upon children unable to help themselves, and to obscure their minds with smoky clouds from the fires of hell, what a sin hav the wrangling Christian sects to answer for! The Bible is crammed full of utterly incomprehensible mysteries, and yet it must be believed. It cannot be expected that what furnishes innumerable points of controversy for learned theologians will be simple to school children, and the only object of sectarian school boards in placing the Bible in public schools can be to make converts to Christianity by bending the twig that the tree may grow up leaning toward the orthodox vineyard, so that the fruit can drop into their wide-open mouths. In their eyes the end is so important that it justifies any means, however unconstitutional and unfair.

The Great Disgruntled.

Mr. Abbot is again in a minority of one—a position he is eminently qualified to fill. The Free Religious Association, with Prof. Adler at its head, recently took a new hold of life and endeavored to become more than a paper organization meeting once a year. It deservedly went off with great eclat, but now the cultured editor withdraws his support. The circular of the society contains a clause urging the organization of local societies, and instructing the agent to furnish such information to the local societies as he could to aid them. Abbot thought if this was done it should be on his own responsibility. But the executive committee voted otherwise; and now the Great Disgruntled's nose is again out of joint, and he formally recalls the excessively great weight of his highly cultured name. He seems to hav a faculty of finding fault. Like the sniveling schoolboy, if he can not hav his own way he will not play any more. In this case he is afraid some of the local societies would be filled with those who were not "pure" according to his standard, and so he sticks his index finger out to warn the society in time. He is an obstacle to any organization, and the Free Religious Association ought to be glad he left them so early.

MR. ASA K. BUTTS, the publisher, has left with us one of his bound volumes of Scientific Man Supplements. It contains many valuable lectures by scientific men on scientific subjects, some of them illustrated. There are four lectures on Elementary Chemistry, one on the Coal Strata, one on Crystalline and Molecular Forces, Spectrum Analysis, the Ice Age in Britain, Elementary Physiology, Progress of Sanitary Science, Food, The Migration of Birds, Barbarism of Civilization, and other subjects which it would take too much space to mention in detail. It is well worth the $1.50 asked for it. We will send it for that sum.

Paine Festival.

We hav received the following card from the secretary of the Liberal League of Northern Iowa. Although time and distance prevent our accepting the invitation, we wish all those who attend a happy time and a due appreciation of the worth of the man whose birthday they celebrate:

DEAR FRIEND: A few years ago we celebrated the birthday of Thomas Paine. Over four hundred ladies and gentlemen attended. At a meeting of the Liberal League of Northern Iowa, held Sunday, 362, 104, it was resolved to again celebrate the day, January 29, 1880, at the Opera House in Waverly, commencing at 7 o'clock sharp. Come all who respect the memory of the secretary of the Congress which declared America free; the compatriot of Franklin, Jefferson, and other Freethinkers; the author of "Common Sense," "Rights of Man," and the "Age of Reason;" the philanthropist who gave his salary and his private fortune to Washington's army; whom a grateful Congress of the Republic and a grateful legislature of New York and Pennsylvania after the Revolution repaid with high encomiums; the man whom Burke, in the interest of kings and priests, reviled and persecuted; whom Lord Erskine defended; the man whom France honored by a simultaneous election from three communes to a seat in her National Assembly, where he always voted for liberty and justice and against bloodshed; where his vote against the death of Louis XVI. nearly cost him his life at the hands of Robespierre, and was saved only by an accident; who was brought home by a man-of-war sent by President Jefferson; who has been the worst slandered man of modern days, because he dared to utter the words: "The world is my country; to do good is my religion;" "There can be but little liberty on earth while men worship a tyrant in heaven;" "I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life."

Good speaking at 7 o'clock, after which a banquet made up from contributions brought by the friends, to be delivered as early as 6 P.M., at the Opera House. The best of music, both vocal and instrumental. After the banquet a grand dance, with a dance supper. Tickets to the dance 50 cents. Dance supper 50 cents per couple. Admission to the hall free. Invite other friends.

M. FARRINGTON, President L. L.
M. E. BILLINGS, Secretary.

THERE will be a celebration of the birthday of Thomas Paine at Lowell, Mich., on the 29th, at Train's Hall. Hon. J. M. Mathewson will be president of the occasion. Speakers, J. H. Burnham, Mrs. L. A. Pearsall, M. Babcock, the witty writer who has been bothering the school board of St. Johns through these columns. The speaking will commence at 2 and 7 P. M. sharp, as the card informs us. The celebration will close with a social dance, commencing at 9 o'clock, the tickets to which are 50 cents. Supper 75 cents. The managing committee consists of J. C. Train, E. A. Chapman, Dr. Malcolm, Dr. Amos Chase, Dr. Wm. Hicks, John Butler, Richard Cowles, Asa Tyler, S. L. Shaw, George Wood. Everybody is invited, and of course everybody will go.

THE following is the order of business and pleasure to be observed at Paine Hall, Boston, on the occasion of the 143d anniversary of the birth of the Author-Hero: Hon. Elizur Wright is chairman. At 10.30 A. M., business meeting of the Paine Memorial Corporation. At 2.30 P. M., the exercises will commence with a patriotic address by Hon. Elizur Wright, followed by Horace Seaver, Esq., and other speakers prominent in the ranks of Liberalism. Music by a quartette engaged for the occasion. Selections from the works of the great author, by Mr. F. L. Union. At 7.30 P. M., conference meeting in Investigator Hall. At 8 o'clock P. M., dancing to begin in Paine Hall, and continue until 1 o'clock, A. M. Ticket admitting gentleman and lady to hall, 75 cents; extra lady, 25 cents. Music: National Band. E. W. Masters, prompter. Regarding the celebration our friend the Investigator remarks: "As this meeting will be one of much importance to the cause in which every Liberal is interested, it is to be hoped there will be a general attendance of all who can be with us. Friends from a distance will find hotel accommodations in the vicinity of the The Temple of Freedom—Paine Memorial Building. Come, then, one and all, our motto being, 'To speak his thoughts is every freeman's right.' Let us hear from and see present, on that occasion, a larger crowd of persons than ever assembled yet in any place to do honor to the memory of the Author-Hero of the American Revolution."

WE are now advertising among our most recent works a little brochure of seventy-seven pages by Mr. Courtlandt Palmer, entitled "The Cause of Humanity; or, the Rising and the Waning Faith." It is written from the standpoint of the Positive Philosophy and in defense of the Religion of Humanity. It was read before the Manhattan Liberal Club of this city, and the commendation it there received, together with a general request for its publication, induced Mr. Palmer to put it into print. It is an amplification of the articles Mr. Palmer has lately contributed to our columns. Mr. Palmer informs us that before finally deciding to reduce it to pamphlet form he submitted it to such masters of style as Dr. John W. Draper and James Parton, both of whom bestowed high praise upon its composition, the former only criticising it as very radical in sentiment and not in all respects representing his views. We can heartily commend the little work as embodying in a condensed and attractive shape the leading points of the Religion of Humanity. It is for sale at this office at the low price of twenty-five cents. All the proceeds are contributed by Mr. Palmer to the Society of Humanity, of which he is president.

FOR the past week Col. Ingersoll has been speaking to immense audiences in the various cities and large towns of western New York. His popularity as a public speaker is constantly growing, and he is admitted by all to be the orator of this country.

A Misplaced Switch.

In the Index of December 4th, we published at length the circular of the Free Religious Association, asking for financial aid in the extension of their work, and sketching the outlines of a practical plan of work to be carried out, if sufficient aid should be given. This plan we cordially approved in our comments at the time, and we seconded it with an earnest "personal appeal" to "all our readers and friends." This approval and personal appeal of ours were grounded wholly on the supposition that the plan adopted did not include or intend, on the part of the Association as such, any direct encouragement of local organization. We said explicitly: "If we believed that the Association would ever enter upon the work of organizing local societies without clearly foreseeing and adequately providing against the grave perils which experience has shown to be inseparable from that work, we could not favor the present plan at all."

It is with extreme regret that we now feel constrained by a sense of duty to recall the approval we gave to this plan and the appeal we made in its support. A difference of opinion has arisen as to the meaning of that clause of the circular which makes it part of the duty of the proposed General Agent "to furnish, as occasion may offer, information and suggestion to persons anywhere desiring to form local societies on the general basis of this Association." We originally understood this clause as meaning that the General Agent is to furnish such "information and suggestion" on his individual responsibility alone. The Executive Committee hav unanimously voted not to adopt this understanding of the clause in question; and the only possible alternative is that the Executive Committee, and therefore the Association as such, will hold themselves responsible for whatever "information and suggestion" the General Agent may offer.

Though obliged once more to stand in a minority, and this time in a minority of one, we all the more earnestly bear testimony to the spotless purity of their intentions in this very matter. It is perhaps to their credit—it is certainly to their happiness—not to hav become aware that there are two kinds of Liberalism struggling for the mastery at this time, the one striking hands with all that is foulest and most devilish in society, the other seeking to make society purer and nobler, sweeter and happier, than Christianity has ever yet made it. They hav not become aware that the demoralizing tendency has got to be sternly recognized and sternly met before the better tendency can prevail. They will find this out soon enough if they ever get far enough into the work of organization; and we shall still continue to hope for the best, though we cannot now co-operate with them. The difference of opinion as to practical measures has wrought no alienation of spirit or diminution of personal friendship; and that fact is sufficient consolation for the necessity of walking henceforth our separate path alone. Time will show where wisdom lies in the special point at issue; but it will be no fault of ours if there is ever any letting-go of hands in the common cause of truth, righteousness, and love.

Liberal News Items.

THERE are many earnest Freethinkers in Quincy, Illinois, and I am pleased to learn that Bro. J. M. Frost of that city is making an effort to organize them into a Liberal League. I hope every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER who resides in Quincy will aid him in the good work.

MR. H. A. DEAL, our committee man for New Hampshire, is about to commence an earnest campaign in favor of the Liberal League movement in that state, and he requests me to ask every Liberal of New Hampshire to come to his aid. Are there not at least ten towns in the state where, with a little labor, a Liberal League can be formed?

FOR some time I hav been expecting to see a Liberal League organized in the city of Detroit that would make itself felt for good throughout the whole state of Michigan, and I hav just learned that one of the most distinguished Liberals of the West, S. R. McCracken, of the abovenamed city, is moving to perfect such an organization. Every Liberal of Detroit should unite in the movement and make it a grand success.

THE Hon. A. B. Bradford, of Enon Valley, Pa., at the recent reunion convention of the old Abolitionists, delivered an address, which has been published by the request of those who heard it. It is an admirable Liberal campaign document, and every Freethinker should send ten cents or more to Mr. Bradford and get a number of this tract for circulation.

ON Wednesday evening last, at the close of a lecture in Cleveland, O., Col. Ingersoll, for the first time, condescended to pay his respects to that orthodox fraud, Joe Cook. And the little time devoted to that purpose was amply sufficient for the Colonel to entirely squelch the pretentious nincompoop. When the Colonel declared that the officials in charge of the insane asylum in which Cook was once an inmate committed a great blunder in allowing him to go at large before his mental hallucinations had disappeared, the vast audience shook the building with their deafening and long-continued applause. Col. Ingersoll is just the man to demolish with his eloquent and cutting sarcasm such an ass as Cook. Ingersoll is one of those "cancer planters" that I should advise Cook to avoid as much as possible. He will plant a "cancer" in his insane "scientific Christian philosophy" that will eat it up in a short space of time.

Comstock's Boot on the Wrong Foot.

We hav heretofore referred to some of the prosecutions instituted by Anthony Comstock, and endeavored to point out the acts of injustice he has committed in the name of virtue and purity. And now that the public may understand how partially Comstock's laws are executed, we propose to throw some light upon a prosecution under these laws that was not instituted by Anthony Comstock, and which consequently died a violent death before it had a real beginning.

When Anthony Comstock was a salesman in a wholesale dry goods house in this city, a large proportion of his customers came from the South and West. Comstock naturally exerted his energies to entertain these Southern and Western gentlemen upon their visits here, and in a manner decidedly pleasing to them, and not at all objectionable to him. The experience he then and thus acquired gave him a wide range of technical knowledge in the field of vile literature, and served him well when he afterward embarked in the business to which his faculties hav been devoted since his disagreeable disposition made Cochran & McLean's establishment too warm to hold him.

Upon his involuntary retirement from the employment of this firm he worked upon certain human material which he found in the Young Men's Christian Association until he had organized what he called the Society for the Suppression of Vice. By the influence of this society, and upon the exhibition to members of Congress of a quantity of the vilest pictures and books that ever saw the light, Comstock procured the enactment of those Federal laws which now promise to do more harm than their execution could hav done good had it been confined to the suppression of the class of books and pictures that Comstock exhibited.

In the course of time Mr. Samuel Colgate, a manufacturer of soap, became the president of Comstock's society, and was only less zealous in the aggressive measures of the society than Comstock himself. Colgate was industrious in his efforts to hav D. M. Bennett indicted for writing an "Open Letter to Jesus Christ;" and when Bennett was finally tried for mailing a pamphlet that thousands of competent judges had asserted was not obscene, Colgate had the brazen effrontery, for it was nothing else, as our readers will agree when they hav learned all the facts, to sit through the trial surrounded by the lecherous-minded Comstock, the fat and greasy but otherwise Stiggins-like Joe Cook, and similar specimens of piety, with whom he exchanged pious greetings, and from whom he gratefully acknowledged expressions of hope that he would succeed in convicting the Infidel.

Before Bennett's trial, circulars in reference to the virtues of vaseline had been issued from the establishment of Colgate, who was agent for that article, in which it was stated in language too indelicate for us to publish, that vaseline charged with four or five grains of a certain acid, named in the circular, would prevent conception.

To fully understand the bearing of this circular upon our subject, it will be necessary to read the following section of Comstock's law found in the United States Revised Statutes § 3,893:

> No obscene . . . book, pamphlet, picture, . . . . . or any article or thing designed or intended for the prevention of conception, . . . nor any written or printed card, circular, book, pamphlet, advertisement, or notice of any kind giving information, directly or indirectly, where or how or of whom or by what means, either of the things before mentioned may be obtained or made . . . shall be carried in the mail, and any person who shall knowingly deposit, or cause to be deposited, for mailing or delivery, any of the hereinbefore mentioned articles or things, or any notice or paper containing any advertisement relating to any of the aforesaid articles or things . . . shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and shall, for every offense, be fined not less than $100 nor more than $5,000, or imprisoned at hard labor not less than one year nor more than ten years or both.

Soon after these circulars were issued, one of them came into the possession of a Dr. Selden, whom Comstock had endeavored, by decoy letters, to inveigle into a violation of his laws. Selden called upon Assistant District Attorney Fiero, and, showing him the circular, said he proposed to mail others like it, and wished Mr. Fiero's opinion. Fiero examined the circular and promptly informed Dr. Selden that it was clearly in violation of the law, and he would prosecute any one who mailed it. "Well," said Selden, "that circular is being mailed by Samuel Colgate, the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice." This reply was a poser to Fiero. He heard that his superior, Woodford, was a member of Colgate's society, and that it would not do therefore to prosecute Colgate; and yet he had committed himself to the position that Colgate was a lawbreaker, no better than the worst of Comstock's victims. He evaded all responsibility, however, by referring Selden to Woodford.

About this time a gentleman named Henry J. Thomas, adopting Comstock's methods for the occasion, addressed a decoy letter to Samuel Colgate, 55 John street, New York city, in which he requested Colgate to send him one of his circulars describing the virtues of vaseline. By due course of mail Mr. Thomas received a sealed envelope, upon which was Colgate's imprint, and in which was one of the circulars containing the prescription already quoted.

Here was a perfect case under Benedict's rulings. The circular is clearly in violation of the law, and was conceded to be by Mr. Fiero; and Benedict had ruled over and over again that where Comstock had mailed a letter requesting a pamphlet, book, circular, or picture, and in due course of mail had received what he asked for, the evidence was sufficient to convict the man to whom he mailed his decoy letter.

This ruling was made by Benedict in the case of Charles Mackey, who was thereupon convicted of mailing a circular list of improper books and sentenced to one year's imprisonment; also in the case of James Sullivan, who was sentenced to a year's imprisonment; also in that of Leander Fox, sentenced to imprisonment for a year; also in the case of William Simpson, sentenced to ten years' imprisonment; also in the case of Kendall, who underwent six months' imprisonment, and the same ruling was made in several other cases, the names of which are not now before us.

With this proof in his possession, Mr. Thomas went before Commissioner Betts who prepared and had him verify the necessary affidavit. Mr. Betts then, in obedience to the illegal rule of the court, submitted the papers to Mr. Fiero for permission to proceed. Mr. Fiero referred him to District Attorney Woodford, and for three months they were completely buried. Mr. Thomas made every effort to forward the prosecution, but Mr. Betts could not proceed without the district attorney's permission. Fiero would not unless directed by his superior, and Woodford positively refused to see Mr. Thomas at all. It was evidently Woodford's intention to smother the whole matter. But Thomas was not to be so trifled with, and finally he demanded of Betts that positive action be taken. Betts also insisted upon a definite reply from Woodford, and thus cornered, Woodford appeared personally before Betts and peremptorily ordered that no warrant issue. Mr. Thomas then demanded a return of the proof he had accumulated against Colgate, and Woodford refused it, saying, "You might use it to make scandal, and it is better that it be destroyed." "Well," replied Thomas, "if I ever do use it to make scandal, Governor, I will make it more scandalous for you if you destroy those papers." Woodford remained obdurate for some time, but finally yielded, and Mr. Thomas now has in his possession the same evidence against Samuel Colgate that in at least a dozen other cases was held sufficient by Benedict to send men to the penitentiary.

It has since appeared that Woodford, upon receiving Thomas' affidavit, sent for Colgate, who explained that he had mailed the circular, but was ignorant that it contained the objectionable prescription. It is difficult to believe that so brief a circular could hav contained so pointed a paragraph, and Colgate, for whose benefit and at whose order it was printed and mailed, be ignorant of that portion of its contents. But whether he was really ignorant or not is immaterial; that was a question that should hav been submitted to a jury. Had he been indicted he would hav had some opportunity to defend, because he could hav testified to his ignorance; but in all Comstock's cases no opportunity to so explain was given. Charles Mackey, James Sullivan, Leander Fox, and William Simpson were not allowed to testify, and whether they knew the contents of the books and circulars they were charged with mailing has never been known. The mere fact that in response to a decoy letter sent by Comstock, addressed to these parties respectively, Comstock received books containing objectionable paragraphs, was held sufficient to convict, and they were consigned to the penitentiary.

We do not mean to censure Mr. Colgate; we do not mean to charge that he was morally guilty of any crime; we do not mean to say that he ought in conscience to hav been criminally punished; but we assert that legally he was as guilty as any of the men we hav mentioned who hav been sentenced to imprisonment by Benedict.

When Comstock prosecuted Dr. E. B. Foote, it was proved by the defense that the circular named in the indictment was mailed by a clerk, upon his own responsibility, without Foote's order or knowledge; but Benedict charged that even so Foote was responsible, and a fine of $3,500 was imposed and paid. Upon the authority of this case Colgate could not hav escaped the charge of responsibility for mailing the circular. The proof upon this point, according to Benedict's law, was perfect, no matter whether Colgate had a personal knowledge or not.

And when D. M. Bennett was tried for mailing a pamphlet, Benedict refused to permit him to testify whether he knew is was obscene. Had this ruling been adopted in a prosecution of Colgate, the latter would hav been shut off from any explanation such as he made to Woodford, and a conviction would certainly hav resulted.

Therefore, in view of the adjudications by Benedict, in whose court Colgate would hav been tried, and where he could not hav escaped conviction, whether innocent or guilty, had the rulings that were applied to others been applied to him, we charge Stewart L. Woodford with gross dereliction of duty, prompted by corrupt friendliness to a person charged with crime. Woodford's term, however, will expire before the statute of limitations has run out in favor of Colgate, and we shall then see whether a less partial prosecuting officer will perform his duty toward the President of the Society for the Suppression of Vice.

Should such an officer succeed Woodford, Judge Benedict will hav an opportunity to promulgate his cruel rulings in the case of his friend Colgate, as he has heretofore applied them to the victims of his own and Colgate's fanaticism.

THE ancient Peruvians were but imperfectly acquainted with the first principles of architecture. While they put together their bulky masses of porphyry and granite with the nicest art, they were incapable of mortising their timbers, and in their ignorance of iron, knew no better way of holding the beams together than tying them with thongs of maguey. A building thatchet with straw, and windowless, glowed with tapestries of gold and silver.—Prescott.

Bogus Christianity.

CONDENSED HISTORY OF THE NORTH AMERICAN INDIANS.

White man landing on the American continent remarks:

Fine country this. B'long to anybody?

Conscientious White.—Well, there's Indians on it.

W. M.—Oh! they're only on it; they can't own it; they've no possessory rights.

Con. W. M.—Why?

W. M.—Why? What a question. 'Cos they're not civilized; don't know how to read or write; no school-houses nor churches.

Con. W. M.—But don't you remember the admonition, "Thou shalt not covet! thou shalt not steal!"

W. M.—Nonsense! Doesn't apply in this case at all. The commandments only take effect on educated and Christian people, who build churches. Gosh! You'll talk next about skunks having possessory rights. However, to satisfy your scruples, we'll buy this country from the Indian.

CHAPTER II.

The bargain with the Indian for his lands. Time, 1700.

Parties,—Deuteronomy Sharp and the drunken chief, Rum-tum-to-tum.

Deuteronomy Sharp, reading.—"And in consideration of one pint of New England rum and a jack-knife, I, Rum-tum-to-tum, Great Chief of all the Rum-tum-to-tums, do hereby convey, remise, release, sell, etc., and cease all further claim on a certain strip of territory known as North America, extending from a certain point up the coast as far as the coast extends, to a certain point down the coast as far as the coast extends, and as far north as it extends north, and as far south as the land extends south, and ditto east and west, and as far back as the land may go."

Deut.—There, Rum-tum-to-tum, put your totem down there.

Rum-tum, etc.—Gimme rum! Me lub rum!

Deut.—No, Rum-tum, etc.; you must sign first; business is business, you know.

(Rum-tum, etc., makes his mark.)

Deut. (fervently.)—He hath delivered the land of the heathen unto us to possess with our wives and children forever.

CETEWAYO'S SENTIMENTS.

I like your guns, said Cetewayo. I think if we could make such good guns as yours we could also soon make as good a Bible.

Missionary.—As good a Bible?

Cetewayo.—Yes. You see your Bible is elastic; it stretches so as to cover almost any thing you want to do. For instance: you want my land; you look into your Bible; you finds it commands you to go abroad and preach the gospel to every creature; if the creatures won't hear you, you make them hear you with your guns; you take their lands; then, of course, they must hear your gospel; you hav the pleasure of converting them and getting their land besides. That is a good Bible. I wish I had such good guns. I would hav such a Bible also.

Missionary.—Would you like to visit England, King?

Cetewayo.—Can you roast me a whole ox daily?

Missionary.—Well, King, the fact is we havn't got quite enough beef for our own people; still—

Cetewayo.—Why do you keep so many more people than you can feed well? why don't you kill the runts when they are first born?

Missionary.—King, that is murder.

Cetewayo.—So is slow starvation. I hav heard that many of your people don't get enough to eat.

Missionary.—But, King, the commandment says—

Cetewayo.—Yes, yes; it says thou shalt not covet thy neighbor's ox, nor his ass, nor his lands. Thou shalt not steal. Thou art the man. Thou—

Missionary.—Hold on, King.

Cetewayo.—I see you don't like having your guns turned on you; then you know how well they shoot, don't you?

Missionary.—But, King, you don't realize all the blessings of civilization. Why, it givs us—

Cetewayo.—Taxes. Does your civilization giv every man a house and lot?

Missionary.—Well, no.

Cetewayo.—And three square meals a day?

Missionary.—Well—

Cetewayo.—And pure air like ours in your six-story tenement pigeon holes?

Missionary.—Well—

Cetewayo.—Does it teach you to stay at home, mind your business, and not molest your neighbors?

Missionary.—Well— But, King, civilization has done one thing for us. We never hav but one wife.

Cetewayo.—What! never!

Missionary.—Well, har— But, King, we don't keep harems in—

Cetewayo.—Public? Methinks it has come to my ears that the son of your queen— But he's a jolly good fellow; were he but here I would make him a second Solomon in wives and wisdom. But I want my fourteen wives for company. Is your one wife always company for you?

Missionary.—Oh, certainly.

Cetewayo.—Do you always stay at home evenings? never go to the club, or the lodge, or hav sudden business just after supper, eh?

Missionary.—Well—

Cetewayo.—Well, it seems to be all well with you. No, I don't like your civilization. It talks nicely on paper and in the pulpit. No! The only man of your blood I like is Dunn—John Dunn. You hav done well in making him chief of that fine district. He has made a law that no missionaries shall go there. John has done well.

Missionary.—Verily, the King's heart is hardened.

The Athanasian Creed.

While every English churchman is as familiar with the Athanasian creed as with the Ten Commandments, but few native Americans of the Protestant faith know it at all except by name. The American Protestant Episcopal church wisely eliminated this from their prayer-book; but it still remains in the English prayer-book, notwithstanding some recent attempts to expunge it; and on certain specified days, amounting to fourteen every year, it has to be "sung or said at Morning Prayer instead of the Apostles' Creed."

We herewith reproduce it for the edification of Freethinkers. And we will add that considerable amusement can be made of it in this way: Let a good reader, a lecturer for instance, act as parson, and another good reader as clerk. If the first one will extemporize a surplice of cheap white muslin all the better. Let him and the clerk read the creed responsively—the parson doing it slowly and solemnly, with voice pitched in a low key, the clerk repeating the responses in a high key, and as rapidly as possible by way of contrast. The parson should of course stand on a platform with a desk before him, and the clerk should face the audience on a level below. This was done once in Washington, and afforded great amusement. W. H. B.

THE CREED.

Whosoever shall be saved: before all things it is necessary that he hold the Catholick Faith.

Which faith except every one do keep whole and undefiled: without doubt he shall perish everlastingly.

And the Catholick Faith is this: That we worship one God in Trinity, and Trinity in Unity;

Neither confounding the Persons; nor dividing the substance.

For there is one Person of the Father, one of the Son: and another of the Holy Ghost.

But the Godhead of the Father, of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost is all one: the Glory equal, the Majesty co-eternal.

Such as the Father is, such is the Son: and such is the Holy Ghost.

The Father uncreate, the Son uncreate: and the Holy Ghost uncreate.

The Father incomprehensible, the Son incomprehensible: and the Ho'y Ghost incomprehensible.

The Father eternal, the Son eternal: and the Holy Ghost eternal.

And yet there are not three eternals: but one eternal.

As also there are not three incomprehensibles, nor three uncreated: but one uncreated, and one incomprehensible.

So likewise the Father is Almighty, the Son Almighty, and the Holy Ghost Almighty;

And yet there are not three Almighties; but one Almighty.

So the Father is God, the Son is God: and the Holy Ghost is God;

And yet there are not three Gods: but one God.

So likewise the Father is Lord, the Son Lord; and the Holy Ghost Lo.d;

And yet there are not three Lords; but one Lord.

For likewise as we are compelled by the Christian verity: to acknowledge every Person by himself to be God and Lord;

So are we forbidden by the Catholick Religion; to say, There be three Gods, or three Lords.

The Father is made of none: neither created, nor begotten.

The Son is of the Father alone: not made, nor created, but begotten.

The Holy Ghost is of the Father, and of the Son; neither made, nor created, nor begotten, but proceeding.

So there is one Father, not three Fathers; one Son, not three Sons: one Holy Ghost, not three Holy Ghosts.

And in this Trinity none is afore or after other: none is greater, or less than another;

But the whole three Persons are co-eternal together; and co-equal.

So that in all things, as is aforesaid: the Unity in Trinity, or the Trinity in Unity is to be worshipped.

He therefore that will be saved: must thus think of the Trinity.

Furthermore it is necessary to everlasting salvation; that he also believe rightly the Incarnation of our Lord Jesus Christ.

For the right faith is, That we believe and confess: that our Lord Jesus Christ, the Son of God, is God and Man;

God, of the substance of the Father, begotten before the worlds: and Man, of the substance of his Mother, born in the world;

Perfect God, and perfect man: of a reasonable soul, and human flesh subsisting;

Equal to the Father, as touching his Godhead: and inferior to the Father, as touching his Manhood.

Who although he be God, and Man; yet he is not two, but one Christ.

One; not by conversion of the Godhead into flesh: but by taking of the Manhood into God;

One altogether; not by confusion of substance: but by unity of Person.

For as the reasonable soul and flesh is one man: so God and Man is one Christ.

Who suffered for our salvation: descended into hell, rose again the third day from the dead;

He ascended into heaven, he sitteth on the right hand of the Father, God Almighty: from whence he shall come to judge the quick and the dead.

At whose coming all men shall rise again with their bodies: and shall giv account for their own works.

And they that hav done good shall go into life everlasting: and they that hav done evil, into everlasting fire.

This is the Catholick Faith: which, except a man believe faithfully, he cannot be saved.

Glory be to the Father, and to the Son: and to the Holy Ghost;

As it was in the beginning, is now, and ever shall be: world without end. Amen.

An Important Discovery.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Athanasian Creed, which Episcopalians must believe under penalty of eternal damnation, is being severly criticised in England by its believers. They are tired of it, and clamor for a new creed. The Cambridge students claim that it is a serious obstacle in the way of many who desire to take holy orders. The Bishop of Peterboro says it is illogical. But notwithstanding the desire of the British believers for a change in what they are compelled to believe, the Convocation of Canterbury refuses to "repeal or modify." The Cambridge students consequently exhibit a great lack of that spirit of religious enthusiasm which is so necessary to the success of a semi-theological college. What they want is a creed simple yet solid, one that will not giv them a fit of spiritual indigestion every time they use it. Such a creed is in existence. It was discovered in an old chest among the ruins of a monastery on the coast of Italy by my grandfather, who made several voyages to the Mediterranean as captain of a merchant vessel. The creed, which is a marvel of simplicity and clearness, was written in Greek on vellum and inclosed in a bottle, which had the inscription, "The Only Original Creed," blown in the glass. The Athanasian Creed is evidently a base imitation of this creed, of which I send you a translation. JEROME.

THE ORIGINAL CREED.

Whosoever shall be saved, before all things, it is necessary that he hold the Cathartic Faith.

Which Faith, except every one do keep in a hole or on file, without doubt he shall perish perpetually.

And the Cathartic Faith is this: that we conceive of a circular Triangle and a three-cornered Circle.

Neither rounding the angles nor dividing the circumference.

For there is one angle of the Barrel, one of the Bung, and another of the Bunghole.

But the head of the Barrel, of the Bung, and the Bunghole is all one, the hoops within, the staves external.

Such as the Barrel is, such is the Bung, and such is the Bunghole.

The Barrel is solid, the Bung solid, and the Bunghole solid.

The Barrel liquid, the Bung liquid, and the Bunghole liquid.

The Barrel gaseous, the Bung gaseous, and the Bunghole gaseous.

And yet there are not three gaseouses, but one gaseous.

As also there are not three liquids, nor three solids, but one liquid and one solid.

So likewise the Barrel is empty, the Bung empty, and the Bunghole empty.

And yet there are not three empties, but one half empty.

So the Barrel is full, the Bung full, and the Bunghole full.

And yet there are not three fulls, but a one little too full.

So likewise the Barrel is awful, the Bung very awful, and the Bunghole awfully awful.

And yet there are not three awfuls, but one rather queer-looking, nevertheless.

For likewise as we are compelled by geometrical verity to acknowledge every angle by itself to be both Bung and Hole,

So are we forbidden by the Cathartic religion to say there be three Bungs or three Holes.

The Barrel is made of staves, neither headed nor hooped up.

The Bung is of the Barrel alone, neither shaped nor fashioned, but somehow.

The Bunghole is of the Barrel and the Bung, neither bored nor cut nor punched, but extracted.

So there is one Barrel, not three Barrels; one Bung, not three Bungs; one Bunghole, not three Bungholes.

And in this trinity none is ahead nor astern nor abreast of another; nor as great nor as little as another.

But the whole three angles are mysteriously what-you-may-call-it.

So that in all things, as is aforesaid, the circular Triangle or the triangular Circle is to be worshiped.

He therefore that will be shaved must pay the barber.

Furthermore it is necessary to prevent salivation that he conceive rightly of the tripartite Bung.

For the truth is that we believe, or profess to believe, that the Bung is both Plug and Hole.

Plug, of the substance of the Barrel, which is within it, and Hole, of the substance of the Bunghole, which it surrounds.

Perfect Plug and perfect Hole, of a three-cornered square round shape, on pork and beans subsisting.

Equal to the Barrel when touching the Barrel-head, and inferior to the Bunghole as touching its Bungholiness.

And although it be Plug and Hole, yet it is neither, but a veritable Bung.

Made, not by inserting the Barrel into the Bunghole, but by pulling the Bunghole out of the Barrel;

Not by desultory and spasmodic jerking, but by a union of persons, and a long pull, a strong pull, and a pull all together.

For as the reasonable cat and dog is one sausage, so Bung and Hole is one Barrel.

Which is used as an Ash-Barrel, descends into the cellar, and rises again to the third story.

It descends to the sidewalk, sitteth on the thumb hand side of the lamp-post, whence it shall be dumped when the ash cart cometh.

At whose coming all men shall close their eyes and take no account of the dust.

And the cinders shall be sifted, and those that are burnt shall be leached for lye, and the unburnt cinders shall make a rousing fire.

This is the Cathartic Faith, which except a man believe ardent y and enthusiastically he cannot be physicked.

Bully for the Barrel, for the Bung, and for the Bunghole;

For the hoops are off, the heads are gone, and 'tis a Barrel without ends. Amen. Hooray!

Religion and Crime.

It is quite amusing to read such pious frauds as the one you notice in "Rough Notes" from the Ormskirk Advertiser and New York Evening Post about the felonies committed by Atheists and Freethinkers, and it seems almost useless to notice them, except for the sake of drawing the attention of Freethinkers to the real facts of the case. It is somewhat gratifying to find members of Parliament obtaining statistics which must place this subject in its natural light. In 1873 Sir John Trelawney moved for a return of the religious persuasions of all the criminals in the prisons of England and Wales, and the paper issued is a most instructive one. Out of a total of 146,146 criminals there are—

|---|---|
| Church of England | 96,097 |
| Roman Catholics | 38,581 |
| Protestant Dissenters | 10,648 |
| Greeks | 9 |
| Other Christians | 57 |
| Jews | 256 |
| No Religion | 279 |
| Not Ascertained | 219 |
| | 146,146 |

When these returns were made there were, according to Mr. Horace Mann and Cardinal Manning—

|---|---|
| Church of England | 6 932,935 |
| Dissenters | 7,235,158 |
| Roman Catholics | 1,500,000 |
| Jews and others | 57,850 |

Leaving about 7,000,000 of no religion.

This estimate giv about the following proportions of criminals in every 100,000:

|---|---|
| Roman Catholics | 2,500 per 100,000 |
| Church of England | 1,400 " " |
| Dissenters | 150 " " |
| Naturalists, or no Religion | 5 " " |

So that as religion or mythology declines so in proportion does crime. If this estimate be true, is it not important to bring it to the front? Two Freethinkers doubt its accuracy, but giv no opposing evidence. Since Sir John's return I hav endeavored to call attention to the facts in the local press. On the 11th November last I wrote thus to the Bishop of Manchester, in reply to his statement about the rapid increase of skepticism: "While looking over the proper figures to ascertain the effect of your teaching in Ashton, I dropped upon the criminal returns during the time you lament this increase of skepticism, and find that since skeptics hav concentrated, increased, and are teaching, crime has decreased in England 45 per cent, in pious, fraudulent, and drunken Scotland 25, and in Ireland, whose population has decreased one-fourth, 81 per cent, and if you will digest the Parliamentary returns, April 21, 1873, you will there see that out of 146,146 criminals, 144,792 are Christian mythologists, 256 Jews, and only 279 Infidels!"

Edward Bagshawe, Bishop of Nottingham, addressed his dear children in 1877 thus: "Alas, alas! dear children, it is now (education) passing into the hands of an Infidel school board, who are alienated from God, and surrounding you with Infidel books and pamphlets, and still worse, their newspapers and periodicals filled with errors, and too often with poisonous leaves of Infidelity and Materialism. Touch not, taste not, handle not!" On the 17th January, 1877, I wrote in reply: "Dear Rev. Sir: If you turn to our religious statistics you will easily find where all your 'dear children' liv. Liverpool has 13,723 criminals, 9,022 of whom are Roman Catholics; Manchester has 7,879 criminals, 3,865 are yours; Lancashire has 34,888 criminals, of which of your dear children there are 18,329; England and Wales hav 146,146 criminals, 38,581 are Roman Catholics! Even in our little county, where your 'dear children' are in the state your pastoral shows, one-tenth of our criminals are these dears, and throughout the country your 'dear children,' about two million, furnish one-fourth of our criminals, whereas of seven million unbelievers only 279 are criminals."

I hav never received even an acknowledgment to either of these letters, nor to about twelve others written to canons, priests, etc., and with your permission I should like Freethinkers to notice these important returns, because it is not only natural that a vicarious scheme of atonement should develop crime, but history and statistics demonstrate it. During the last half-century skepticism has most rapidly increased; the Pope, his cardinals, archbishops, bishops, and priests all deplore with President Jennings that it is not the views of any sect that are assailed, "but divine truth, with an earnestness, a culture, and a quiet boldness unknown to the Infidelity of former years. It was not vulgarized, but so insidiously mixed up with science, so attractively embellished with literary grace, that its publications gave no shock, even when in the hands of children. They were not written in the form of an attack on the Bible, but they meant and assumed the denial of religion." If then, sir, such are the firm, strong, and rapid strides made by Infidels and we find concurrent therewith a decided and marked decrease of crime, are these facts to be passed without criticism? Let me ask your readers' attention to the fact that in 1841, when the population of England and Wales was only 16,000,000 in round numbers, our convictions were 29,000, but in 1877, with a population of 25,000,000, our convictions were only 12,000—the very time when the paid parsons of Christendom are lamenting the increase of Infidelity.

Yours truly, R. PORTER.

THE first coach ever seen in England was made by Walter Rippon, for the Earl of Rutland, in 1555, and in 1564 the same builder made a showy vehicle for Queen Elizabeth.

Letters from Friends.

FLORENCE, IOWA, Dec. 16, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: All this talk about Mr. Bennett saying, "I am heartily ashamed and sorry for it, and humbly ask your forgiveness," is pitiful. Let us hav the truth. We hav had enough of this driveling cant. To Mr. Bennett I say, "Stick;" continue to edit THE TRUTH SEEKER. To-day, despite your concession to Mrs. Grundy, you are worth ten thousand Bundys and Abbots.

To the Board of Directors of the National Liberal League I would say, Do not accept Mr. Bennett's proffered resignation of the office of vice-president of the League. He has done nothing which would justify such acceptance. In his private affairs he is not amenable to the dictation of that or any other organization. Stand by the grand declaration of H. L. Green, in your issue of the 13th inst. Those words hav the ring of the right metal. Thanks, Macdonald, for your selection from the North American Review. The paper grows better each week. The letters of Dr. Severance, Mary Emma Fisher, and "Agnosticus" are splendid. They cut right through the brazen corselet of conventional morality and cleave superstition to the marrow. Your article on the proposed lottery law is good. How many such usurpations shall we quietly submit to? How much longer shall we permit the venal press to do our thinking for us and the minions of despotism to immure our truest and best in dungeons, whilst we blindly follow party leaders and meekly vote at their bidding? Is it not about time that we as Freethinkers did our thinking and examined the ground on which our present society is based, religiously, socially, and morally? E. C. WALKER.

EDINA, MO., Dec. 1, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav been very much grieved at the unkind and fiendish treatment you received in the name of law and justice, robbing you of the most sacred rights all claim to possess, disgracing the name of an American freeman. I hav been a reader of Liberal literature for the past fifteen years, and hav considered your paper one of the ablest batteries that was shelling the strongholds of superstition and human slavery. It pains me to learn that any cause exists from any reason, be it what it may, that places you in the hands of your retaliating enemies for public scandal. But I hope your Liberal friends will all be as forgiving and tolerant as our enemies of Brooklyn, the friends of Beecher, by saying, "Go ahead with the good work, and sin no more; and we will sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER." J. M. WOODWARD.

PLEASANTON, IOWA, Dec. 15, 1879.

ED. TRUTH SEEKER: Please find inclosed $6 50 which appropriate as directed. My motto is to giv D. M. Bennett credit for what good he has done, which is inestimable. He has admitted his faults, which is more than our Christian friends are used to do My desire is for long life to D. M. Bennett and his brave paper. Rev. Ditzler's assertions used as arguments are beneath the dignity of a gentleman, and an insult to every one of your readers, and we hope Professor Jamieson will never stoop so low as to get down to the level of Rev. Ditzler. To every observing and unbiased mind throughout the civilized world, all know that the almighty dollar is the grand and moving star which guides the clergy from parish to parish, and will continue to be as long as honest toil will contribute to the support of a set of professional impostors. Just for a minute, in your imagination, strip the clergy of their salaries, and the church property of its exemption from taxation, and where will its advocates be? Very truly your friend, A. HAMILTON.

CADMUS, KAN., Dec. 3, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I hav been pained to write to you for a long time. I now avail myself of the opportunity. I hav read your paper since last spring, and am well pleased with it, and wish you to continue sending it to me, and as soon as I can spare the money I will forward the amount of my subscription. I also want the noble works of Thomas Paine, the lectures of Col. Ingersoll, and the "Last Will and Testament of Jean Meslier."

But I am poor now. I will hav the means by spring if we all liv and our health remains good. I was raised and educated an orthodox. I hav often wondered how it could be that a good God would forever damn a good man simply because he could not believe the rib story. I hav laid the Bible aside (feel better since). I hav avowed my principles to my Christian friends, and by so doing hav rendered myself obnoxious to them. They are intolerant towards me though I always speak kindly to them. I hope I may liv over it, notwithstanding their impudence. I hav persuaded some of them to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and it has converted some, and hope the others will be in time. I take special pains to distribute my paper; I can't suffer it to lie still.

But to think of the noble-hearted D. M. Bennett in a felon's cell chills my blood. And if my heart-felt sympathy would hav rendered him any service he certainly would hav been free long before this. Since I read his noble and manly letter and confession of the whole truth my sympathy is greater than ever. I am fully persuaded in my own mind that it was a deep-laid scheme of Catholicism to ruin his good reputation. It reminds me of the story of Potiphar's wife and Joseph. It is bad enough to be Comstocked and imprisoned for opinion's sake, but to be Beecherized is worst of all. In my judgment there is not a reverend in our land that has not made love to some of the daughters of men. But they are all skilled in what Beecher was pleased to call "nest-hiding." Yours fraternally, J. NEWBOLD.

DEAR BENNETT: You request every reader of your paper to address you, and I do so in your own words: "Cheer up; we hav not lost confidence in you; we will continue to stand by you; we will not condemn a good life for a few letters; THE TRUTH SEEKER is a good paper, and it shall liv." The above quotation from your "Fourth Letter," addressed to the readers of your paper, expresses my sentiments and feelings exactly. A. J. OLIVER.

BURR OAK, MICH., Dec. 3, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER. Dear Sir: I wish to cast in my mite of condemnation of Bro. Bennett's envious and malicious persecutors and vile slanderers, as well as to say something that may help to cheer him up while in the Christian bastile. I would say to him, Cheer up, and be happy that they hav not the power to burn you at the stake as of yore, where Abbot and Bundy would be first to kindle the fire with demoniac grin and chuckle over their victim; but they hav not.

I wish to say I always disapproved of Bennett so exposing himself to persecution and imprisonment by selling the book containing doctrines that he himself deprecates and repudiates, and then came those terrible letters in the R.-P. Journal and Index (I am not a patron of either), sent me gratuitously, no doubt, by their malicious editors, for whom I hav no respect except that due to habitual liars and slanderers. Abbot, in particular, has long proved himself to be a fop, a bigot, and a liar. Now I confess they struck me with a chill of mingled indignation and humiliation to think that our brave old champion of truth, reason, and common sense had so fallen or swerved from the path of consistency and chastity which he had so long trod with honor and renown. I mourned, not to say wept, over the weakness that for once had taken possession of our previously and subsequently strong, brave leader of the brave. Still I resolved that if the charges therein contained were all true, I would not forsake THE TRUTH SEEKER, but I confess I was somewhat crestfallen thereby; but as he has the moral courage that few men possess, to confess the whole and ask forgiveness of all for that which injured no one but Mrs. Bennett, and she has long since forgiven him, it proves him to be a thousand times better man than his malicious accusers, who hav told a thousand lies to injure and hurt their fellow-men, and are unrepentant and persistent still in their calumny and spite, the little cultured Great I Am in particular. I say, Down with the little fop and up with the Bennett flag higher than ever before. We should forgive not only once, which is all that is required in this case, but seven times, yes, even seventy times seven if need be, if repented of and forgiveness asked, according to so-called holy writ, and fruit brought forth that is meet for repentance, which hav abundantly been done by our brave and noble old leader.

No other man has ever filled the bill of Liberalism and the demands and needs of the hour as he has done. And as one of the jury that is to say whether THE TRUTH SEEKER shall liv or die, or even languish for want of patronage and support, I say No, never, never! And as a small token of sincerity to sustain that vote, I send you herewith a P. O. money order for $5.00 for that purpose. Mr. Bennett, through THE TRUTH SEEKER and his numerous pamphlets, has struck faster, heavier, and more telling blows to old rotten and dying theology than any other man or woman except an immortal few. All hail to our brave and noble old hero. I would take but little, if any, notice in the future of their vituperation and falsehoods, and let them vent their spleen to their hearts' content without lengthened reply. Giv them all the rope they want and they will hang themselves. Yours for truth and justice,

M. P. THURSTON.

BALTIMORE, MD., Dec. 15, 1879.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I wish to add a line to the many expressions of encouragement and devotion that seek utterance at the lips of all true Liberals after this last, the unkindest cut of all, that Mr. Bennett has been called upon to endure.

While feeling sorrow that Mr. Bennett should hav acted, as he admits, so foolishly, no one but a bigot or a hypocrite would haste to call weakness a crime. Only he who has stolen the sheep is so fast to cry wolf when no wolves are near. The foul stench that proceeds from the reeking cesspool but discloses the rottenness concealed therein. By their fruits ye shall know them. When Abbot and Bundy can claim as truthfully to hav given blows that hav shaken orthodoxy to its foundations, to hav been face to face with the hard, practical facts of starvation and rags, to hav lived on in shivering poverty, friendless and alone, all from love of truth and hatred of a lie, then, and not till then, shall these white-handed saints of weak-kneed Liberalism, unrebuked apply to our old hero Bennett, such epithets as "libertine," "seducer," "fraud."

All things work together for the good of those who love the right, and if I am not greatly mistaken, the honest Liberals of the United States will show by their support of Bennett, and by the severe no-cent-for-tribute policy with which they will treat Abbot and Bundy, that "curses, like chickens, come home to roost." By their hellish arts they hav raised a demon, now he turns and rends them.

Bennett need hav no fear. This little whiff of winter's breath may kill out those delicate flowers of perfection that are ill-fitted to withstand the fearful blasts that sweep over the pathway of progress, but to those of hardier growth, to the Liberal of thought, of brain, of true manhood or womanhood, its effect is life-giving, it but braces the nerves for greater and more trying struggles.

Among the latter it is my earnest desire to enroll the name of WM. J. GORSUCH

PINE ISLAND, MINN., Dec. 10, 1879.

O Bennett, thou art mighty
Among thy fellow-men,
And they who now misjudge thee,
Should be where thou hast been.

FRIEND BENNETT: It is refreshing in the extreme in these days of political and religious intrigue and corruption to find a few who are as pure and spotless as thine accusers seem to be. And you know that if universal charity prevailed for never so small a time on this plane, this earth would be a heaven and hell, or the many hells of the present time would be as great a fable as the mythical hell of theology has proved to be; and as the millennium has not yet dawned we cannot expect such a state of things to exist just yet. Since you are so very naughty, and the other party so very good, perhaps some one hath discovered that she hath an antidote, and if so all minor faults would dwindle to insignificance. Now any person of average discrimination and common sense knows that any true woman will not permit a second letter to offend her sight. She can refuse to open them, or refuse to take them from the office. After your manly letter of explanation it seems to me that no right-minded person can conscientiously do otherwise than uphold your paper with means and influence in this your hour of need. I regret deeply that any journals that lay any claim to Liberalism or Spiritualism could possibly lend themselves to so low and nefarious a business as trying to ruin the name of one who has given his whole life to the Liberal cause. The cause you represent can illy spare one worker in this hour of deep struggle for all Liberal issues that are of such vital importance to the life of this nation. Do not professed Liberals see that the course they are pursuing is suicidal to the best interests of humanity? And right here the question forces itself upon us, Hav some parties sold out to the church and money power, or has some Benedict Arnold taken full possession of their organs and thus make tools of them to further the anti-Liberal cause? A family quarrel is deplorable in any case, but in this instance it is a terrible calamity. It cannot be denied that at about the time of the Woodhull frenzy many brave souls seeking for light upon a much vexed question flew off at a tangent, and did and said some silly things, but after the nine days' wonder most of them wheeled back into line with many cobwebs of foolish fancies swept away from their mental vision. Shall any sane person be found that is willing to condemn or throw away a whole life of usefulness for one rash or foolish act? We are not afraid of becoming contaminated. Such things are not catching in our family. The pope could not wish for a more propitious state of affairs for his cause than to see the leaders in the Liberal cause, swayed by the fierce passions of hate and malice, tearing each other, and rendering themselves obnoxious to the public mind. If they are to be the people's saviors, surely is Christ crucified anew, and we might repeat his language, "Father forgive them; they know not what they do." Liberals, THE TRUTH SEEKER must not be murdered by its friends. Put me down on the journal books for $10. We shall want Liberal tracts, leaflets, and lectures.

Ever a seeker after higher truth, JENNIE M. HARPER.

HOOPER, UTAH, Nov. 29, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Ever since our friend was torn from his faithful wife, sent to that Christian bastile, and put to hard work making soles (souls) for Christians, when he was not guilty of any crime, my thoughts and mental faculties hav been exercised as never before. The death of my good old mother and many of my brothers and friends never produced such an effect upon me as the imprisonment of D. M. Bennett. I never saw Mr. Bennett personally, yet, by his noble labor for the liberty of us and our children, he seems ever present in my mind. The Christian and Mormon motto is, "A man is known by his works. The only work that is worth anything with a priest is paying tithes."

I am a poor Liberal. As I hav not had money to help on the cause of freedom, I hav done the best I could to let the public know the truth in regard to Mr. Bennett's case. About a month ago I sent you a copy of the reply I sent to the Salt Lake Tribune in regard to the dastardly attack of the R.-P. Journal and the illiberal Index upon Mr. D. M. Bennett, which they published in part and tolerably well dissected on Nov. 7th. Mr. Sewell, President of the Ogden League, informed me they had cut the same out of the Tribune and sent it to you. They did not print my name to the article. Mr. Sewell thought Mr. Walker, of Farmington, wrote it. Let me inform you that not a man in Farmington has ever written a letter to any paper in Utah or been inside of a printing-office to endeavor to put in a word for Mr. Bennett, free speech, free press, or free mails. What Mr. Walker sent to you, and was published in your paper, would do very well for a Mormon elder, but not for a man holding his position. The statement he made in THE TRUTH SEEKER last spring about Utah becoming a hot-bed for Infidelity, and what he was going to do this fall, is simply all bosh.

I joined the Farmington League almost as soon as it was organized, and from that day to this I do not know that they hav ever met together. I hav been down there many times during this year, and advocated to Mr. Walker the good that would result to Liberalism by meeting together. But he put it off till fall, and now winter is here. He is afraid of meetings or lectures for fear some persons might say something to hurt the Mormon's feelings. My opinion is, from what he told me last Friday, that if he ever gets his mind in tune to hold meetings, they will hav to be opened and closed by praying to Jehovah & Co.

You are aware what Christians hav done in the past and are doing in the present, only believing they were serving God. But Mormonism, how little is it known in the East or West? Whenever a truthful correspondent of some paper has published a true statement of some terrible crime, Mormon missionaries, with Mormon gold, hav published all over the United States a refutation of such fact under the nom de plume of Gentile, Traveler, A Lover of Justice, etc., etc.

I will explain Mormonism in as few words as I can, as I think I know it almost as well as W. Walker, although he was at Mendon seven or eight years longer than I was. Mormonism from a Mormon standpoint is a restoration of all things as they were at the beginning (vis. 5,000 years ago); hence you will see Mormonism really means a restoration of God talking and walking with man, polygamy, slavery, murder, hatred, an eye for an eye, a tooth for a tooth. You may ask any good Mormon in any land, who can or cannot read A B C, that cannot tell twice two is four, what makes him be Mormon, he will not commence to tell what he believes, but what he knows. He knows Joseph Smith was a prophet of God, who received the same gospel that Jesus Christ and his apostles taught, from an angel, written on gold plates (Book of Mormon). He knows God gave Joe open revelations to write the Book of Doctrine and Covenant (larger than the New Testament and more foolish). He knows, if he does not gather to Salt Lake, and get washed and greased in the endowment house or temple, he will be cut off from many privileges in the next world, such as having wives and begetting children, etc. He also knows, and is quite positive, that all men and women when they hear this glorious (nonsense) news, and do not embrace it, and pay one-tenth of all when they join the church, and one-tenth annually, shall fast the first Thursday in every month, and donate the value of that day's food for the poor priest. All the eggs laid on Sunday must be given to the female Jesuits, female relief society. All who do not accept this sound of glad tidings, and get baptized by one of the apostle's seventeen elders, high-priests, or priests who are all properly reclaimed under God's holy priesthood, and are all duly and legally qualified agents for Jesus Christ and his father, shall be damned. But if you are fool enough to believe all this because the holy Bible teaches it, and get dipped all over, nothing else will admit either king or pauper into God's holy kingdom, then you will know all these lies are true. You can move mountains; two Mormons will be able, with God's spirit, to chase a thousand. You shall lay hands on the sick and they shall recover; take up serpents, they will not harm you; if you drink poison it will not hurt you, etc., etc. If you can do all this, it proves you are dishonest, as God is unchangeable, and he has promised this to all who will believe and obey. As the fault cannot be in God, consequently it proves you lack that little speck of (mustard seed) faith. E. F. TRUNN.

ST. JOHNS, ILL., Dec. 28, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I address you through the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER, one of the most liberal papers in existence. I do this in compliance with your request in your letter from your prison cell, asking your subscribers to giv an expression of their approval or disapproval, as the case may be, of your remaining at the helm of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I, for one, as a constant subscriber to your paper for over five years, say emphatically, Go on;

we cannot well do without you. I think it doubtful whether another man in our land can be found that would exhibit the moral courage you hav in the past. I hav conversed with many Liberals in this vicinity, and none of them condemn you for your little indiscretion in regard to those letters. I first received a copy of the Journal, and afterwards two copies of the Index, and of all the quintessence of meanness the mind of man is capable of thinking of, I do not think anything can excel their acts in downright, infernal cussedness. I hav neither language nor patience to express my abhorrence for such men, claiming to be Liberals.

In regard to the matter of the accusation those pious sneaks bring against you, I hav my doubts that there is one man in a thousand of your age, if the truth was known, but has been guilty of as great or greater wrong. Be of good cheer, you will outlive your enemies in the minds of all true men and women.

Inclosed you will find $3.00 for your paper for 1880.

Fraternally, WM. A. THOMPSON.

ROCHESTER, MICH., Dec. 2, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed you will find $1.00 to apply to my subscription to your paper. Will try to send more soon. I take this opportunity, after reading both sides of the subject, to express, on the whole, my most decided sympathy for the man in prison, D. M. Bennett. He has doubtless committed some mistakes, done some wrongs. So hav I, and hav no stone to throw. Wonder if there is any "glass" in the houses that Bundy and Abbot liv in? Let us see a little as to the former. What is some of the record of the R.-P. Journal?

As I was a subscriber to the same a few years ago, I recollect that it was the same "red rag," Freelovism ostensibly, that set that Journal after the reputations of Mrs. Woodhull, Moses Hull, E. V. Wilson, and others, with the persistency of a bulldog. And, if I remember rightly, a suit in law for defamation was brought against the editor by the last-mentioned person above, continued a while in court, but was finally nolle prosequied by the revolver of another rather braver opponent of "Freelove." I recollect, also, watching the Journal at the time to see what answer it would giv to some of the notes of the assassination in other papers, especially of Pomeroy in the Democrat, who applied his terrible scalpel of a pen to the case, calling the murdered man virtually a heartless hypocrite, plying his vocation solely for the money there was in it and other baser ends. I expected a notice called out by this from the Journal. But no, not a word. The junior-editor then manifested the forbearance of a flogged spaniel.

After the death, I noticed a slight turn in the tide of the Journal's course. Purifying the ranks of Spiritualism afterwards was not so much of a forte as formerly. Also the advertisement for the woman Robinson, in which were portrayed her wonderful success in curing all the ills to which flesh is heir, by using her "magnetized papers, her "band," or some of them kindly going along, sent by mail, etc., etc., ad infinitum, ad nauseum, that had previously figured in said Journal—a great moral blotch of a column and a half—for years, was unceremoniously and at once dropped.

Whether she was turned out of her room in the Journal building or not, couldn't report. I believe Mr. Bundy's friend, J. Roberts, of Mind and Matter, took on this same Robinson advertisement, but after a short time dropped it "like a hot potato."

Moral purity is, doubtless, well enough, but when men are so ready to run in its defense before their record would seem to send them, I hav learned to distrust their motive—just a little.

Bundy and Abbot are undoubtedly smart. A few years to come will tell nearer how the matter is. Some of us can afford to wait. Yours for the beauties of consistency,

C. H. GREENE.

LOGANSPORT, IND., Dec. 17, 1879.

BRO. D. M. BENNETT: You wish to know whether you hav friends enough left to continue THE TRUTH SEEKER since your being harnessed uuder "Cupid's Yokes?" Certainly, certainly! why not? We only hope you hav shown yourself a man among men by your frank acknowledgment of truth; we are glad you did not leave all the blame on the woman, as old father Adam did, but you must be patient and forgiving, as your persecutors do not realize what they are really guilty of. One of their own kind, a Rev. Vannattee, was selling Bibles through our civil country, and stopped at a house where he found a lady who pleaded poverty as a reason for not subscribing for his work. The reverend gentleman, being somewhat of the mortal nature, and possessing some animal ambition, which was excited to overflow under the, as he thought, favorable circumstances, gently, kindly, and lovingly placed his hand on the lady's shoulder and very gentlemanly offered to trade the price of a Bible out. In due time the legal defender of our American sister was brought to the van somewhat the worse for Rev. Devil. Of course such proceeding excited our Christian government, and a trial was brought about at the next sitting of the grand jury. The reverend man, one after God's own heart, of course was allowed his say and was taken in preference to six other witnesses, and the man who procured a legal license and had sworn before witnesses, friends, and authority, to love, protect, etc., this woman who was indecently assaulted by this imp, was fined for doing according as he had promised to do. Your trial at New York, this at Logansport, and the way citizens at the polls are treated, seem to say our Constitution is only nominal. "O liberty, why remain so long in the East!"

I am now nearly seventy-three years old and feel like I want to do something to keep the ball rolling for future generations and enjoy the remainder of my declining years, so inclosed find a money order for $5.00; $3.00 one year's subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and $2.00 gratis contribution to sustain the cause.

Hoping the above will be somewhat consoling, and wishing the paper may be continued with accelerating speed, I remain, as ever, Yours very sincerely,

JOSEPH B. CORNELL.

MILL SPRINGS, KY., Nov. 28, 1879.

DEAR BRO. BENNETT: Your last letter from the hell into which you hav been chased by Christian dogs has been read with satisfaction. How my heart sympathizes with you in the trouble so unjustly inflicted on you—the nations best friend. And the card from your bosom friend who has borne all so bravely, she indeed has the sympathy of all true Liberals. I hav said, Bro. Bennett, I hav never been connected with any association or League of Liberalism, but inclosed you will find twenty-five cents for which send me Truth Seeker Leaflets.

There are but few Liberals in this country, but I hope soon all will be made to see the error they are in, forsake their superstitious ways, take truth and charity for their guide, and become wiser and better men and women.

Dear brother, this is written by your request. You desired to receive a card or letter from every Liberal in the country to decide whether you and the dear paper which we love should go down. No! a thousand times no! Let it liv, with its brave and heroic editor. Raise higher and higher. It has done, and is doing, more good than any paper in America; and may it still liv to do good, and not only liv, but may it reach the homes and be read and cherished by every American citizen. I owe my conversion to Liberalism to it. I am young in the cause but devoted to it with all my energy. I am truly yours in heartfelt sympathy,

T. W. MARTIN.

BURLINGTON, KAN., Dec. 17, 1879.

The agitation of thought is the beginning of wisdom. In connection with this subject, I will inform you that Bro. O. A. Phelps visited our city and gave us a course of Liberal lectures on the 13th, 14th, and 19th inst., at Jarboe's Hall, to crowded and intelligent audiences. The questions discussed were: Advancement of Science; The Fall and Atonement of Man; Ecclesiastical Despotism.

Bro. Phelps being a successful lawyer and a logical reasoner, and examining the above questions on a scientific basis, demolished the whole superstructure of Christianity. And I would improve this opportunity to recommend to the public Bro. Phelps as a successful lecturer and debater.

ANAMOSA, IOWA, Dec. 10, 1879.

DEAR FRIENDS: Some one has very kindly sent me a copy of your paper, with which I am much pleased, notwithstanding I am a Spiritualist, and it seems to be conducted mainly from a Materialistic standpoint; for be it known that I am just as ready and willing to go in search of truth from a Materialistic standpoint as I am to invite my friends to go in pursuit of it with me from a Spiritualistic standpoint.

The copy which I hav (Nov. 15th) advertises to send THE TRUTH SEEKER to trial subscribers three months for fifty cents, which offer I will accept by inclosing you the same, and will do what I can to induce my friends to read and subscribe for it, for Spiritualists and Materialists are, after all, working for the same great end—the liberation of humanity from the tyranny of priestcraft; and will, in all probability, in the near future, be compelled—whether we will or no—to "pool our issues" in defense of our common liberty against the common foe.

I am happy to say, so far as I can discern, that the mass of Spiritualists and the mass of Materialists do not differ widely in their general views, except upon the subject of a future life and spirit communion. I hope we are either of us Liberal enough to be willing to meet on common ground and prove or disprove the tenableness of our respective positions, or at least not to quarrel over our differences so long as our common foe is both secretly and openly plotting to rob us of what little liberty we hav already gained.

Wishing you unbounded success in your laudable efforts to uphold the liberty of the press, and through that to procure liberty of action, whether it accords with the popular standard of morality or not, provided, of course, that we do not trespass upon the rights of others, I am,

Yours fraternally, MRS. M. E. PRESTON.

BELLE CREEK, NEB.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: The impulse is strong (born of deep sympathy) to address you and express in some measure my appreciation of your brave words, contained in THE TRUTH SEEKER of November 22d. I felt, after reading the letter through, that I would like to grasp you by the hand and bid you cheer and "God speed." Honesty, justice, and truth must stand for their true worth, while deceit and hypocrisy should be despised by all those who love the former. Yes, dear brother, I honor your courage and truth, which stood the test of the most trying ordeal. You hav unveiled the recesses of the soul and shown alike to friend and foe. As a friend, I find noble qualities worthy of esteem and confidence. I find a determination to speak the truth, though the utterance may cause anguish unspeakable to the soul, and in that expression we find a heart brave enough to acknowledge an error, with a firm resolve to avoid the wrong and liv the right. The heart of true humanity beats responsive to thine own. You stand not alone. We are all linked together into one great brotherhood. We are all emanations from the infinite soul—the rich, the poor, the great, the small, the high, the low. His love extends to and binds unto himself.

We rise by the things that are under our feet.
By what we hav mastered of greed or gain.
By the pride subdued and the passion slain.
And the vanquished ill we daily meet.

Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER liv, with D. M. Bennett at the helm! May it move onward and upward, ever true to its name, inspiring the friends of progress to renewed zeal, and bring light and truth to those who are groping in mental darkness!

Yours in the universal brotherhood of the human race,

MRS. M. E. HAMMER.

SO. WOLFEBOROUGH, N. H., Nov. 19, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find five dollars, three of which is to pay my subscription to the paper for 1880, and the other two you will please use in spreading the cause of justice and humanity. I indorse all of R. C. Flower's sentiments, and bid you go on.

Very truly yours, J. W. SPRINGFIELD.

A Word.

The good work goes bravely on. The petitions are now coming in, and our friends report that a majority of the people in their respective locality favor the equalization of taxation. Am now sending the petition to all the papers with a request to publish. It has already appeared in the Keokux Gate City, Cedar Rapids Standard, and other leading papers. At Brighton the petition was headed by names of Disciple ministers. At Vinton signed by Judge Shane and other prominent citizens. New League at Armstrong Grove, Ottumwa, reports, "Will soon hav a League in full blast. Belle Plaine, Glidden, Hanlan, Bedford, Hook's Point, and other places, are moving in the same direction. Send in for petitions; no time to lose; fifty-two counties yet to hear from. Reader, is your county among the laggards?

E. C. WALKER,
Ch. Iowa State Com. N. L. L

Notes and News from Iowa.

Mr. Andrew Goan, of Mt. Pleasant, sends in the first petition for taxing churches, with one hundred and ninety signatures. He is one of our most whole-souled and earnest workers, devoting one week of his time exclusively to this work. He thinks that we should demand that all tax-exemptions be done away with. He says: "I might hav done much better had the petition been worded so as to ask for the repeal of all exemptions. It would then be regarded purely as a matter of principle, and would receive the support of many church-members. There are even some church-members on the petition here inclosed. . . Hereafter I will not circulate petitions except upon the general principle to repeal all exemptions. Many Freethinkers here would not sign on this account; and many Odd-fellows here would not sign because it was not general. I am an old Odd-fellow myself. We here hav big money, loan it out at interest, and it should be taxed. I am happy to say that men generally are disposed to act from principle."

No one, I think, can gainsay the truth of Mr. Goan's observations or deny the justice of his demand—that all property which receives the protection of the state should contribute to its support. But strictly speaking, the mission of the Liberal League is to secure the total separation of church and state, not to attempt the equalization of taxation in other directions than that of placing secular and ecclesiastical property upon the same level. The petition which we are circulating here is substantially the same as that presented to the Legislature of the state of New York last winter.

With Mr. Goan, I believe that all private property should be taxed so long as any is taxed; but for the Liberal League to demand this is to plunge it at once into the political fight, an event very much dreaded by Mr. Underwood and many more of our ultra-respectable Liberalists. Of this I am not at all afraid; indeed, I should rejoice to see the Liberal League plant itself squarely upon such a platform.

Is Mr. Goan willing to go with his demand to the end? To tax all private property, we shall hav to levy not only upon the churches, Masons, Odd-fellows' halls, and kindred things, but upon United States bonds, United States coupons, national currency, UnitedStates notes, treasury notes, etc., etc. Justice for all; privilege for none.

LEAGUES.

Our friends in Wapello county talk of organizing a county League.

Armstrong Grove has one organized, but they hav not yet taken out a charter.

Hook's Point, Hamilton county; Manchester, Delaware county; Belle Plaine, Benton county, are all talking League. Now, if they will only act, we shall hav three more Leagues soon.

One of my correspondents, who does not believe in organization, says that he is not very particular whether church property is taxed or not, and remarks that "orthodoxy is dying." This latter statement is true, but the old persecutor still possesses enough of strength and vim to dictate the legislation of this country, immure Freethought editors in loathsome dungeons, exempt her property from taxation, force her Bible into the common schools, quarter her chaplains upon the public treasury, muzzle the secular press, and make moral cowards of three out of four of the Liberals of the gentleman's own state. The latter is a sad fact; for every avowed Freethinker in Iowa, I am morally certain that there are three others who are strong Liberals secretly. They dare not announce their real opinions, for fear of loss of position, social ostracism, loss of patronage, etc.

But few Liberals hav the nerve to take hold and circulate the petition for the taxation of church property. I am told of many members of the Legislature who are "Liberals, Freethinkers, but will hardly vote for taxation of church property." I know of a presiding officer of a Liberal society who did not dare to allow this petition to be upon the show-case in his office for signatures. Yes, orthodoxy may be "dying," but these undeniable facts do not indicate it very strongly.

The greatest difficulty which we hav to encounter is this "moral influence" of the church—this mostly silent but relentless vengeance visited upon all who do not bow in meek obedience at her altars. The apathy and influence of so-called Liberals is the next greatest difficulty which we hav to overcome; in one sense, it is the greatest, for much of seeming indifference is really fear of ostracism and loss of business, sure to be the portion of the avowed and active Liberal.

What we need above all things else is organization, union, cohesion of the individual atoms of the Freethought world. This we must hav, and I am happy to say that the great majority of our known live Liberals realize this fact.

The views which I hav been criticising hav been expressed to me by but three or four correspondents, and most, if not all, of these are tinctured with Abbotism.

In my next I will giv brief extracts from the letters of a number of our genuine Iowa Liberals.

I am very much encouraged with the outlook in this state. Persistent, unremitting work will bring Iowa greatly into line with her sister states, many of which, notably Kansas and New York, are much in advance of her.

Speaking of "Abbotism," I must say that when a man becomes tainted with that he is of no further use as a practical worker. If he is a lecturer, he may keep on talking; but in that his energies spend all their force. A man inoculated with the deadly virus of "respectability" does not want to organize Leagues; he is "disgusted" with the whole thing; thinks that it is not the proper time to circulate petitions for the equalization of taxation; and, in fact, he does not particularly care whether church property is taxed or not. The "church tax he pays is no burden" to him, he asservates.

Alas! Alas! "How are the mighty fallen!" But they are mighty scarce, that is one consolation.

Send for petitions, friends. E. C. WALKER.

Extracts from "Eternity," with a Criticism Thereon.

EXTRACTS.

"O vast eternity! how little understood!
Duration's deep, unbounded sea, the lifetime of our God."

. . . . . .

"The centuries shall roll their stately numbers on
A million million centuries—eternity's fresh dawn.
Millenniums shall wheel with solemn jubilee,
Their vigintillion cycles run—noon of eternity."

[The author of the above, the Rev. N. W. V., and an old friend of mine, writes: "Friend Baker, I would like to hav your criticism on the poem, and I would also be pleased to hav you send me something of your own on my favorite themes, God and Eternity."]

CRITICISM.

An ass by an ocean stood,
And longed to cross over the flood.
He could not swim, and he could not fly,
So he said, "I will drink this ocean dry."
"It is simply a question of time," said he;
Then I said, "What a fool that ass must be!"
Then an angel stood forth in awful wrath,
As once he appeared in Balaam's path.
"Now, tell me true, or choose to die,
Which is the greater fool," said he,
"The ass that would drink the ocean dry,
Or the man that would measure eternity?"
Then I bowed my head for very shame,
And the angel sheathed his sword of flame;
And I said to myself in an humble way,
"I'll choose some lowlier theme for my lay.
For God—Eternity, Infinite Space,
Are themes too lofty for me to trace."
At best we but worship a "God unknown,"
To know him would be our God to dethrone.
To speak of his "lifetime," its "dawn," and its "noon,"
Would lead us to speak of his babyhood soon;
And so not a figure we mortals can use
But obscures the effulgence of infinite views.
Let our themes be our EARTH, our time, and our race,
And God shall take care of his infinite space.

CAUTION.

You may think, like Peter, that Balaam's ass
Was inspired, and everything came to pass
Just as it says in the sacred word;
But where did the angel get his sword?
Did Vulcan, the Lemnean blacksmith, make it?
Or did the angel just find it, and take it?
The story is yours, do just as you choose,
But don't take that liberty, please, with my muse.
Let no Nicene Council hereafter arise
My fable as fact to canonize.

J. R. P. BAKER.

Esther.

BY ALHAZA.

How sweetly floats that Indian mist
O'er dimpled neck and perfect arms!
Yet is thy queenly, modest worth
The most divine of all thy charms.

Thy kiss is like one golden sip
From vases where, amid the flowers,
At eventide the sun doth stoop
And linger long in heaven's bowers.

What! slay thy people? No, by heavens,
Or rather by thy cheek of flame,
Or hair, whose gleaming, golden waves
Would make the acacia weep for shame,

Stay thee! Thou art a balm more blest
Than spicy breaths from Araby;
Thy dismal kinsmen kneel and weep,
And I would smite them but for thee.

My other wives? Oh, I hav seen
Bright, soulless women in my way;
But were thy cheek one moment pale,
My brightest hopes would pass away.

Then hold me with an angel spell,
My wounded bosom seeketh rest;
In life or death, I care not which,
So I can soothe thy sorrowing breast.

Book Notice.

FAMILY CREEDS—A Romance. By William McDonnell, author of Exeter Hall, The Heathens of the Heath, etc. See advertisement.

This work will be read with interest by all who are familiar with Mr. McDonnell's previous writings, and the high expectations which will naturally be entertained from the success of the latter will in no respect be disappointed by the present volume. It is a pleasing story of Irish life, the principal motive being found in the jarring forms of faith which create an intensity of feeling not always confined to the polemical or political sphere, but at times prevading the home circle and embittering the most intimate and confidental relations of life. The author shows himself thoroughly conversant with his subject, and is equally happy in his delineations of the humorous and tender side of the Irish character. He has excellent descriptive faculties and strong logical power of analysis. The plot of the story is of the simplest order, its principal charm being its naturalness and fidelity to actual life. The reader's sympathies are, from the first, involuntarily drawn towards the hero and narrator, and the interest sustained throughout by the author's graphic depiction of characters, which will strike the keen observer as familiar. In addition to furnishing a pleasant readable story there is much in the work to excite serious thought. Its typographical appearance is creditable to the publishers.—Toronto Mail.

The Canada Presbyterian, in a hostile criticism of Mr. McDonnell's new work, "Family Creeds," says "It is pretty evident that he might attain no mean position as a retailer of Irish humour if ever he should giv his attention to that sort of thing."

STANDARD WORKS.
Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.). $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."
One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

ANDREW STONE, M.D.,

Physician for the Last Twenty-three Years to the Troy Lung and Hygienic Institute, Founder of the New Magnetic College, and Author of "The New Gospel of Health,"

TREATS with remarkable success Pulmonary Consumption, Asthma, Laryngitis, Bronchitis, Diphtheria, Catarrh, and all diseases of the air passages, by inhalation of his system of cold or cool Medicated Vapors, thereby entering the blood directly, saving the stomach from being perverted by nauseous drugs, as heretofore has been the practice of antiquated systems.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treatment, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfuly treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Price, paper, 75 cents; cloth $1.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

Poor and content, is rich and rich enough;
But riches, fineless [infinite], is as poor as winter
To him that ever fears he shall be poor.
—Shakspere.

The moment you drive the devil out of theology there is nothing left worth speaking about. The moment you drop the devil the whole "scheme of salvation" has lost all its interest for mankind. You must keep the devil and you must keep hell. You must keep the devil, because with no devil no priest is necessary.—Ingersoll.

Oh for a lodge in some vast wilderness,
Some boundless contiguity of shade,
Where rumor of oppression and deceit,
Of unsuccessful or successful war,
Might never reach me more! My ear is pained,
My soul is sick, with every day's report
Of wrong and outrage with which earth is filled.
—Cowper.

True reverence does not consist in declaring a subject, because it is dear to us, to be unfit for free and honest inquiry; far from it! True reverence is shown in treating every subject, however sacred, however dear to us, with perfect confidence; without fear and without fervor; with tenderness and love, by all means, but before all, with an unflinching and uncompromising loyalty to truth.—Max Muller.

There is no religion—or, if there is, I do not know it—which does not say, "Do good, avoid evil." There is none which does not contain what Rabbi Hillel called the quintessence of all religions, the simple warning, "Be good, my boy!" "Be good, my boy!" may seem a very short catechism, but let us add to it, "Be good, my boy, for God's sake," and we hav in it very nearly the whole of the law and pulpits.—Max Muller.

Whoever has quit growing, he is orthodox, whether in art, politics, religion, philosophy—no matter what. Whoever thinks he has found it all out, he is orthodox. Orthodoxy is that which rots, and heresy is that which grows forever. Orthodoxy is the night of the past, full of the darkness of superstition, and heresy is the eternal coming day, the light of which strikes the grand, pure heads of the intellectual pioneers of the world.—Ingersoll.

We often use the expression with regard to a person in society, that he is a man of "substance;" but how absurd to use the word "substance" of a man, and making it signify a house, bank stock, a heap of guineas, a store full of merchandise; things that do not touch his humanity at all. He is the man of substance that has the noble qualities which belong to human nature packed into him, can stand up, strong and solid, if all the accidents and such as farms, position, money, worldly consideration are stripped away.—Star King.

The loneliest of all mortals are the pioneers of new principles and policies, new faiths and feelings; for they alone hav none on earth with whom they can hold brotherhood of soul. Having emerged from the beliefs in which they were educated, thrown away habituated reliances, trusting themselves to original perception as they advance into the unknown, out of which new revelations are breaking on them, their solitude is sometimes as appalling as the experience of one who for the first time rides on a locomotive across a midnight prairie, when, through the level gloom, he seems just plunging off the world into banks of stars.—Alger.

The poet that beautified the sect that was otherwise inferior to the rest, saith yet excellently well: "It is a pleasure to stand upon the shore and to see the ships tossed upon the sea; a pleasure to stand in the window of a castle and to see a battle and the adventures thereof below; but no pleasure is comparable to the standing upon the vantage ground of truth (a hill not to be commanded, and where the air is always clear and serene), and to see the errors and wanderings and mists and tempests in the vale below;" so always that this prospect be with pity and not with swelling or pride. Certainly it is heaven upon earth to hav a man's mind move in charity, rest in Providence, and turn upon the poles of truth.—Bacon.

How sweet to stand, when tempests tear the main,
On the firm cliff, and mark the seaman's toil!
Not that another's danger soothes the soul,
But from such toil how sweet to feel secure!
How sweet, at distance from the strife, to view
Contending hosts, and hear the crash of war!
But sweeter far, on wisdom's hight serene,
Upheld by truth, to fix our firm abode,
To watch the giddy crowd that, deep below,
Forever wander in pursuit of bliss.
O blind and wretched mortals! Know ye not,
Of all ye toil for, Nature nothing asks,
But for the body, freedom from disease,
And sweet unanxious quiet for the mind.
—Lucretius.

As the child, on growing up to manhood, has to unlearn the language of the nursery, its religion, too, has to be translated from a feminine into a more masculine dialect. This does not take place without a struggle, and it is this constantly recurring struggle, this inextinguishable desire to recover itself, which keeps religion from utter stagnation. From first to last, religion is oscillating between these two opposite poles, and it is only if the attraction of one of the two poles becomes too strong that the healthy movement ceases and stagnation and decay set in. If religion cannot accommodate itself, on the one side, to the capacity of children, or if, on the other side, it fails to satisfy the requirements of men, it has lost its vitality, and it becomes either mere superstition or mere philosophy.—Max Muller.

To the Legislature of the State of New York:

We, the undersigned citizens of the state of New York, petition your Honorable Body to repeal the present laws of the state which exempt church property and ministers of the gospel from taxation; and we thus petition your Honorable Body for the following reasons:

1. Because by exempting church property and ministers' effects from taxation the state is assisting to support sectarian religion, which is unconstitutioual, and foreign to the purposes for which our government was formed; and (2) it is extending charity to the clergy, a class better paid than any of the mechanics who are taxed, and better than members of many other professions, thus constituting them a privileged class.

2. It is a principle of justice that whoever enjoys the protection of a government should assist in its support. Churches and ministers demand and receive protection from our government; and should riots occur by which such property should be destroyed, the state would be compelled to make good the same, although the property had never contributed to the revenues of the state.

3. By continued exemption of church property from taxation, ecclesiastical corporations are enabled to amass immense wealth, the exemption of which lays much heavier burdens upon secular property. One corporation in New York city owns $15,000,000 worth of property, $9,000,000 of which pays nothing for the support of government. In the state of New York there are $110,000,000 worth of property exempt from taxation.

4. It is a matter of history, with which every member of your Honorable Body is no doubt acquainted, that whenever, by a long term of freedom from taxation, the state has aided the church, it has at last been compelled, in self-defense, to confiscate the wealth gathered by the church—which, by its power and influence, owing to such aid, was becoming dangerous to the peace and welfare of the state. The examples of Mexico and Italy are respectfully submitted. In the neighboring city of Montreal the church owns nearly two-thirds of the real estate, which forces one-third to pay taxes sufficient to protect the whole. The value of church property in the United States is $500,000,000, and should its increase in the future be in proportion to its increase in the past, in the year 1900 it will reach the sum of $3,000,000,000, a third more than our national debt. Foresight now, on the part of your Honorable Body, may avert future disaster from our state.

And for many other just reasons which will readily suggest themselves to your Honorable Body.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

There was a bad man of New Haven,
Who wriggled so when he was shaven
That they cut off his nose
And his ears and his toes
Before they could make him behaven.

Talking about warm hair, a lady in Milwaukee, whose hair very nicely matches the brick in the Wisconsin building, and who has been joked about her red hair until she goes around and shoots the last few thousand who made ancient remarks about it, says she heard a new thing on red hair the other day. A friend from the East said to her, "Mrs. ——, I rather like this Skeneateles hair of yours."

She didn't like to ask any questions, but finally curiosity got the best of her, and she asked, "Well, what in the name of the thirteen apostles is Skeneateles hair?"

"Oh," says he, as he got on the other side of the table, and held his elbow over his head so the press-board wouldn't hurt, "Skeneateles is about forty miles beyond Auburn, you know."

He is now carried in a sling, and his friends hav to get a pass from the matron of the hospital to see him.

A QUEER HALF.

He was not exactly seedy-looking, yet he was not such an appearing man as no experienced barkeeper cares to supply more than one round of drinks to without a settlement. He entered a Kearney street bar-room and softly ordered a cocktail, "with just a dash of absinthe, please." The mixologist had proceeded about half way with his scientific operations when the stranger felt in his pocket, and, after a sweeping investigation, produced a four-bit piece. This the stranger tossed in the air, and it fell on the counter with a dull thud. The mixologist's attention was immediately attracted toward the coin. He looked at it a moment, and then took it between his forefinger and thumb. His countenance changed instantly. He laid the coin down on the bar, and shoved it slowly toward the stranger, remarking indifferently, as he put the half-composed cocktail under the bar, "I can buy 'em for a dollar a pound; bring us something better."

"What do you mean?" asked the stranger, looking from the coin to the mixologist curiously.

"Mean!" replied the man of drinks, "why, that you must take me for an awful fresh to try and shove such a queer 'queer' as this on me. If that's the best you've got, good-bye."

It was now the stranger's turn to examine the coin. He took it up, felt of it, examined it, bit it, and tried to make it ring on the hard-wood counter, but it wouldn't ring. He remarked, however, in a confident tone, "I can't see that that is queer. What ails it?"

The barkeeper took the coin up and felt of it again. It was dull-looking and soapy-feeling. He passed it back again, wearily, and remarked, with the tone of a man who had considered too long a subject of trifling importance, "Take it away; it's the worst I ever saw."

The stranger took it again. He examined it more carefully. "Well, I never thought I would be taken in by a piece of the queer," he remarked, thoughtfully, "and [emphatically] I'll be blanked if I think I hav."

"Oh, no; of course not," said the barkeeper, contemptuously.

The stranger became earnest. He gave the slippery-looking coin another searching glance and then remarked slowly: "Say, mister, I hav said I didn't think I was taken in by a piece of the queer, and I think so yet. Now I'll just bet you a ten that this is a genuine piece of silver."

The barkeeper had a $10 gold piece borrowed from the till and planted on the bar in an instant. The stranger did not say a word, but taking a knife out of his pocket, he coolly proceeded to peel a veneering of silver foil from the coin where it had been stuck to the good silver with soap.

The stranger reached out for the $10 piece, and, as he pocketed it, he remarked slowly:

"Twigez vous? Oui, je twig."

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this work. Price, $1.50.

Situation Wanted.

A gentleman thoroughly conversant with the English, German, French, and Italian languages, quick in figures, writing a good hand, desires a situation as general correspondent in some first-class house. Best of references given, and salary expectations moderate. Address R. Ezdorf, Cleveland, Ohio, 52 Water st. 3t2

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good Doctor is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

Notes and Clippings.

CARDINAL MANNING has had to make an appeal on behalf of some of the clergy, whose congregations are too poor to support them.

THE congregation sang "We are going home to die no more," in a Westfield (Mass.) church, and an irreverent fellow, leaning over to a dyed deacon, said in a loud tone, "Then you'll be gray in a week."

A SCOTCH clergyman, whose habit it was to preach hell-fire to his congregation in large doses, had occasion to visit a poor, sick parishioner. After enlarging with considerable unction on his favorite topic, he said to her, "Now, my dear woman, did you ever appreciate the tortures of the damned before?" "Nae, nae; never till you came here," was the rather equivocal answer.

THE Presbyterian synod of North Carolina hav resolved that public preaching by a woman is opposed to the word of God and the welfare of his people, and advise their church members to giv it no countenance. Wonder if they will continue to allow the women to circulate subscription papers, and get up donations for the benefit of the church. We are oftentimes impelled to ask, "How long, O Lord, how long," will poor deluded woman be controlled by the dictations of old superstitions and the creeds of a barbarous age?—Jewell County Review.

GREAT excitement prevails at New Hampton, Iowa, over a supposed horrible murder. An Adventist preacher named Elder Buck resides near there, and makes a living by revealing secrets which he says are confided to him by spirits. One day last fall a neighbor, hearing screams from the house of Buck, and seeing his wife wringing her hands in agony, looked through the door and saw Buck beating his young son, who was tied to the bed. Since that time the boy has been missing, and as Buck belongs to the same class of religious fanatics as Freeman, of Massachusetts, it is believed that he killed the boy. Mr. Buck declares that the boy ran away. Buck has fled, and the citizens are making an investigation.

HAS an era of mild persecution set in for the Ritualists in this land of religious liberty? A few weeks ago the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Maryland, a pronounced Low Churchman, inhibited a Ritualistic clergyman of English birth from celebrating the sacraments, preaching, or publicly reciting any of the offices of the church within the boundaries of his diocese; and now the Protestant Episcopal Bishop of Long Island, who certainly has never been classed heretofore as a Low Churchman, has, by a similar exercise of authority, closed the lips and put out the candles of another Ritualistic clergyman. Yet it is only a fortnight since the Bishop of Long Island, with five brother bishops, marched behind a procession-cross up to a communion-table hidden by a richly embroidered altar-cloth and illuminated by lighted candles.

COL. R. G. INGERSOLL, in his speech at the suffrage meeting in Washington on Friday evening, Jan. 23d, said: "Our government depends for its stability upon honest elections. The great principle underlying our system of government is that the people hav the virtue and patriotism to govern themselves. That is the foundation-stone, the corner, and the base of our edifice, and upon it our government is on trial to-day. And until a man is considered infamous who casts an illegal vote, our government will not be safe. Whoever casts an illegal vote knowingly is a traitor to the principle upon which our government is founded. And whoever deprives a citizen of his right to vote is also a traitor to our government. When these things are understood, when the finger of public scorn shall be pointed to every man who votes illegally, or unlawfully prevents an honest vote, then you will hav a splendid government."

WE hav heard now and again of men with very small souls, but rhetoric, the rhetoric of indignation, exhausts itself when it declares that "a whole regiment of such souls could wander about in a mustard seed for a century and never come within hearing distance of each other." The better thing, however, is to accept the theory of Darwin, and admit that men hav no souls at all, for what practical use a diminutive particle of immortality, as microscopic as that above mentioned, would be, it might be difficult to say. A long experience with life compels us to admit that there are men whose souls are not large enough to occupy the whole extent of their bodies. The heart especially is never touched by the all-animating substance, and becomes shriveled, dry, and hard in consequence. If it be really true that all men hav souls it is one of the most difficult truths to accept which an over-generous theology imposes.

THE Rev. T. V. Roy, converted Brahmin, has not been having a very good time in Cincinnati since the news got abroad among the pious pork-packers that he has been denounced by the Rev. Dr. Chamberlain of the East India Mission as an impostor and bigamist. When he tried to speak at a gospel temperance meeting a few evenings ago some of the brethren hissed and others sang a hymn to drown his voice. On Sunday afternoon he assisted as side show at an exhibition of healing powers by an alleged doctor and made a speech. The unpleasant things said about him by the missionaries he attributed to doctrinal and sectarian jealousy, which had followed him across the ocean. He admitted that he had been in jail for bigamy, but explained that incident as due to his ignorance of American laws. Then he preached a sermon, and, that over, he wept and asked help to get out of town. After the hat had been passed around, he sang what purported to be Hindoo hymns, by way of showing his gratitude.

THE recent hanging of Swift Runner, an Indian murderer, at Fort Saskatchewan, Canada, was in a temperature of 40 degrees below zero. A gallows had been built out of doors, so that the Indians could see the execution; but when the officers and prisoner arrived at the spot, it was found that most of the scaffold had been used for firewood by the half-frozen crowd. Swift Runner complacently warmed himself at the fire while the gallows was being repaired. When everything else was ready the nervous hangman said he had forgotten to bring a strap to fasten the prisoner's arms and legs. He offered to save further trouble by killing himself with a tomahawk, but his proposition was rejected, and he ate a hearty meal of pemmican, with the noose around his neck, while a messenger was fetching a strap. A priest attempted to giv him spiritual consolation, but he said that the white man's whiskey had ruined him, and so he couldn't believe in the white man's God. He preferred a death dance by his own people, and while they were performing it he was hanged.

ACCORDING to Le Pelerin, an ultramontane periodical, enjoying a large circulation in orthodox French circles, and laying claim to derive its information upon religious subjects from altogether exclusive sources, Pius IX., upon entering Paradise shortly after his demise, was there received with somewhat exceptional honors. We subjoin in literal translation the account of his reception printed in the Pelerin, and purporting to be the faithful reproduction of a communication "received from the highest authority." "When Pio Nono entered Paradise he at once obtained a crown from the hands of the Immaculate Virgin, as a reward for the crown which he had bestowed upon her during his sojourn upon earth. St. Joseph, whom he had made patron and protector of the church, shook him heartily by the hand and thanked him. Then St. Peter gave out the key in which the hymn of welcome was to be sung, and the celestial choir chanted it, while Francis de Sales and Alphonso Liguori, whom he had formerly proclaimed teachers of the church, alternately recited in laudatory terms the deeds and achievements of his Pontificate. Fifty-two saints, and twenty-six of the blessed, all of whom owe their present position to Pius IX., greeted him with harmonious choruses." How nice it must be to hav direct communication with the occupants of the great white throne!

DURING the past eight or ten days there has been the most remarkable succession of remarkable events in regard to clergymen. The Kensico brother's kissing affair may appropriately head the list, while next in the same line of evangelical eccentricity comes the Hoboken pastor's scrape, growing out of his kissing his cook for her spiritual welfare. Bro. Trumbrower has retreated from the dangers and threats of his flock at Hoboken, and has carted his effects to the house of a relative in the City of Churches and church fights. The light shed on the inner workings of the Shepherd's Fold presents Bro. Cowley in a highly unenviable plight. The scandal in Bro. Paul's Second German Baptist church is happily smoothed over, Sister Paul declining to press her charges, and the brethren agreeing to forgive and forget everything. A prominent Presbyterian clergyman is charged with hobnobbing with Unitarians, and some of his associates want to know what is going to be done about it. Bishop Littlejohn has prohibited the Rev. Mr. Sparks from conducting services in the diocese of Long Island. Col. Bob Ingersoll accuses the Rev. Flavius Josephus Cook of lying. A clergyman near Cincinnati spoke from the pulpit censuring his lady organist for going to dancing parties and playing light and trifling music. The lady said nothing in response, but on the following day caught her pastor in the street and horse-whipped him to her heart's content. The colored brethren hav their share of troubles. In Georgia an eloquent preacher fell into a well, where he remained from Saturday until Tuesday, when somebody was kind enough to fish him out. Insult was added to injury by the remark of a rival preacher that the accident had saved somebody's turkey roost from one Sabbath's spoliation. In Brooklyn a colored pastor was arrested at the instance of his wife, on a charge of stealing hens. The hens having been found in some other person's possession, this brother is discharged. In Stonington, Conn., a colored evangelist was brought into court on the charge of keeping an unlicensed dog. This good man took it upon himself to open the court with a fervent prayer.

HOLY KISSES.—The preacher who has lately been tried for doing more kissing than the spiritual condition of his flock required got off with a verdict of "exceedingly imprudent," which, after all, is nearly as bad a thing as can be said about a clergyman in his relations with his feminine parishioners. Naturally there is another verdict, the self-appointed jurors being the husbands and brothers of the ladies who were kissed, and we hav no hesitation in saying that these gentlemen are far more competent, as jurors in such a case, than the seven good pastors who talked and prayed over the affair eighteen hours. There is an ineradicable impression in the minds of all men that preachers, outside of what special endowments they may enjoy while engaged in their professional duties, are of natures and passions like unto other men, and that their kisses, which are generally bestowed according to the dictates of personal taste, are no holier than those of other men. It is useless for pastors to quote the apostolic injunction to greet each other with a holy kiss, for this suggestion was offered for men and women alike, whereas the modern preacher who kisses the male members of his congregation, or even the homely women, is yet to be found. Besides, kissing is a common Oriental method of salutation for all sexes and ages, and the early Christians, who were in hourly anticipation of being flogged at the public whipping-post, fed to lions, or sawn asunder, had little time or inclination to regard a kiss according to its signification among people who consider that the world owes them a good time, and they are going to hav it. Had Peter, Paul, or any of the church fathers dropped in at a church sociable in the course of their journeyings and organized games in which there were forfeits to be paid in kisses their epistles would never hav come down to us. Indeed, were any of the prominent clergymen of New York, in the course of their pastoral visits, to kiss all their lady parishioners, scores of letters on the subject would crowd the Herald's "Complaint Book," and the churches would speedily go into the market for new pastors. Preachers will hav to keep apace with the moral sentiments of the age if they want to be respected, and these sentiments declare that kissing between men and women not closely united by bonds of affection is always grossly indelicate, and generally a great deal worse. No professional or clerical stamp can improve its appearance or save the reputation of those who indulge.—N. Y. Herald.

Discussion.

MR. JAMIESON'S CLOSING SPEECH.—CONTINUED.

Again, I proved that if "love to God and man is enough," it proves too much for the Bible and Christianity, for pagan nations had it centuries before the time of Moses, who is said to have been learned in all the wisdom of the Egyptians. If that principle is enough to prove divine inspiration, then are the pagan bibles divine; then were Yas and Chun, two wise translators in China, who lived more than five hundred years before Moses was born, divinely inspired. It is not, however, because the Bible contains the Golden Rule that we reject it as immoral in its tendency and injurious to society. You Protestants do not reject the Catholic church because it teaches the Golden Rule, do you? To this point I received no answer. It is because the Catholic church teaches other doctrines, and because heathenism teaches other principles, which you cannot accept, that you reject them as systems. It is because the Bible contains so much that is proved to be immoral that we reject it, as a whole, but not any truth which it happens to contain. The mistake you Christians make consists in accepting the whole of it. Hence you feel under obligation to defend every part of it until pressed to the wall in debate; then you throw it all overboard except the heathen Golden Rule.

My friend has objected to my quotations as being made up of single passages. That is the way you quote it and preach from it. No one can quote a whole volume, or even a whole chapter, to get a single point. I always seek to quote the Bible, or any other book, fairly, having no other interest than the truth to serve. My friend's objection is flimsy. I quoted Rev. Justin D. Fulton, who says "isolated texts furnish sure supports of scripture teaching." Says Fulton: "There is no tyranny in isolated texts. From the first page of Genesis to the last of Revelation, scripture sustains isolated texts." "As well might a man say you could not judge of a cable by a single link as to declare you could not judge scripture by a single text." Had you not better call Fulton an Infidel? That is my friend's favorite plan when he finds a Christian against him.

We have given numerous texts to prove our position. In my judgment, not one of them has been met. In every case where he has found fault with the translation, it was a confession that the Bible, as it is, is opposed to him. That is all we ask. When you write a revised, emended Bible, an improvement upon God's infallible volume, we will attend to it. As it is not out yet, we have taken the Bible as it is, and find it wanting, and so do you. When the improved translation does come out, will it be infallible? Can we depend upon it? or will Greek and Hebrew scholars differ about that as they do about this?

We have shown that the Bible is a book of kingcraft as well as priestcraft. Does kingcraft tend to the good of society? You cannot make a genuine American believe it does. "Honor the king," says this book. "There is no power but of God," says this volume. Kings were believed to be divinely appointed. This Bible says they are. "The powers that be are ordained of God." "Whosoever, therefore, resisteth the power, resisteth the ordinance of God: and they that resist shall receive to themselves damnation." According to that doctrine, Washington, Franklin, Adams, are lifting up their eyes in hell this very moment. Instead of obeying the king, they rebelled against him. If the Bible is all true, they are damned, and there is no use of you blinking the fact.

My friend asserted that Draper admits that when Rome was left to Infidelity—"the foul and pestilential breath and contaminating touch of Infidelity," he phrases it—the land was covered with "monsters in crime, in rapacity, in infamy;" a "stewing, simmering, rotten mass of humanity," expressions which have bubbled up in my friend's mouth "seventeenthly." But it is all a mistake. Infidelity never produced such a state of things. He gets such facts (?) from his own fevered imagination. It looks as if he and I were in co-partnership—he to make all the blunders and I to point them out. I assure you that we are not, and that he is serious about them. He says Draper admits that Infidelity in Rome was the cause of the horrible crimes and immoralities there. I have studied Draper carefully, and never, in all his writings, do I find any such statement. Why did he not give us the page? The fact is, as I proved by Huxley and the "History of Science," that it is science, not religion, which blesses and civilizes the world. When the world was overrun with religion, it was also overrun with the rank, poisonous weeds of ignorance. Science is taking the place of both religion and ignorance.

"Christian civilization!" about which we hear so much. It is the veriest cheat ever palmed off on a too confiding public. What was the intellectual and moral condition of Europe under three thousand generations of Christian preaching? Then it was that we discover the monsters of iniquity that so disturbed my friend. He thought they were Infidels, but it turns out that they were Christians. Now, don't get frightened, my friend. Have I not already produced the historic proofs. Certainly I have, but he passed them by, except in a few cases, where he pronounced them false, but gave us no higher authority, which is as high, perhaps, as he could go, in his estimation. These are love-taps that I am giving my genial friend. Draper says it was Christianity that produced the dilapidation of Rome. As I showed (Draper's Conflict, p. 258), papal Rome hated classical Rome. Says Draper, "In a political and theological sense, it was rotten to the core." My friend read, "In an Infidel sense, it was rotten to the core." He had better put on his specs. For a whole week he has been reading everything upside down and backwards, and the only blessed word he could see before his swimming vision was the word "Infidel." But Draper says that Christianity in Rome was the cause of its shocking immoralities, and he says (p. 260), "Let us judge it by its fruits." That was the religion which, he says on the preceding page, "had become the art of plundering the people."

It was the Christianity of that day which gave to the world a "long catalogue of sorrows, wants, sufferings, licentious life, private wickedness, demoralized society." These are Draper's own words, and nothing any Christian can say in denunciation of this great American scientist will tarnish his fair fame because he is honest enough to tell the truth to the damage of Christianity. (Conflict, pp. 264, 265.) In Christian France and England, "modesty or morality" was impossible, and as late as 1430 the houses of the peasantry were "dens of moral and physical pollution swarming with vermin." And he says the condition of the nobles was not much better. Under the Christian influence there was "continually increasing demoralization," says Draper. And this is the author which you tried to prove was in your favor.

If Draper believed that it was Infidelity that produced such a corrupt state of society, his book ought to have been entitled "Conflict Between Infidelity and Science." But, unfortunately for your side, it does not read anywhere near like that. But when Freethought and science came, Christianity began to wane.

My opponent would try to make some of his friends believe that I was unfair in charging most of the leaders of the Reformation with advocating persecution. I could excuse the Roman Catholic church by such reasoning. It could be proved that it existed all through the Dark Ages ostensibly to promote morality. But did she promote it? that is the question. Luther and even the "mild Melancthon," as my friend calls him, Draper says (page 215), "were determined to banish philosophy from the church." Luther vilified the philosophers. Who was Calvin? Was he not a leader of the Reformation? Did he not persecute? Did he not approve of the burning of Servetus? Did not Melancthon write Calvin a letter approving of the persecution? These are historical facts which my opponent has denied. Thus do I show that my learned friend, with his seventeen languages, is wrong at almost every turn. Now, what does Draper say about those leaders? "So far as science is concerned, nothing is owed to the Reformation." "The two rival divisions of the Christian church—Protestant and Catholic—were thus in accord on one point: to tolerate no science except such as they considered to be agreeable to the scriptures" (pp. 215, 217, "Conflict").

In Greece, in Rome, in China, was a civilization that illuminated the minds of millions.

I have quoted from Lecky to show that as Christianity grew, morality weakened; and that what morality there was connected with Christianity was taken from pagans. "A night of mental and moral darkness" set in, says Lecky (History of Morals), as Christianity gained power. Why, my friend, you ought to see yourself that your absurd claims for Christianity can not be sustained. All history is against you. You claim for Christianity what belongs to invention, commerce, science, art, industry, and even climate and race. What are the pious Christian negroes? There are 3,000,000 Christian Abyssinians. Are they civilized? They are semi-barbarians. The population of the Southern states is mainly Christian. In the North, where science and Infidelity abound, there is a higher type of civilization. Where all sorts of "Infidel" notions, as you call them, have a luxuriant growth, there is (as you are obliged to confess) the highest type of civilization. The church became Abolitionist when Abolitionism in the North became popular. In the South Christianity was pro-slavery to the back-bone. Christianity is a Jesuitical thing from instinct. It is all things to all men. It is even a Jew to gain a Jew, a Gentile to gain a Gentile, a Polygamist to gain a Polygamist. It unfairly claims all the good it could not kill, and begs to be excused from all the crimes that it encouraged.

The Religion of Fashion.

NEW YORK, Jan. 12, 1880.

TO THE EDITOR OF TRUTH, Sir: I earnestly hope that your paper will be a grand unparalleled success, and that its influence throughout the land in the cause of "truth" and "honesty" will far exceed that which your most vivid imagination may hav pictured, but I feel justified in stating that you hav no grounds upon which to build even hopes of success if you allow articles to be published of the character of that one which appears in your issue of this date, entitled "False Religion." If you hav any hope of awakening public opinion on matters involving questions of such great magnitude and importance, you will most assuredly be compelled to treat the subject in a very different and less obnoxious manner, both to public and private thinkers. The attack on Dr. Hall is pernicious and gross in the extreme, and the whole article displays more ignorance and lack of experience than is usual in an attempt to work a reform.

If the article referred to may be taken as a fair indication of the principles upon which your paper is to be established, then there is probably no doubt but that you will hav the opportunity of not only seeing "Bob" Ingersoll on the day of judgment, but of enjoying his society some number of days thereafter. Very respectfully, R. K. INGALLS.

The editor of Truth can conceive of no better company to be in on the Judgment Day than that of Bob Ingersoll. When the just man appears before his Maker and bares his heart, there will be something found there much purer, much nobler, much cleaner than will be found in the hearts of most fashionable ministers of God's gospel. We do not know and do not care whether the theories of Bob Ingersoll are or are not correct. We know no more of the theories of Dr. Hall than he chooses to publicly tell every Sunday from his pulpit. We judge men by their doings toward their fellow-men. We prefer to judge a man by his practice, not by his professions. If Bob Ingersoll believes it well to demonstrate the inconsistencies of the Bible, he has full as good a right as Dr. Hall to cover up those inconsistencies, and attempt to explain them away by arguments as childish as those of Ingersoll are irresistible.

Our correspondent has as good a right to his religious convictions as either. But he goes beyond the limits of polite argument when he characterizes our remarks about Dr. Hall as "coarse and vulgar." We simply don't believe in this man, We say that his whole life is an indictment of his professions. We say that riches do not become a minister of the Christian faith; that luxury is not the ideal which a professing Christian should seek. And we further say that Dr. Hall's sermons are commonplace in the extreme, and not worth the money that is paid for them. In all this we only take Hall as a type of his kind. He is neither the best nor the worst of that kind.

Probably we should define our standing on this matter in as few words as possible. There are some six hundred or seven hundred ministers in this city who get well paid for nothing else than to save our souls in eternity. If these six hundren or seven hundred ministers or any one of them will prove conclusively and definitely: 1. That we hav souls, and 2. What these souls are made of, and 3, What becomes of them—if, we say, these three propositions can be demonstrated within a given time—we shall even allow them a year—then shall we see the usefulness of these men. So long as they cannot demonstrate these things, we insist that they are earning their living on false pretenses, and deserving of no more respect than the pagan priests, who hav this advantage over our own—that they believe what they practice. In one word, all men but ministers sell something substantial—something we can feel, or eat, or wear. Ministers merely sell words and advice, and both words and advice are upon a subject of which they absolutely know no more than their hearers. And yet, we hav respect for those men who, abrogating all the pomp and show and glitter of this world, incur danger, toil incessantly, and go about among the poor and suffering, inspired by their faith that is pure, simple, and which, mistaken or not though it be, is admirable. But, as much as we respect these, do we despise those who make of the Word of God a stepping-stone to riches, fame, and luxury.

These are the kind we rail against—men of no sincerity and often of little brains. Our correspondent may not like our course. It may not be the popular one to pursue, but it is honest, and open and heartfelt. Nothing to us seems a greater farce than the attention lavished upon these paid professors of religion, and the servile adulation which is paid them by men who believe as we do and hav not the courage to say so.

Can a Cow Reason?

Once I sat in the door of a house, looking across the street to another house, in front of which was a little gate, kept shut by a chain and weight on the inside. I saw a cow come walking along between that fence and the sidewalk. She walked up to the gate, inserted her left horn between the pickets of the gate and then stepped back, slowly and gently pulling the gate open about forty-five degrees. She then slipped her horn out and caught at the gate with her right horn, but the horn hit the edge of the gate, slipped off, and the gate went shut. She stepped up to the gate again, did the same thing again, and this time caught the gate with her right horn, swung it open, and went in.

The Postal and Kindred Laws.—The Great Principle at Issue.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Looking entirely beyond Mr. Bennett and all other persons, there is a principle involved in the postal laws which is of vital importance to the people of this land. So far as the principle is concerned it matters not whether Mr. Bennett is at liberty or in prison; whether he was rightfully or wrongfully convicted under the law as it exists; whether he is dead or whether he is alive; whether he ever wrote love-letters, or what his personal character may be. And it is important that in the discussion of these side issues the great principle at the base of the whole matter be not lost sight of.

The principle and the true ground is that legislation on the subject of morals is wholly beyond the province of the government of the United States. The government, through the postal service, is simply a common carrier for the convenience of the whole people, and it has no right to establish any rule of morals as governing the character of the matter that it will carry. In the enactment of the postal laws ostensibly against obscene literature, it does assume to establish such a standard. So does it in the law against lottery communications. So in the law against abusive letters. If it may prescribe a moral standard that shall exclude one class of matter from the mails, it may extend the list and exclude any class of matter that a majority in Congress may regard as immoral. The government war against polygamy is of the same class. The laws on this subject are justified by those who demand them on the ground that polygamy is immoral, and that the authority of the United States, being supreme in the territories, may suppress polygamy in Utah. It is conceded that Congress would hav no power over this subject in a state. Admitting that Congress has the moral right to legislate against polygamy in Utah, it has an equal moral right to legislate against it in the states (should it exist in any state) and would only be prevented from so doing by the want of political power. But having both moral right and practical jurisdiction over the territories, it has equal moral right and practical jurisdiction over the mails, and if it may legislate directly against polygamy in Utah, it may legislate indirectly against it in Utah or in any state by excluding its publications from the mails. It exercises this same principle with reference to lotteries, because lotteries are legalized institutions in some states.

There is discernable in this class of legislation an insidious and dangerous purpose and design. By invoking the power of Congress first to legislate upon specific subjects, against the merits of which perhaps no objection can be urged, it is hoped and intended to establish the precedent on which the range of subjects may be indefinitely extended. For myself, I hav only contempt, abhorrence, and loathing for impurity and depravity, whether in thought or in expression, but I believe that the cure for these things will be found in the advancing moral sense of mankind, and not in legislation; and I am not willing to concede the principle involved in the postal laws against inpure literature by remaining silent, lest somebody may make a personal application of my opposition to it. I believe that lotteries are generally swindles, and so are many things that pass for legitimate business, but it is more than the government can undertake to do to protect mankind from all the snares and pitfalls of life. Personally, I know nothing about Freelove or polygamy, or the practices of the Oneida community, but I shall maintain the same right on the part of the advocates of those theories and practices to the use of the mails in discussing and disseminating them that I would claim for myself regarding any opinion of my own. For the principle once conceded, and any publication coming under the vague term of Infidel may be denounced as immoral and placed under the ban. So might any theory that should attack the established order of things or propose any innovation whatever, and thus would be an end of all progress.

And this should be the bed rock of opposition to this species of legislation. The trap is adroitly set. As I said before, by invoking legislation against things that are indefensible or obnoxious in themselves, the enemies of free speech hope to secure acquiescence in a principle that they can apply to extirpate the modern heresies that are the touchstone of modern progress.

Suppose that ten per cent of the people should come under the ban of the laws against impure literature, or against lotteries, or against polygamy, and the other ninety per cent should say they must be hanged, and hang them accordingly—for mark you, the decree of punishment should logically be equal to the prevention of the offense. Suppose that ten per cent of the remainder should believe in Freelove or the practices of the Oneida Community, and the ninety per cent should join in hanging them. Suppose that another ten per cent should believe that the divine laws ought to be liberalized, and the ninety per cent who adhere to the canon law on the subject of marriage should unite in hanging them. Apply the same law to those who deny the divine authority of the Bible, to those who believe that all religions are a delusion and a myth, to those who believe that women hav equal rights with men, and to other what may be called modern ideas and isms. and the process of decimation would soon reduce the population so that not more than ten per cent of its orignal number would remain. These would be presumed to be very pure saints, but they would still pull each others' hair and pluck each others' beards over the question whether men should wear long hair or short hair, or full beards or no beards at all. And this is the tendency and this the design. Not that men shall be literally hanged, but that thought shall be hanged and crucified and stifled. The only safety for the advocates of Freethought and its right of expression is to hang together—or they will hang separately. (Vide Dr. Franklin.)

The tendency to centralism in the federal government is apparent, and in some directions it cannot be successfully resisted, even if it ought to be. I believe in centralism for the benefit, the comfort, and the convenience of the whole people, but not for the oppression of any of the people. And there is where we should draw the line, and on that line we should fight the battle unitedly and to the end.

A Little Lecture.

BY M. BABCOCK.

Ladies and Gentlemen Readers of The Truth Seeker: No, I don't say there is no God, no devil, no heaven, no hell, but I do say that I hav never seen either, nor hav I ever seen anybody that has. There may be one God, three Gods, or probably there may be a thousand Gods; I neither affirm nor deny; I only say that I don't know anything about it. And I also say that in my judgment it is not fair to damn a man for not believing until he first shall hav had some evidence on which to found his faith.

No, I don't say there is no existence after death, but I say that in my judgment it is not fair to disturb a dead man's bones and force them to liv again without first having consulted him as to his wishes about it.

Man comes into the world like an animal and goes out of the world like an animal. The same laws which govern the reproduction of the animal species also govern the reproduction of the human species.

We are told that man has a soul. Well, suppose that he has; is he any better for it? The fact is that men who are said to hav been possessed of souls hav been more ferocious than ever were wild beasts; they hav, with the halter, ripping-knives, dungeons, racks, thumbscrews, swords, and the fagot, drenched the earth with the blood and tears of their own species.

The question now is, If man had no soul and no hope of a life beyond this world, would he not be as loving, kind, and merciful as he now is? We know of men who hav no hope or desire for an existence after death, nor do they believe that they hav a soul, and yet they are the very best of men; they are willing that every one shall enjoy his own opinions, and they hav no use for instruments of torture. Then I ask, Which is the better man of the two?

The belief in an immortal soul has set men to raising hell in this world as a means of saving their souls from hell in the next world. Five millions of human beings were burned, tortured, and put to death by the Holy Inquisition as a means of saving precious souls. Could men without souls, or wild beasts without souls, hav perpetrated such hellish acts?

"The past rises before me like a dream." I fancy that now I can hear the screams and groans of agony; that through the smoke and flame I see the shriveling, writhing forms of thousands of poor, pitiable creatures, who, with pale, upturned, tearful faces, are in vain begging to men who "hav souls," and to the God who gave them, for mercy and deliverance.

We are told that God is just and that he answers prayer. Then why did he not answer the prayers and come to the relief of those poor, helpless creatures?

A God having the power to save, but refusing to do so, serenely contemplating from his "throne of mercy" the burning with fire the bodies and souls of his own make in this world, in my judgment, is capable of seeing them burned with fire in another world. And I am frank to say that I hav no respect for such a God.

This belief in a God, devil, heaven, hell, soul, and life after death, has caused more misery than all other causes combined.

But where does the good man get his information about these strange places and things of which I hav no knowledge? Why, all that he knows about it he gets from a book; and with a long, solemn face, he tells you that this book is the word of God. And I tell you that, in my judgment, it is the work of man; it is the offspring of superstition; the product of an orthodox egg, born of fear, cowardice, and a desire on the part of its makers, with its infamous dogma of an eternal hell, to scare men into supporting the priest and the church, and well hav they succeeded.

No one can tell the sex, form, size, or quality of the soul.

If I could be permitted, in my own way, to be the executioner of a murderer, for the sake of the experiment I would hav him repent and become a good Christian. But instead of jerking his soul into glory with a rope, I would hav a large glass jar made like a fruit can, and I would then put the victim into the can, put in some brimstone and sulphur, and then set it on fire, and screw on the cork, so that it would be air-tight. The man would gnash his teeth in torment; in fact, I would hav a good Christian soul enduring the torments of hell. The victim would soon die for the want of air and on account of too much hell.

I've got the body, but where, oh, where, is the soul? The soul is either something or nothing, and, if nothing, there is nothing to talk about; but if it is something, I've got it; and, in my judgment, Gabriel might blow his horn till the day of pancakes and he never could get that soul without a can-opener. But as I said at the outset, I don't know anything about it. It may be that a soul as big as an ox can go through a hole no bigger than the point of a needle; but reason would teach me that it would be a very small soul that could pass through such a hole.

Some say that the soul is a spirit. And, pray, what is a spirit? Some say that it is the mind, the think. Well, a dog has a mind and can think; then why, and who can, say that the dog has not got a soul as well as a man?

The imagination of a child can create a black bear out of a black stump by the roadside; and when he becomes a man he can create, by the aid of superstition, ghosts, gods, devils, heavens, hells, souls, and spirits. Investigation showed that when a child he was mistaken; and when a man, if he would investigate, I think that he would find that he had made a greater mistake than when he was a child.

Lake Pepin, Minn.—Home.

A week's rest at home on the pleasant banks of Lake Pepin. I hav traveled East, West, North, and South, and never found so beautiful a spot as this. Three years ago Mrs. Jamieson and myself selected a strip of land gently sloping down to the water's edge; since then we hav built a pleasant dwelling under the direction of my old-time friend, Dr. Lont, Mazeppa, Minn., and Mr. I. Norton, builder. Our home overlooks lovely Lake Pepin. This magnificent body of water is three miles wide—the widest portions three and a half miles—and twenty-eight miles long. It is very deep, clear, of a bluish cast; pebbly shores, thousands of agate, amethyst, and carnelian gems glittering in the sun beams, and dashing waters foaming and spraying upon the long, winding beach. On both sides of the lake—I say both sides because its inlet is the majestic Mississippi and its outlet the same noble "Father of Waters"—are the famous bluffs, the most beautiful forms in which nature molds hill or mountain—bold, massive, imposing, projecting banks of rounded rock and earth nearly perpendicular, rising four hundred feet high in stately grandeur from the lake's brink. There they stand, along the Wisconsin and Minnesota states, as far as the eye can reach, monuments of the ages, chiseled by the hand of nature, looking like long lines of solemn sentinels. Amid such surroundings, unsurpassed in beauty by the attractive and world-renowned palisades of the romantic Hudson, Lake Pepin sits in regal beauty, queen of the charming, sky-tinted lakes, for which Minnesota is celebrated, rivaling Como of Italy and Lake Geneva of Switzerland. Exquisitely grand and beautiful is its scenery. From each new standpoint new beauties burst upon the enraptured vision like a masterpiece of painting in different lights. In this peculiar feature, of variety of landscape, Lake Pepin is indescribable. Let us mount the bluffs. Puffing, but not tired—rather exhilarated—we reach the top. There is a picture never by human artist equaled! We are looking from the four-hundred-feet-elevations back of Lake City. At our backs are the undulating prairies; north, east, and west, the towering bluffs on the Wisconsin side; midway the crystal flood—the rolling, silvery sheen, sparkling in its sunshine splendors; on the Wisconsin shore, six miles above us, looms the most famous bluff of this entire region—Maiden Rock, four hundred and twelve feet high.

On so grand a scale has nature carved these blocks that Maiden Rock appears to be, in the clear atmosphere of this breezy, health-giving land, but about three miles away, instead of six. The experiment of a journey to it, as I hav found, effectually dispels the illusion. As we approach it there is a growing appearance of a frowning front of a gigantic embattlement.

From the top of that dizzy hight, Wenona, a beautiful Indian maiden (it would spoil the legend to imagine she was not pretty), wildly flung herself into the raging waters below, because her stern father—a chief, of course—would not permit her to wed a young French lover, but insisted upon her marrying a scalping savage of his own choice. Whether the young Indian woman was pretty or ugly, of one thing I am certain, that she was exceedingly muscular, and agile as a deer, if she made that jump into Lake Pepin, for Maiden Rock is several rods from the lake, and the water glides along now where it did then, or probably not more than three or four rods nearer, anyway, and so small a matter as forty or fifty feet in a single jump should never interpose its prosaic length to spoil a poetic love-leap.

A Letter from Mrs. Slenker.

Dear Truth Seeker: I hav just read our beloved editor's last sad letter from "behind the bars," and I write at once to say I will take a copy of his forthcoming book, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," and I hope every one who feels able to do so will respond immediately with the same good news, and thus do a little to cheer and gladden his heart. I only wish I was able to order five hundred copies to giv away. It is a book everyone will read with eagerness and avidity What can be more interesting than a history of the gods and religions of the world? I really believe it will be the most valuable book that has yet come from the facile and fertile pen of D. M. Bennett. Paine and Taylor wrote their best books in prison, and it is there that our brave hero is penning his. Shall we who are glad and happy fail to do so little as to furnish three dollars towards showing our appreciation of his labors? No, no! it shall not be! It is from this time a settled fact that this book is a success. The orders are coming in "Thick as budding leaves or rising flowers,

O'erspread the land when spring descends in showers."

Hopefully, Elmina D. Slenker.

Liberals Must Be United.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: In the opinion of those who hav the best opportunity of judging, there are at least four or five millions of Spiritualists in the United States, and with few exceptions they are Freethinkers. There are, at least, as many more Materialists, such as claim that they can find no evidence, either in or out of the Bible, of a future life. They are all Freethinkers. Then we hav many distinguished as Free Religionists—and another organization assuming the name of the Religion of Humanity—all Freethinkers. Now is there any good reason why these different forces should be operating in classes, separate and apart? Only on one point is there any essential disagreement among all these different sects, and that is, some believe in a future life, while others believe with Job, "that they that go down to the grave shall come up no more." Now, at least one-half of the present body of Spiritualist are converts from Materialism; and at least four out of five of those calling themselves Materialists are exceeding'y anxious to find proofs of a life beyond the grave; as a general thing Materialists are anxious to hear, and as willing to pay lecturers on Spiritualism as they are those of their own belief. We are well aware that occasionally a bigot shows his head among Materialists, and is disposed to treat with contempt all those who differ from him in belief, and we believe that about as many Spiritualists can be found who are equally wise in their own conceit, and so we propose to let them stand, one on each side of the equation, and balance each other; and when they get tired of standing in that way, let them be eliminated and go back into some church which is more congenial to their present state of development. I hav been a Spiritualist for thirty years, and I long ago made the discovery that men and women must become Freethinkers before they could believe in Spiritualism. As long as they recognize the Bible as containing a special revelation from God, and the only revelation in regard to a future life that God ever has or ever will make to the world of humanity, they can not, as a matter of course, accept anything claiming a spiritual origin unless it harmonize with the Bible as they understand it. For their Bible assures them that Satan can work miracles almost equal to his creator; in fact, Paul assures them that he is endowed with all power and lying wonders, and hence it is easy for them to believe that all the spiritual phenomena are of the devil. Now, those called Materialists are making more Freethinkers, and hav been for the last five years, than the Spiritualists, and so you see it is evident that they are all the time manufacturing the raw material, and the only material out of which Spiritualists can be made; and when they become Freethinkers they will at once turn their attention to the Spiritual phenomena; and, as I said before, four-fifths of them are anxious to find proofs of immortal life. Now, if there is any other point upon which there is any essential disagreement among all these divisions of Liberals, I am not aware of it. If any one knows of any we hope he will at once inform us. We all agree that the Christian Bible is, like all other bibles, the work of men; and that it contains in no sense of the word a special revelation of God, that those who are not Christians should hav precisely the same rights and privileges as Christians enjoy; that all should be allowed to testify for the protection of their own rights and those of others, whether they believe in one God, or in no God; that all hav a right to publish and disseminate their opinions and conclusions as they may think proper upon all questions touching the welfare of mankind; that science, not superstition, should be taught in our public schools. We all recognize the importance of arousing the people to a realizing sense of the dangers which are threatening the very life of our republican institutions. The enemies of our free institutions are increasing by thousands every year; nearly seven millions of our population consider the decrees of the Vatican the voice of God, and if this element shall increase for twenty-five years to come at the same ratio as it has for the twenty-five years just past, it will be able to rule this nation, and be ready at the first signal of the Pope of Rome "to toss our laws and liberties in air." Protestantism, divided into a hundred sects, and every year losing its influence over the people, presents but a feeble barrier to the growing power of Romanism. And their most formidable weapon, an endless hell, the staff on which they hav leaned so long, and which in part has been their main dependence, their chief stock in trade, is soon, by mutual consent, to be laid aside, and then there will be nothing to keep them from falling. The most superstitious and conservative will fall into the embraces of the mother church, while the others will work by slow degrees into the Liberal ranks.

Liberals, this is no time for us to fight with each other or to divide our forces on an ism. A crisis is at hand which involves the interest of all the different elements of Freethought alike. A battle is to be fought between supernaturalism and Freethought; in truth, it has already commenced. The Pope of Rome is now attacking one of the strongest bulwarks of freedom, our public schools, and Protestants are determined to force their Bible into them. Bishops of the Catholic faith are openly, in their leading periodicals, asserting their determination and their right to rule this nation, and boldly declaring their opposition to the freedom of speech and the freedom of the press; and yet our people sleep. Even those claiming to be Liberals are many of them so much absorbed in the worship of mammon that they seem to hav lost their souls, if they ever had any, and they probably never arouse from their lethargy until they hear the music of the implements of the Inquisition rattling around their necks. And so strong and powerful has this religious despotism become in our midst that politicians tremble at its nod, and when they ask for special favors they are readily granted. Already they hav millions of money invested in church property exempt from taxation. Their churches are springing up as by magic in every city and village. Village merchants, ambitious for the increase of wealth and population of their own little town, subscribe largely to help build their churches. Thus the people of this country are fostering, encouraging, and helping build up religious monarchy in our midst, a despotism the most cruel and relentless that ever cursed humanity.

And thus we are nursing and protecting a population who consider the commands of she Pope of Rome as the highest earthly authority, who are making use of the liberties we giv them to destroy our own. We cannot call them hypocrites, for these foreign emissaries of Rome openly own to the fact that they hav moved into this temple of liberty for the express purpose of converting it to their own use. They very politely say to us, We thank you, gentlemen, for furnishing us such ample facilities for cutting your throats.

Friends of Freethought, our duties are plain, and we hav no time to be idle. Our isms will all share the same fate whether a Catholic or Protestant despotism shall assume the control of our nation. We do not intend to be understood as recommending that Spiritualists should cease to advocate their doctrines, or that the Materialists or Free Religionists should drop all interest in their different plans of work, whatever they may be, but that we should all act as one body of Freethinkers; that we should all labor to make Freethinkers. A nation of Freethinkers can never be enslaved, neither will they ever persecute or labor to curtail the rights of others.

Marriage Discussed by a "Freelover."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There seems to be a growing interest in the minds of Liberals on the marriage question. Now, will you giv a little space to one who is not a writer but a young soldier in the ranks of Liberalism, and who thinks she has solved the marriage question through trials and sufferings?

I was born and educated in a Christian home, and taught to regard Infidels as children of Satan. At the early age of seventeen I married a man like myself in the church; but he was connected with the press and had imbibed quite a number of Liberal ideas, and we talked them over.

For six years I led a quiet, comfortable life, yet I felt it was not the ideal existence I had pictured. There was a something lacking, I knew not what. At this time my husband died, though we had never quarreled, and our relations had always been pleasant. I felt as if a weight had been lifted from me. I immediately set to work to study the question and try to analyze why I felt this relief, and I found that I had been bound in chains and that freedom came only when the manacles were stricken off.

Yes, all marriage under the present system is slavery. True, in some instances, the chains are the silken ones of love; yet it is a chain, whatever it is made of, and it chafes and irritates.

One of the great evils of our marriage system is the sense of ownership which exists on both sides—the feeling of I own you; by law I can hold you. Everything in this world loses a great deal of its value to the individual when he comes into possession of it, no matter how hard he has to strive to obtain it. When he can say, "It is mine," its value decreases to him. Some one has truly said that "love is pursuit;" so when the chase is ended and the game bagged it becomes simply a dead thing. Marriage is the end of the chase; the love was the bright, bounding deer; the wife becomes the dead thing caught and owned.

This is not so apt to be the case where two persons form a union based on love alone. This is the highest type of such relationship, for, to quote Mr. Wakeman, "union by love first, by law second." If the only bond between them is love—love in its highest, truest, purest sense—they will always be kind to each other while that love lasts.

Now, I do not want this article to appear as a tirade against marriage. I think to some people marriage is necessary; and to those I say, "Enter into it carefully, making love the basis; be a gentle, kind, ministering spirit, putting aside all idea of ownership, striving to increase rather than decrease the love that binds you."

But there is a large class to whom marriage is repulsive on the ground of the old motto, "A burnt child dreads the fire." These people must be permitted to form their relations without ceremony, but their unions must only be formed on the highest possible grounds; no licentious, mercenary, or base motive of any kind must enter into these unions. How dare a woman say she loves a man when seeking her own good at his expense? The feeling inspiring her is not love, and the sacred word should not be so misused. Love is the regnant force in social life, sired by wisdom and born of truth. Love stimulates enterprise and renders statutes useless when the highest power governs the state.

Richter says, "Love is self-satisfying; he whom love alone does not satisfy cannot hav been filled with it." Therefore unions based on love aloue cannot fail to be blessed and happy. These unions must be recognized and respected by society, and the independent women forming them must be (to quote once more from Mr. Wakeman) "sustained by every one who claims to be a member of this great family of humanity; she shall choose her own partners and decide who shall be the father of her children."

And here comes in the question of family. It is said by the orthodox folks that we Radicals are going to destroy the family. Not so. Far be it from me to strike a blow at it. All we want to do is to eliminate what is wrong in it. 'Tis said the family is the type of selfishness. It has been, but we propose to become altruistic, and instead of my family and my children make it our family, our children. Let us make it a higher, purer type of relation, but do not let us put it away. The family has been the great conservator of our national strength. Let us keep all that is good in it, eliminating only the bad.

And to hav a perfect family there should be no children born but those of love. Children conceived and born in love will be welcome little strangers. Nurtured in love their natures will expand and develop, and who cares if these little blessings come without mummery of a surpliced priest? A couple who love each other are already married, themselves being the witnesses and love the high-priest. No other ceremonial is required by nature, and no amount of leave-asking or ceremony can marry those whom love has already joined, nor can any human law marry those whom love has not joined.

Randolph says, "Ceremonial marriage is a profanation to hearts that really love; ask no leave or license of priest or justice; ask it only of your own hearts. Such a marriage will develop its divinest joys, and no human soul can seal the battlements of thought like one winged and plumed with such a love, one in which physical passion is as the cobble-stones to a frowning mountain; it will kindle up flames too white and pure for wicked eyes, joys too vast for the sensualist's power of conception."

Michelet says, "Children should be the fruit of liberty and love; it is of voluntary love that heroes hav been born."

Thus the family should be a union of love where discord will be unknown. But this can only be done through freedom, all being left free to form their relations in the manner that to them seemeth best; and when such relations are formed they must be lived up to in such a way as to command the respect of all, Thus only can we find that purity which is essential to the bringing forth of a better type of the human race; for again, in the words of Mr. Wakeman, "free-love is purity, slave-love impurity."

My experience has taught me that there is more happiness in an "unlegalized than a legalized union;" therefore for myself I hav chosen the position of the independent woman, because I think it best suited to myself, and in that way I am trying to liv "the higher life;" but let no one think it is a path of roses; there may be some roses, but there are also many thorns. I hav to meet the slights, sneers, and contempt of many who take a far lower ground for their life than I do, and even those who are loudest in their praises of the position I am filling as one of the essentials of the new system. They also treat me with injustice and contumely; but I liv in hope that they will learn to practice what they preach, and I remember there never was a night so dark as to hav hindered the coming day, nor a storm so furious as to prevent the approach of sunshine. Therefore I will wait for my justification; but in the mean time let me call on the women throughout the country to be strong in their sense of the right, hav the courage of their opinions, liv up to their convictions, and let the world be benefited in their having lived in it.

The Bacon Liquor License Imbroglio.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Inclosed find a copy of L. W. Bacon's speech, entitled "A Crime Against Society," which has created quite a sensation among sensible sinners on account of the extravagant and abusive language used and the well-known bellicose bent of this divine defamer's meddlesome mind, and which has caused considerable religious recrimination among the champion Christians of rival churches, since both the accuser and accused are devout disciples of that divine dogma denominated "the bloody atonement."

While the speech was in type for publication in Cooley's Weekly, the editor was formally forbidden to publish the same. But failing to intimidate the proprietor, and thereby prevent its publication, the following bull was served on our newsdealers:

Norwich, Conn.

Gentlemen: This is to notify you that you are warned not to sell any copies of the speech of L. W. Bacon, delivered in Breed Hall, in this city, on Monday evening, January 19, 1880, and entitled "A Crime against Society." This speech has been copyrighted, and any sale by you of a printed edition will expose you to the penalties provided by the laws of the United States. Yours, etc.,

Brown & Perkins,
Attorneys for L. W. Bacon.

But since his "gospel tent" tirade against the excursions of sacreligious Sunday sinners was printed by the thousand for gratuitous distribution to warn pious people concerning the alarming encroachment of custom and common sense on the old blue, sectarian Sunday laws; since his saintly slang against D. M. Bennett, the Spiritualists, Free Religionists, Freelovers, and Infidels in general, was, through his instigation, freely published to "protect the good name of this town and defend the purity of families and schools;" and since at the time the speech was publicly delivered and until the eve of its publication there had been no intimation of a contemplated copyright; therefore resolved by the knowing ones that the employers of this reverend religionist—especially since they had insisted that he should avoid personalities—may hav intimated their decided disapproval of his intemperate attacks on men whose reputation for honor has hitherto stood at least as high as his own.

Possibly, in view of Bennett's little experience, he (Bacon) may hav become alarmed, upon reconsidering his gross, public advertisement of brothels and bawdy-houses in said speech, by finding himself thereby exposed to the obscene action of the Comstock laws. Hence it seems evident that the attempt to interdict its circulation was not a matter of pecuniary consideration, but rather that the copyright dodge was enacted as an afterthought—a clerical coup de main for suppressing its publicity.

The Remedy for Hard Times.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: There are in this country, and in all other so-called civilized nations, two opposite and distinct classes of people. One, a minority class that feel they hav a right to rule and gain offices of trust and power and liv in pomp and splendor out of another class of people that are and hav been bound down as slaves to this minority.

Now, let us see if we cannot erect a standard system, that this state of things can be somewhat removed by the use of a little common sense and intelligence. Now let us suppose these two classes of people are in one group or mass, and let us suppose that the larger class, who hav been bound down as serfs and slaves to this minority class of drones and tyrants, erect a standard of distinction and address those sleek tyrants of leisure and abundance in this wise and practice it with intelligence: "Why do you stand apart from us? Are you not human beings like ourselves, with the same rights and wants?"

"No, they reply, "you are the laboring classes and not of our number. We are a privileged class. We make laws and hav customs and rights peculiar to ourselves."

Laboring Class: "What labor do you perform in society?"

Sleek Tyrants: "None. We hav so ordained it that we do not labor."

Laboring Class: "How, then, hav you acquired your wealth?"

Sleek Tyrants: "By scheming and taking pains to govern you."

Laboring Class: "To govern us! Is this what you call governing? We toil, and you enjoy what we produce, and you dissipate and squander. Wealth flows from us, and you suck and absorb it. Sleek tyrants, you are a class distinct from the working people: form a nation apart and govern yourselves."

Then said some of them amongst the sleek group, "Let us join the working classes and partake of their burdens, for they are men like ourselves." Others replied: "To mix with the working herd would degrade us; they are born to serve us. The civil governors said the working people were mild and servile. Let us speak to them in the name of the President and the law and they will return to their duty."

Governors: "The President and governors ordain and decree."

Working People: "The President and governors cannot ordain or decree anything the safety of the people does not demand. The President has a right to ordain and decree only what is in accordance with the rights of the people."

Governors: "The law calls upon you for submission."

Working People: "The law is the will of a majority, and we will a new order."

Governors: "You are, in that case, rebels."

Working People: "A majority of the people cannot be rebels. Tyrants are only rebels."

Governors: "We, in the name of the law, call on you to submit."

Working People: "The governors and the law cannot be separated from the nation in which they remain."

Then the military advanced, and they said, "The working people are timorous; we will threaten them with force."

Soldiers: "We chastise you and order you to disperse in peace."

Working People: "Soldiers, our blood flows in your veins. Will you strike your brothers? If the working people be destroyed, who will maintain the army?"

The soldiers then grounded their arms and said to their officers, "We are a part of the people, and we cannot be called upon to fight against them."

Then the ecclesiastical priests said: "There is but one more resource left. The working people are superstitious. We will threaten them with God, hell, and the devil."

Priests: "Our dear beloved brethren, our children, God has appointed us to teach and govern you."

Working People: "Produce the patent of his commission."

Priests: "You must hav faith and believe. Reason leads men into guilt and damnation."

Working People: "Would you govern us without reason or justice?"

Priests: "God is a God of peace; he and religion enjoin you to obey."

Working People: "Justice and right go before peace. Obedience implies a law. Render us the necessary cognizance of it. Show us the example of suffering."

Priests: "Would you liv without gods, presidents, and governors?"

Working people: "They are too expensive. We abjure tyranny of every kind."

Priests: "You must hav mediators who may act in your behalf."

Working People: "Mediators with God and mediators with the President. Courtiers, governors, and priests, you are too tyrannical and despotic; henceforth we take our affairs into our own hands."

Then the sleek, smaller group exclaimed: "It is over with us. The working people are enlightened and intelligent."

And the working people replied: "We are, but you shall not be hurt. We will commit no violence. We desire nothing but our rights and liberty. We were serfs and slaves. We might now command and govern, but we ask only to be free, and free we are. We hav now freed ourselves from parasites and tyrants. We must prevent forever the revival of their power and tyranny."

Now let us select some of the most intelligent and the most experienced men out of our own body to investigate, enact, and establish laws and regulations for a new state of society. The selection being made, the working people addressed their delegates as follows:

"We hav hitherto lived in a society formed by chaos or chance, without fixed clauses, without free conventions, without stipulation of rights, without mutual engagements, which has formed a multitude of disorders and evils which hav caused the most confused state of things. Our object is now, with mature deliberation, to form a regular compact. We make choice of you, some of the most intelligent and wise out of our body, to draw of draft articles of it. Examine, then, with care what are to be its basis and principles. Then communicate to us equitable laws and rules for action, for we feel that the principles which hav hitherto guided us are corrupt. We hav selected you from amongst us to publish your code of laws and rights, and if they are satisfactory we will conform to them. But remember that you are citizens like ourselves, and that the power which we confer upon you belongs to us; that we giv it in trust for which you are responsible, not as exclusive property or hereditary right; that the law which you make you will be the first to submit to. So, then, tomorrow you will form state and territorial governments, and shall form a compact with each other for each other's interest, and in case of any invasion, or any other emergency, we shall be able to meet it. And you governors shall hold your situations as long as you conform to the rights and wishes of us. But if any of you should abuse that trust that has been conferred upon you, you shall be dismissed at once and others selected to take your places. But in order to hav everything more complete, as soon as it will become more practicable we shall hav to take special care and great interest in raising up future generations, for by so doing we shall continue to improve the race, by selecting the best stock of human beings to raise children from, the same as we do to raise the best stock or breeds of animals. When this is done, and strictly adhered to with a good rational, scientific, and moral education, we shall hear no more of priestcraft, government-plunder, misery, tyranny, poverty, and hard times, or, more properly speaking, a pandora or a pandemonium in this country."

I am, Mr. Editor, with all due respect, the well-wisher of the human race, J. PETTY.

The Wisconsin Legislature.

The Legislature of this state has certain duties to perform whereby alone it can redeem the good name of Wisconsin and restore it to respectability among her sister commonwealths. Among those duties is, principally, the repeal of the infamous tramp law. This law is a disgrace to civilization, an outrage on a free people, inhuman in conception, and infernal in execution. Less than a month ago an aged man was murdered in accordance with its provisions. If those who made such a cruel deed possible hav no pricking of conscience, they are less human than the average man. If there are any of those gentlemen in the present Legislature they now hav an opportunity to wipe out a damnable record. The people of Wisconsin demand the immediate repeal, or, at least, serious modification, of a vile law that makes it a crime for a man to solicit either charity or work, that places the helpless and unfortunate on a par with the thief, and manufactures criminals out of the poor. Suppose a few persons are scoundrels who go shambling about the country begging and stealing for a living. No matter. Is it not better that we should suffer from a thousand of them than that one innocent old man should be murdered by such an infamous law? Is it not more in accordance with the teachings of humanity and Christ that an hundred should go free rather than that innocent people should be jailed with thieves and educated to crime? The tramp law of Wisconsin is a disgrace to the state, the only saving consideration being its non-execution. The humanity of those who are selected by the people to execute the laws is, fortunately, of a more godlike stamp than that of the legislators who made this one. Nevertheless, there it stands, branding a pretended Christian civilization with the conspicuous brand of the devil. It is a more tyrannical exhibition of power—the power of money over the lives and liberty of the poor—than can be found on the statute books of any foreign despotism to-day. We want to see the man in the Wisconsin Legislature who will be the first to raise his voice for humanity to stamp out this iniquity.

There is another duty our legislators owe to the people of this state. That is one which is almost too apparent to be gravely pointed out. It is the perfection of a measure looking to the equalization of taxation. Like the abolition of the iniquitous tramp law, it is the equitable adjustment of the plainest rights between man and man. Next to the deprivation of men's personal liberty comes that of unjustly depriving him of his property. The discrimination of the laws in favor of one class of citizens and against another class of citizens is an outrage none the less because it embraces his goods instead of his person. It is no sufficient apology that this property is taken in the cause of religion. It is no less a robbery because the favored few are believers in some peculiar theory of future rewards aud punishments and the robbed are not. A just law places every citizen on an equality as regards personal liberty and the right to enjoy his property. If a class of people in Wisconsin want expensive churches and all the concomitants of some elaborate plan of salvation, there is no objection. It is their right and privilege. But let them pay for it. Let them go ahead and put up their money and not be a party to robbing others. If they invest their money in such a cause it is because they expect to realize on the investment. There is no equitable reason why such investments should place them outside the pale of taxation. The Constitution plainly declares there shall be no religious burden laid upon the necks of the people; that there shall be no religious tests. Yet the people of the several states to-day are ground down under the exactions of religion as much as if there was an established church. Either let us hav an established church, recognized and supported by law, something as in England, or do away with the present church property exemption which compels the public to support the machinery of religion indirectly. The only difference now is that we must support a dozen or twenty different churches instead of one. The exemption of church property from the burden of taxation is as great an outrage on the people at large as would be the exemption of all the theaters and public halls, because a large number of people don't believe in them, never attend them, and yet must pay the additional taxes. For where any thing or man escapes taxation some other thing or man must bear that much more to make amends to the revenue. Those who believe in peculiar religious doctrines hav no right to compel the great mass who do not to pay for their enjoyment and comfort, any more than those fond of music and the drama should expect the rest of the public to levy an additional tax on themselves to support it. Let every tub stand on its own bottom. Let all men stand on an absolute equality before the law. That is what we want. That is what every man has a right to demand. Let those who care to insure against hell in any particular company pay their own premiums. This is the plain business view of the case—the only one with which the law, which presupposes religious creed nor test, has anything to do. From a religious standpoint the case is equally clear to any reasonable and reasoning man. If there is any innate truth or self-evident benefit to the human race in the religion of Jesus Christ it needs no proof from the law beyond protection. It will stand alone, increase, and grow fat. It is in open antagonism with itself to expect to liv by robbing other people. Unless religion is able to stand alone against the devil it isn't worth the candle. If it can't exist except on public plunder it ought to be permitted to die a natural death.

We call the attention of the law-makers of Wisconsin to these two things, these two inequalities of existing law. If they want to make an honorable name for themselves and relieve the people who elected them to office, here is an opportunity. If they want to make the name of Wisconsin an honorsble one, free from the disgrace of an odious law against the poor, and the synonym of liberty, justice, and equality, let them act accordingly.

Underwood and Hull.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I see by your paper of Jan. 17th that B. F. Underwood has been in your office, and has said some things explanatory of that Chicago Inter-Ocean interview. I make one discovery, and that is Mr. Underwood declines to debate with me. That is exactly as I expected; I never believed that he could be brought to compare his views in public discussion with the opinions he so boldly (?) attacks in the absence of their representatives! Ah, pardon me, I, who "should hardly be ranked as the representative of any social views," should hav selected some other word; I meant advocates.

Now I humbly ask the reason Mr. Underwood will not debate? He is a debater; he has publicly and on several occasions attacked the Freelove sentiment.

True he did not call me by name in his discourse delivered in Paine Memorial Hall nearly a year ago; but he did what I hav sometimes thought no fair-minded gentleman would do; that is, made false insinuations and general charges against nameless persons—charges such as no one could reply to without appearing to be guilty. If there is anything in the world a gentleman should hold in utter contempt it is that covert bushwhacking mode of guerilla warfare. In the midst of this attack, although he said he would not use names, he made quotations from me, thus leaving the inference that I was the one guilty of all the crimes the audience could imagine his insinuations could cover. No, he did not use my name. Now I ask him to use my name, and bring a bill of particulars so that I and my friends can hav something definite to work upon.

Mr. Underwood told some of my friends that he could get several of his friends to take stock in the Paine Memorial Corporation if I were not connected with it. I proposed immediately, and now renew my proposition, to resign my connection with that corporation in Mr. Underwood's behalf. The stock is not yet all taken, and much that has been subscribed has not been paid. Here will be a large field for Mr. Underwood, and, no doubt, the corporation will gladly accept his services.

Now I renew my invitation to Mr. Underwood to meet me in discussion; and, inasmuch as he insinuates that some nameless person hinted to him "that Moses Hull should hardly be ranked as the representative of any social views," I will get the indorsement of leading Freelovers both as to ability and moral character, and among my indorsers shall be Stephen Pearl Andrews, "the most scholarly man among them," and the "educated and erratic Heywood," the author of "Cupid's Yokes."

If you refuse this fair proposition again, I say let us hear no more of your insinuations against Freelovers and your misrepresentations of Freelovers, "the tag-rag and bob-tail" of Liberalism. Earnestly, MOSES HULL.

"A New Scheme."

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: I hav come to regard life insurance as a gigantic evil, a monstrous fraud, and I firmly believe it will soon be universally recognized as one of the most accursed vampires that ever sucked the life-blood of humanity. Where one family has been benefited thousands hav been robbed, absolutely robbed of that which was needed to buy bread and other necessities of life. Like rattlesnakes, life insurance agents psychologize their victims and absolutely compel them to part with their money. They know that starvation compels vast numbers to "throw up their policies," and thus the money received is "so much clear gain," although the very life-blood of their victims. Is not this worse than highway robbery? Like the church, it paralyzes the grander elements of humanity, and I, for one, shall cry down all human vampires and mockeries that oppress and debase the people.

A new and more dangerous scheme has now been brought forward. This new scheme is the offspring of a new trinity, the church, life insurance, and temperance. I think insurance has at last reached its climax. The church, which insures the soul, and life insurance, which insures the body, hav in this new scheme been sandwiched and sugar-coated by temperance. Human wolves in priestly clothing are at our doors with the same old poison concentrated and sugar-coated. Although failing as utterly in promulgating temperance as does the church in the practice of charity, yet realizing the value of a good name, they hav chartered this "new scheme" "The Royal Templars of Temperance," a name exactly adapted to human wolves in priestly clothing. Seventy thousand priests in our country, beholding with alarm the rising of the sun of knowledge and reason, and knowing that the church must soon tumble in ruins, hav set themselves to devising new schemes of villainy by which to obtain without work their daily bread. They will not work, they dare not beg, therefore let us lock our doors and bar our windows, for ministerial tramps are the worst pests that ever cursed this earth. Recently one of the "pious brethren" introduced a sleek-looking fellow to me as a "life insurance agent" with a "new scheme," which he "would recommend to my favorable notice." The words "life insurance" and "new scheme" struck me strangely, and at once my combativeness jumped to the front; so I said, "Ah! how is that?"

"Well," said the fellow, with that peculiar cant which unmistakably betrayed the ministerial wolf, "I represent a company which has been recently organized, and which is based on temperance. The temperance idea in life insurance is new, therefore we feel sure you will like it."

"Yes, if your company is based on temperance, I shall like it provided your idea of temperance coincides with my own. You will seldom find a man with my religion who is not a temperance man in every sense of the word, but I don't believe in pledges, prohibitory laws, or total abstinence. I believe everything is right in its right place. Alcoholic liquors are as necessary as bread. They hav their uses as well as abuses. Teach people that they are a 'law unto themselves' to rely on, and to respect themselves instead of some pledge or law, and I am with you, body and soul, on the temperance question. But go on, please. Is your work reformatory? Do you gather in the drunkards?"

"Oh, no; only moral and respectable people are admitted. We carry no extra risks on account of drunkenness. Our rules and discipline are very rigid indeed."

"How so? Please explain more fully."

"Our company is a sort of secret society. We hav our supreme councils, grand councils, select councils, passwords, grips, tokens, fees, and secrets, just like the Masons. These are necessary to protect ourselves."

"To protect yourselves? Against what?"

"Drunkards and those with whom we do not wish to associate. Drunkards are much more liable to die than others. Right here is our great advantage over all other companies. We reject drunkards."

"Ha! ha! ha! And that is why you call yourselves 'Royal Templars of Temperance?' and that is the kind of temperance work you do, is it? Well, I call that concentrated selfishness and hypocrisy. You beat the world in strategy. So you wish me to join your company purely from a selfish motive, just as the Christian joins the church that he or she may get to heaven. Too much hypocrisy and selfishness for me, my friend, and not enough charity; besides, I object to all secret societies save two, my family and the Universal Brotherhood of Man. Those I joined at birth, and while I liv I propose to keep my standing in them good. I regard every man as my brother and every woman as my sister, and when you ask me to put up the bars between me and any human being, so that I cannot discriminate in the relief of suffering humanity, you ask what I shall never do."

"But our by-laws expressly stipulate that we shall not discriminate in dispensing our charities."

"Hav you a relief fund?"

"Certainly we hav."

"Do any but members ever receive the benefit thereof?"

"No, sir, never."

"So I supposed; but please explain further."

"Well, if a member gets drunk he loses his membership, and is expelled."

"In that case do you giv him back his money?"

"No, he forfeits all claims to that."

"And his family, too?"

"Yes, sir."

"So it seems you are a trifle more anxious to get the man's money than to save him from drunkenness or his family from ruin. Right here I would suggest that it would be exceedingly appropriate for you to sing, 'The Rumseller's, or rather 'The Drunkard's Dream.' You doubtless are afraid of singing 'The Old Oaken Bucket.' My friend, hav you ever heard of wolves in sheep's clothing? and has it ever occurred to you that you hav on the wrong coat? Your new scheme seems to me to be very like those old schemes that hav been cursing and robbing the world during the past eighteen hundred years. Something new, is it? The bottles are new, but it is the same old wine, dregs and all."

"You do not seem to comprehend the object of life insurance. You seem to think because we use the word 'temperance' our mission should be charity. Now, sir, charity and life insurance are incompatible terms. Once more we reject drunkenness because it is for our interest to do so. Intemperance increases mortality; therefore, we do not meddle with it in any sense."

"Oh, yes, I understand you; you are 'good Samaritans,' pouring oil into your neighbor's wounds. You use the temperance idea as a sort of bait."

"It adds respectability as well as makes the company stronger and safer."

"You should say hypocrisy instead of respectability. You claim to be the friends of temperance when you are really its enemies. I call that 'stealing the livery of heaven to serve the devil in.' Well, what else."

"You are required to declare your belief in the existence of a Supreme Being."

"Look here, my friend; is not this 'new scheme' the offspring of and a part of the church?"

"Well, no, not strictly speaking. Of course we harmonize more or less with the church."

"I thought so; in fact, I see no difference between life insurance as you run it and church insurance. But, sir, I am ineligible."

"How so?"

"I cannot tell a falsehood; at least, I will not for the sake of joining your society."

"Explain yourself."

"I do not believe in the existence of a Supreme Being."

"Why, sir, the Bible declares and reveals—"

"Stop, please. The Bible to me is no authority whatever. Its authors are Tom, Dick, and Harry, whose own records of themselves prove them to be the worst scoundrels that ever walked this earth, and whom nobody ever heard of save through their own writings. You cannot prove to my mind the existence of a Supreme Being by quoting from a book which nearly all the greatest thinkers and scholars of the age reject as authority. If we accept the Bible we must hav also a devil, a place of torment—a hell. The Christian church has recently cast this devil and hell overboard, out of their belief. Now, I claim, according to the Bible, it there is no devil and no hell, there is no God. Generally if you knock the bottom out the whole business caves in. Is not this so? Now, sir, be candid. Do you really know there is a Supreme Being?"

"Yes, sir, I know there is if I know anything."

"Hav you or any other creature ever seen him, except Moses? What does he look like? Where does he stay? If there is only one Supreme Being, must he not get fearfully lonesome with no other gods or goddesses to talk to. If you know there is a Supreme Being, you surely must be able to tell me something about him."

"Your questions are not only absurd but wicked."

"I think not. I feel sure if there is such a being he does not object seriously to my questions. I am but an individualized atom, while he is the creator and ruler of this boundless universe—millions of millions of suns and worlds. Taking into consideration his age, size, knowledge, and power, don't you think he is in little business getting angry at a little speck that has but just commenced to exist? You hav found God; I hav not. I am honest, but ignorant. Human law makes allowance for honest ignorance. Would you make divine law less reasonable? Seriously, my friend, I hav searched faithfully for a Supreme Being, and cannot find one. Can you not giv me some light?"

"Yes, sir; go out into nature. He is everywhere, in everything, and a part of everything."

"Indeed; then he must be thin as air, hard as a stone, and big as the universe. He must be an awful big fellow! Has he arms and legs? Does he pare his toe nails, and does he wink?"

"Worse and worse. I will not talk with you. If there is a hell—"

"Oh, don't say 'if.' Say you know there is a hell, and that your Supreme Being will clasp his hands to his sides and shout and shriek with laughter as I roll up every five or ten thousand years on one of those awful billows of fire and brimstone, and to him that revenge will be so sweet. I hav no doubt that will be the first thought that enters my mind as I behold through the stifling smoke the beaming face of my heavenly father, and all because I sought for God and couldn't find him, and because I asked a few questions of a life insurance agent. All the saints will make heaven resound with the glad sound, Revenge is sweet! Revenge is sweet! Revenge is sweet! Then I shall realize as I cannot now that there is an 'eternal fitness of things.' Giv my love to your Supreme Being, my friend. Tell him I wanted to, but couldn't. Seriously, now, I am required to believe that way over beyond nature there is a place called infinity; that a being exists there whom nobody has ever seen except a myth of a fellow called Moses; that he created millions of suns and worlds out of nothing and then became a part of them; crawled into and became a part of such things as tadpoles, snakes, mushrooms, and rocks; that before the creation he was all infinite, but is now part finite; that he is three in one, and one in three; that he made heaven for the saints and hell for the sinners; man out of dust and woman out of a rib, etc., etc. All this I am required to believe, and more, or else I cannot join your respectable society. Really, my friend, it's too big a load to carry. I fear I am not in a condition to be psychologized to-day. One moment, please. Don't misunderstand me. If you mean by a Supreme Being the laws, principles, and vital forces, which are everywhere in nature, either active or latent, then I am a believer in a Supreme Being, and therefore not ineligible to membership in your 'new scheme which is based on temperance,' and which, to my mind, is one of the most insidious and damnable frauds that ever cursed humanity.

"Good-day, sir." E. A. Chapman.

Infallibility of Popes.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Infallibility in chief rulers was an ancient belief among pagans as well as the Jews, and is the foundation of theocracy, a Bible doctrine, and was held by the Jews and Christians as being from God, and was so held from Adam to Martin Luther, and is yet held sacred by the Catholic church.

Pope is a title name of a head ruler or chief bishop of the Catholic Christian church, in the same sense as Lord, God, Lord of Host, and Angels. God, is the title name of all objects of worship, persons or things, dead or invisible, that are personified by images, imagined or real, and worshiped. Lord is the title name of a ruler or boss. Lord of Hosts was by the Jews applied to a boss or a chief among a host of spirits called angels. Angel is the title name of a messenger. Thus Paul correctly said there were Lords many and Gods many. But the Jews claimed only one, and his name was Jehovah, and all other spiritual persons seen were his angels (messengers). This one, through Abraham, became the God of the Jews, and in this God and his angels was claimed infallibility as to rule, doctrine, and authority extending over mankind under a theocratical government, thus forming an unbroken chain of authority; otherwise a church or ecclesiastical organization cannot be a church of the Jewish God. This is self-evident from the fact that no sacred history speaks of a church destitute of infallibility in its head rulers. Moses in the Jewish organization was a pope in the full sense of the word, and his successor Peter in the Christian church was a pope and held the keys of authority, and his successors were popes and carried with them this same infallibility which had its origin in the Jewish God and held in the church for thousands of years. Yet Martin Luther denied and protested against this infallibility in the church, nevertheless it was this same authority that excommunicated him and others. Therefore it is an undeniable fact all Protestant churches are acting under the assumed authority of excommunicated leaders who were anathmatised as black-hearted Infidels, heretics. Thus the Protestant assumes the position that Martin Luther carried off with him (when he was excommunicated) all God's authority in the church and left it in the hands of the devil. Martin Luther's protest resulted in two Christian organizations, known as Protestants and Catholics, the latter holding sacred the ancient order of God's house from Adam down through Enoch, Noah, Melchisedec, Abraham, Moses, kings, prophets, Christ, and the Apostles, all of whom were popes in the sense of the word, whose sayings are even now acknowledged infallible, and quoted as such. Yet in opposition to all these facts Protestants justify Luther in denouncing infallibility in the church as a false doctrine. To do this in the absence of infallible authority is absurd and Infidelity of the blackest dye. Had Luther denied that infallibility had ever existed in the church his claim would hav been consistent, and he justifiable in his position in making the church, ancient and modern, the same, a man-made institution, which accounts for all the disastrous failures from first to last. See the organization in the garden of Eden—Adam as pope. This was bursted by a serpent, a snake. Second organization, Enoch as pope, which ran all flesh into wickedness, and ended in general destruction with the exception of Noah and his family, and he got beastly drunk. Yet, drunk as he was, being a pope his infallible authority remained in him, by which it is claimed he instituted human slavery by cursing his son Ham's posterity. It is the same with all drunken popes, their authority remaining. Third organization, Moses as pope, who committed murder, hid his victim in the sand, and fled from his country, and yet he remained infallible. The same with all popes. This ended in an unparalleled slaughter. Fourth organization, Christ and Peter were popes. Here is a dispute. Protestants claim it went into the hands of the devil through Catholicism, and became the mother of harlots and abomination, Luther, holding on to the priesthood, reorganized minus infallibility. Catholics say this is false. We excommunicated all of these head leaders and placed them in the hands of the devil. How this is I will not decide, but take them at their word; both churches are in the hands of the devil.

I, as an honest man, will say the claims of the Catholics are the most consistent unless the Protestants deny that infallibility was ever in the church. And even then it would be ungenerous in them to call their mother a whore. But to rob her of her precious jewels, and then call her the mother of harlots, is not saying much for themselves, and is very ungrateful. It is an undeniable fact that the Protestant churches are destitute of infallibility to guide their steps. Who wonders they run wild in divisions, no polar star or compass to steer by—a ship on the wide ocean without a helm subject to every wind of doctrine. Thus divided and subdivided under the claim that God has closed the gates of heaven and forbid all communication from the spirit world, leaving man to grope his way through life by ciphering out the meaning of ancient and dead languages as best he can, relying upon uninspired translators making a new translation necessary every few years to keep up with the development of man. To deny infallibility, and quote the sayings of men as infallible for no other reason than that they lived in the days of uncivilization and undevelopment of man, for should the same men with the same character now liv they would be kicked out of society or hung. If the Bible was originally written by infallible authority it should be translated by the same authority; if not, it lacks the notary public's seal of the kingdom of God, therefore is not reliable. Luther was an Infidel by denying the infallibility of the church, and by teaching individual rights in reading and interpreting the scriptures, and a marked improvement was the result, until Protestants exercised the authority of state, and infallibility to rule was resumed by the Protestants, and their power was executed to its fullest extent, and thousands were put to death as heretics. Is it not a well known fact from past experiences, persecution and prosecutions are carried out for irreligious opinions, and it has always been the result when government officers were held under the control of the church influence, either Catholic or Protestant? The many divisions within the last century may be thankfully accepted bv the Freethinker as his savior. Under a union of all Protestants, and the government under their control, what would be the fate of Infidels and Catholics?

Is there not a union of sects now taking place under the Young Men's Christian Association (so far as union among Christians it is all well)? But a religious union of sects in the absence of outside toleration is dangerous. When the union is founded on a sworn determination to crush out freedom of thought, such a union is bound to result in a death-struggle between religious tyranny and human rights, between superstition and common sense.

A union of sects under the name of young men, with old men as managers, carries deception upon its face. Its officers and agents acting under a law concocted and got up by this association, and its execution, as in the D. M. Bennett case, is proof war is already declared on the part of Christianity against Infidelity or Liberalism; and their armies are already in the field and their flag unfurled, written upon its folds, Believe (as we do) or you shall be damned. Freedom of thought, freedom of speech, freedom of the press, and freedom of the mails is the bone of contention. The advocates of these principles hav written upon their flag, The right of discussion to all.

This law was gotten up under the pretense of suppressing vice and protecting the youth against the influence of obscene literature. The appearance of the object of this law is grand and noble, and here is where thousands are fooled. Christ, under the law of the Jews to suppress sedition and blasphemy, was arrested, tried, and put to death under a verdict of seventy selected jurors of his own country, and died among thieves. Who dare say there was more injustice in his case than in D. M. Bennett's? The difference was that Pilot, the governor, was an Infidel and a disbeliever in the Jewish God, and wishing to release him, washed his hands, and refused to stain them in innocent blood. Not so with Presideat Hayes; he is held under the influence of the church and believes in the Jewish God; but for this he would hav released Bennett. Who dare say this is not true?

Again, see the object set forth by the advocates of putting God into our Constitution, claiming it is to honor him and elevate our government. This done, it would unite the authority of God claimed in the church, and the authority vested in our government under the control of the people, and a theocracy would be the result; and from past experience, the result would be deplorable, which can be seen from the use already made of the Comstock law. Women hav been induced to expose their naked forms, and perjury, forgery, fraud, and deception hav been resorted to, claiming it necessary to detect obscenity, and it is justified from the pulpit. Obscenity of the lowest grade is used and justified under this law, and it is a disgrace to our age and nation and demoralizing to society. Yet all this is sanctioned by our Christian community. All this is the result of our national authorities being in sympathy with the church. We ask what pretense you raise to the present use now made of this law? We answer, It was the exposure of the Beecher-Tilton scandal through the columns of Victoria Woodhull's weekly. Under this law she was arrested, put in prison, and her weekly destroyed to prevent the world from knowing the amount of corruption practiced in Christian churches. But the truth soon burst forth like a long pent-up volcano, and was hurled over land and sea through the post-office, demoralizing young and old more than all the obscenity detected under this law, and not a voice is heard in all Christendom against the vile and obscene stuff passing through the mail. This is a blow struck by religious tyranny against the priceless blessing of the liberty of the press.

Was any attention paid to the warning voice of Victoria C. Woodhull and G. F. Train? Victoria was hired to leave the continent. Train, after a long imprisonment, was pronounced insane, yet the fulfilment of this warning is now before our eyes in the D. M. Bennett case; and while his friends were importuning the clemency of the President on the side of mercy by some two hundred thousand petitions, the cry from the pulpit is heard: Crucify him; he is an Infidel, blasphemes our holy religion, and exposes all our false claims as to religious matters. Let us hire all the editors that are willing to dabble in nastiness (and nothing to lose), and while we hold him in prison we will daub him all over with dirt and slime and cause him and his filthy sheet to stink in the land. Glory to God. Amen.

Awake, ye sons of human liberty, before ye are engulfed in a religious intolerance surpassed only in the fifteenth century, when honest men, after death, were tried and condemned as Infidels under infallible authority of church and state, their bodies taken out of the graves, burned, and their estates confiscated! Deplorable as this may appear, I giv it as a historical fact. Protestants claim that it was the Catholics who did this, and the Catholics claim that it was done under state authority. Here is where the trouble lies. Under the influence of religious tyranny laws are made and executed by those who hold sacred the vengeance of their God; thereby the true extent of law is made void through religious prejudice, the most dangerous power on earth among men.

In the fifteenth century government was ruled by religious bigots; now only in part. Then infallibility was fully acknowledged in the church; now only partially. Then the laws pertaining to heresy were extended with boldness. Had the church the same authority now as then (and it is extended), D. M. Bennett's body, long before this, would hav been burned and his ashes thrown to the wind, and his printing press and his whole estate confiscated. Many readers may honestly think my charges against Christian professors are unjust, but reliable history justifies all I claim. ISAAC PADEN.

An Appeal to Kansas Liberals.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The cause of Freethought in Kansas is making rapid progress. We are not only increasing our number of Leagues, but wherever the subject of Liberalism is properly presented we find many more persons interested than we anticipated. The greatest obstacle in the way of making ours the banner state in the advancement of free religion is an insufficiency of funds. The objects and prospects of our order cannot be effectively presented to the people without a considerable expenditure of money for printing, postage, etc.

Our treasury is now empty. The officers of the state League are giving a great deal of time to the work, and hav furnished more money for carrying it on than all the Liberals in the state hav given since our last meeting. This we cannot continue to do, and unless we hav more generous contributions to our fund the good work must stop.

Can we not hav the help we so much need? Will not each one in our state who is at all interested send us something? Very truly, CAROLINE R. DOSTER.

Resolutions of the Newark Liberal League.

The following resolutions were unanimously adopted at a meeting of the Newark Liberal League.

WHEREAS, Mr. A. L. Rawson, Secretary of the National Liberal League, has been charged with being guilty of conduct unbecoming a Liberal; and

WHEREAS, The said A. L. Rawson has offered his resignation to Mr. Elizur Wright, President of the National Liberal League, and the latter has refused to accept the same; and

WHEREAS, The National Liberal League has as yet not set up a standard of ethics for its members to be judged by except such as are implied by the Constitution of the League, and we therefore ought to exercise a tolerant judgment on the actions of other persons; therefore

Resolved, That the Newark Liberal League, of Newark, New Jersey, cannot condemn Mr. A. L. Rawson.

Resolved, That should Mr. A. L. Rawson, during his membership of the National Liberal League, become guilty of any such conduct as he is charged with having committed many years ago while a young man and Christian, we shall then hav to pronounce judgment thereon, and not before.

Resolved, That these resolutions be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER.

The Campbell Hill League on the Right Side.

At the regular meeting of the Campbell Hill Auxiliary Liberal League the following preamble and resolution were introduced and carried with one dissenting vote:

WHEREAS, D. M. Bennett, editor of the New York TRUTH SEEKER, has done what he admis to hav been a foolish act; and

WHEREAS, Some so-called Liberal editors hav condemned him, and asked him to step down and out; and

WHEREAS, D. M. Bennett has appealed to the Liberals to say whether they will still remain his friends and support and sustain him at the head of THE TRUTH SEEKER or not; be it

Resolved, That we, the Auxiliary Liberal League of Campbell Hill, Jackson county, Ill., do remain his friends and supporters, and that we will do all in our power to sustain the New York TRUTH SEEKER with D. M. Bennett at its head.

A motion was made and carried that this preamble and resolution be sent to the New York TRUTH SEEKER with a request that it be published.

SAMUEL HINDMAN, President.

Questions.

An early answer to the following questions, through THE TRUTH SEEKER, would much oblige at least one of its readers: 1. Is there any law in operation in any state of the Union that would compel Mr. H. H. Morrison, or any one else, to borrow money and pay interest thereon? 2. If Mr. Morrison should desire to obtain the use of the money of another, shall there be a law to compel the owner of money to let him hav it without interest? 3 If this last should be answered in the negative, then should there be a law to forbid the offering or agreeing to pay interest on money borrowed? 4. If all these should be answered negatively, please state how the paying and receiving of interest or compensation for the use of money could be prevented so long as there are those who are willing to do both, and no law existing to prevent it? I am aware that all laws compelling the fulfilment of a contract to pay interest on borrowed money might be repealed, but as there are still some abusurdly honest people left who would fulfil an agreement though there was no law to compel them to do so, I am unable to see how even that would eradicate the pernicious practice. A difficulty also presents itself in this case. Such is the average perverseness of human nature that I fear those who might be known to entertain Mr. Morrison's views on this subject might find an increased difficulty in obtaining a loan, should it happen to be convenient for any such to thus get the use of a little money. Mr. Morrison, doubtless, will never be under such necessity. It does seem that there would be a necessity for a law to compel the "money-sharks" to loan their money without interest, so that the fool, who denies himself gratifications in order to lay up money, would hav to giv the use of it, free, to the wise fellow who takes the good of the world as he goes along. I would suggest that, in addition to this, the payment of the principal be left optional with the borrower.

A Liberal League.

A small audience assembled at Abstract Hall, Detroit, Mich., on Saturday evening in response to a call to organize a Liberal League, auxiliary to the National League. M. J. Matthews was chosen chairman, and stated the objects of the meeting. He expressed the hope that a League would be organized at once and great efforts be made to expound their platform. H. Jacobson acted as Secretary.

S. B. McCracken addressed the meeting, and said the object of the Liberalist organizations were the divorcing of the church from the state, the taxation of church property, abolition of Sunday laws, dispensing with prayers at political conventions, establishing a state religion, etc. He said that the organization would not annoy any religious denominations in their worship. He explained that the division in the ranks of the National Association was owing to a difference of opinion regarding moral literature.

U. K. Booth and others made remarks in the same strain, the former declaring that the Liberalists are only seeking to carry out the Declaration of Independence in its true sense.

After further discussion, a committee, consisting of M. J. Matthews, Prof. W. N. Hallimann, Karl Schememan, U. K. Booth, Miss J. R. Lane, and S. B. McCracken were appointed a committee on organization, after which the meeting adjourned for two weeks—Jan. 31st.

WHEN paganism was suppressed the persecuting spirit of the Christian system exhibited itself in the attempt made to extirpate, by violence, every heresy that appeared.

What innumerable multitudes hav suffered and perished that the Christian religion might flourish! The transubstantiation controversy, which raged at intervals all over Christendom, cost the lives of between 300,000 and 400,000 human beings. The famous image controversy cost 50,000 lives. During the persecutions instigated in the ninth century against the Manicheans, there fell in Greece, it has been computed, 100,000 persons. The loss of life by the "Crusades" was not less, probably, than 5,000,000. There were seven distinct expeditions. "The European nations," says Mosheim, "were deprived of the greatest part of their inhabitants by these ill-judged expeditions." . . . "Here the face of Europe was totally changed, and all things were thrown into the utmost confusion" (Ecc. Hist, vol. i, p. 257). Bernard, whose zeal contributed largely to arouse Europe to the second crusade, says that when the expedition started "scarcely one man was left for the consolation of seven widows."

For centuries the fairest regions of earth were reddened with human blood and strewn with human skulls. The extermination of the Albigenses, the expatriation of the Moriscoes, the unfortunate remnant of the Moorish nation, from Spain; the terrible persecution of the Jews during the middle ages, and their final expulsion from Spain and Portugal; the famous schism which preceded the burning of Huss and Jerome of Prague, and the wars of Hussites that followed (costing not fewer than 150,000 lives); the destruction of 12,000,000 unoffending aborigines by Cortez, Pizarro, and their priestly abettors; the massacre of St. Bartholomew, costing probably 40,000 lives (a low estimate); the killing of 50,000 in the Netherlands, in the reign of Charles V., and thousands more under the reign of his heartless son; the burning of 31,000 and the killing or torturing by other modes of 290,000 more by the Inquisition in Spain alone; the burning, hanging, and otherwise destroying of hundreds of thousands in obedience, as was supposed, to the Bible command, "Thou shalt not suffer a witch to liv;" the persecutions in England, Scotland, and Ireland (not to speak of our own country) since the Reformation, are comparatively few of the enormities that can be appealed to in illustration of the intolerance which has followed the ascendency of Christianity wherever it has gained a foothold and has prevailed unchecked by opposing influences. No wonder Baxter exclaimed, "Blood, blood, blood stains every page."

A VERY bright and observing boy, aged about twelve years, attended a revival meeting being held in one of the churches at Pittsford, this state, a few evenings since, and was assigned a front seat in the very hottest of the battle. He stood his ground to the last, however, and on reaching home he related his experience to his parents, winding up with the following: "Pa, do you think it just right for the minister to place his arm around the sisters and hug them, as he did Mrs. —— to-night while kneeling for prayers? I saw him do it, pa; I will swear to it." It may be needless to add that that boy was sent up stairs to bed carrying the assurance that on the following evening he would be expected to remain at home with his ma.

THERE is said to be a secret hall in the fortress of Cuzco where an immense treasure is concealed, consisting of statues of all the Incas wrought in gold.—Prescott.

The Modern Jesuits.

On Monday evening the 16th, as was briefly noticed in our last, Comstock's society held its sixth annual meeting. It had a few nights previously met in secret conclave and cooked up its report, and was therefore on this public occasion prepared to put its best foot forward. The meeting was opened by Samuel Colgate, the soap boiler of John street. He introduced the Rev. Gillete who, with his mouth full of tobacco, made a prayer of the usual fashion. He cut his exhortation short, however, for his mouth became so filled up he could not talk. When he sat down he looked furtively around and finally deposited a mouthful of tobacco juice in an obscure corner of the stage. Then Colgate came to the front again and introduced Anthony, who read the report that had been written for him by the Society. It was taken up with recountals of his exploits among the venders of vice in the country. The very stale story about female seminaries was repeated with some additions. The lottery companies were complained of, and his efforts for their suppression were told. Bogus brokers came in for a share of his wrath, as did also the story papers. Probably no man in the country ever printed worse sensational periodicals than Frank Leslie, recently deceased. Yet at his funeral the presiding minister stated that his papers had a refining influence. Whether the smut published by Christians has a more refining influence than that of other sensational story papers Anthony did not say. He never mentioned Leslie. A good portion of his report was taken up in denouncing Mr. Bennett:

The most important trial has been that of one Bennett for sending an obscene book through the mail after three different courts had declared the same to be obscene. He was tried, convicted, and sentenced to thirteen months' imprisonment, and is now in the Albany Penitentiary, thanks to a President who had moral courage enough to stand up for the moral purity of youth, notwithstanding the most unprecedented effort and demand was made for his pardon by a portion of the so-called Liberals. His friends boasted that within ten days of his trial and sentence he would be pardoned. They had a petition for his pardon in circulation before he was sentenced. They had petitions not only demanding the pardon, but the repeal of the postal laws of 1873, relating to sending obscene matter. A most monstrous effort was made to make it appear that this prosecution of the scoundrel Bennett [hisses] was made because he was a Liberal.

Here there was violent hissing from some in the audience who did not relish Mr. Bennett's being called a scoundrel. Comstock stopped reading his prepared report, and with great excitement and in a very loud voice, almost screaming, said:

I desire to say here that no man has ever been prosecuted by this society because he had or had not religion; and no man has been prosecuted because he was a Liberal; nor has a man failed to be prosecuted because he was a Liberal. I make that statement because this party is represented here to-night, and I want it to go on the record just where we stand. Last year our reports were twisted and distorted.

Comstock has desired for a long time to get an opportunity to disclaim that he prosecuted the editor of this paper because of his Infidelity. He has seen that in his report of 1878 he "put his foot in it," and he once made a proposition to a Liberal of this city to "explain." Even some Christians do not approve of persecution for opinion's sake. But in his report of 1878 he was just well on his way in arresting Freethinkers, and his words in that report are an expression of his already outlined policy. In that report he says:

Another class of publications issued by Freelovers and Freethinkers is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled hav found vent through these channels. Under a plausible pretense, men who raise a howl about "free press," "free speech," etc., ruthlessly trample under foot the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint.

With these words in his mouth it is useless for him to now endeavor to make the public believe that his crusade is not more against Liberals than against the dealers in that vile stuff which everybody wishes was done away with. On this point Truth has a clear idea of the value of Comstock's word. Speaking of this meeting it says:

This society is an aggressive religious organization modeled upon the plan of the society of similar name in England, which so bitterly persecuted Charles Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant for their Infidelity upon the false and shallow pretense that they were publishing immoral literature.

Ostensibly, the object of the American society, like that of its English prototype, is to suppress those filthy publications that were printed in secret, sold by stealth, and read in solitude. Its real object, however, is to suppress religious free thought, and it is rapidly reaching the point at which it will no longer hesitate to openly avow this purpose, and declare war upon outspoken Infidelity.

The vile literature of which we hav spoken was crushed out of existence the very moment the laws were executed against its promoters; and at this day it would be impossible to purchase a bawdy book within the limits of the city of New York. The laws we had were amply sufficient for the purpose. But this society procured the enactment of new laws, avowedly because the old were ineffective, but really to broaden their field of action. In these laws the word "obscene" was used, and its definition left to the discretion of judges, some of whom hav so defined it that it may embrace even the works of Darwin. Thus, upon the pretense that it is suppressing obscenity, this society insidiously attacks the citadels of Freethought and scientific discussion.

Comstock's attempt, in his speech on Monday night, to parry this charge by saying that "in seven years no man had ever been prosecuted for being an Infidel," is neutralized by his thanks to "Almighty God that broader fields for work hav been opened to the society," and by the incautious remark of Dr. Crosby, in his following speech, that the incarceration of Bennett was worth years of labor. Why is the incarceration of Bennett worth years of labor? This Society made a desperate effort to imprison him for writing "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ"—a rough but perfectly clean attack upon the divinity of the Second Person in the Trinity. Failing in that they prosecuted him for mailing a scientific pamphlet which he had not written, had not even printed, but which, in common with numerous other respectable publishers, he had in his stock for sale, and a pamphlet which had been pronounced by hundreds of honorable men and women—among whom were Bouton, the publisher, the Rev. Mr. Frothingham, and Elizur Wright—to be perfectly free from the charge of obscenity. This was the ostensible crime for which Bennett was sent to the penitentiary. Does any one doubt that his real offense was Infidelity, or that the society rejoices in his punishment for any other reason than that he published Infidel books?

Unless the progress of this society toward the suppression of religious free thought is suddenly arrested, it will soon furnish material for another Eugene Sue. The Society, whose later operations were so severely crippled by the vivid exposures in the "Wandering Jew," was no more insidious in its measures, determined in its purposes, relentless in its blows, or far-reaching in its agencies than the society for the Suppression of Vice. Says Comstock:

"Endeavors hav been made to reach centers of influence, and many ministers and other influential citizens hav been aroused to the work."

These endeavors hav not been unsuccessful, nor will they be discontinued. Postmaster-General Key, through the influence of Comstock's personal friend, Bissill, Key's chief clerk, acts upon the command of the society; it controls the President through his wife; Judge Benedict, who presides over the trials of the bulk of its cases, is its ready servant, and is said to be a member who is admitted to its confidential councils; the United States Attorney, Woodford, enjoys full membership, and as the society's President, Colgate, directs, so he guides the machinery of his office; John Paton, a director, finds his way into the Grand Jury panel when a presentment relating to the object of the society is wanted; and Anthony Comstock himself is a special agent of the post-office department, empowered to pry into the mails, open letters in transit, and possess himself of the most confidential information.

Like the Society of Jesus, once the terror of Continental Europe, this Society for the Suppression of Vice, whose object is to crush all opposition to the church, aims to make itself master of the civil power and keeper of the people's conscience. Its membership and agencies already extend into the White House, control the postal department, command prosecuting officers, influence judges, and creep into the jury box.

The spirits of Loyola and Laynez animate Anthony Comstock and control the operations of his Society.

After Anthony had read his report, the Rev. Howard Potter, D.D., made about the dryest speech we ever had to sit and listen to, in which he advocated the establishment of the whipping-post for offenders against the rules of the society, and spoke in glowing terms of that "glorious old weapon, the cat." He evidently sighs for a return of the "good old times" when his Christian ancestors whipped Quakers out of town at the cart's end. If he wishes to use it on a worthy object he might try Comstock. Anthony whipped through the streets of New York by the Rev. Howard Potter, D. D., brother to Grace church rector, would be an edifying spectacle!

Elbridge F. Gerry had been expected to address the meeting, but at the last moment he sent a note saying he would be unable to attend. Probably he was ashamed of the society. After a whispered consultation between Colgate and Chancelor Crosby, D D., LL.D., the latter bounced to his feet, and, swinging his arms, startled the audience from the lethargy into which Potter, D.D., had put them, by exclaiming, "If I should swear I would swear by Anthony Comstock!" It strikes us that the aforesaid Anthony is a very good person to swear by—or at. Crosby then went on with great emphasis:

There is no society in this city doing a grander work for this generation and the generation to come than the society that holds its anniversary here to-night. If this society had never done anything more than put that man Bennett in the Albany Penitentiary, the man who was the leader and defender of the propagators of obscenity, . . it was worth a hundred thousand times more than all that our citizens hav given to its treasury.

This is pretty plain. It shows how the imprisonment is regarded by the the leading churchmen of this city, and gives in few words the object of the ministers' supporting the society. The imprisonment of an Infidel is worth a hundred thousand times more than all the money ever given to the society! As the society spends about eight thousand dollars a year, and has been in existence six years, Liberals can figure pretty closely what the church regards it worth to shut one of them up. We would respectfully suggest to the D.D.-LL.D. that for that amount of money he can build a nice little inquisition and fit it up with racks, wheels, thumbscrews, and the other soul-saving appliances considered by the church to be effective repressers of heresy.

"We need just such meetings as these," he continued, "to tell our brethren who are actively engaged in this work that we are with them, heart and soul. These brethren are human, and they need, in the midst of opposition, to know that there is a large constituency in this city that believes in their work."

In this he is correct. The ministers of the country are undoubtedly heart and soul in the work of suppressing Infidelity, which Crosby meant when he indulged in his flight of rhetoric against "vice." The "brethren," too, are human, or rather inhuman, in their mode of warfare.

When the foremost minister of the largest city in the country gives utterance to sentiments like the following, it is time Liberals took alarm. He acknowledges that Comstock decoyed people into committing crime, and said: "Deceiving them! I tell you, gentlemen, I believe in deceit. I believe in deceit wherever you hav got a rightful enemy to destroy. Could you carry on a war without deceit? Are you to tell your enemy everything you are going to do? Wherever you hav a rightful enemy, and hav a right under God to destroy him, you hav a right to deceive him."

Whom he deems "rightful enemies" is sufficiently evidenced by his statement that he regarded the conviction of Mr. Bennett worth a hundred thousand times more than all the citizens hav given to the society. This is exactly the doctrine of the Jesuits—the "end justifies the means." That the church has "a right under God" to destroy heretics is a cardinal principle of the Catholic church, and this Protestant minister boldly avows it as his view. The appeal with which he closed his speech shows how he would destroy his "rightful enemy." "Gentlemen, for God's sake, for truth's sake, let us lay aside our apathy, and for the good of this city, where we dwell and where we expect our descendants to dwell, let us purify it if it be by fire and by sword."

Fire and sword hav ever been the church missionaries. By the light of the fagot's flame the gospel has been read, and with the sword the command "Kill every man his neighbor," has been carried out. This high-toned minister wants to again sharpen the sword and rekindle the flames of persecution. Will those who talk about this being a free country weigh well the words of this "divine?" He is a Christian and was talking to a Christian audience, who applauded his sentiments. The spirit was plain. Under this cloak of pretended love of virtue is concealed a deep-laid plot against Infidelity, and among themselves they take but little pains to conceal it. Had not the public been so aroused over the incarceration of Mr. Bennett, we should ere this hav seen a wholesale crusade against Freethought papers. And with Crosby's morality of deceit, it would be easy for so accomplished a rascal as Comstock to hav devised some plan that would hav enabled him to get within his foul grasp the publisher of every Liberal journal in the land.

The usual appeal was made for money to carry on the work, and a card and pencil were left in every seat. We understand that considerable vaseline was subscribed by some acquainted with the soap-boiler of John street. As the audience came out they left the cards with a young man at the door, who has been in this office several times inquiring for "Cupid's Yokes." We watched for some time but did not see a great many cards deposited. The audience may hav been "short," or perhaps all did not believe in Comstock. As the crowd filed out each person was presented with a circular issued by the National Defense Association, which set forth some truths in regard to Comstock and his society. We hope before any of the Christians who were at the meeting giv any money to Comstock they will carefully read the same.

Mr. Holmes in New York.

On Wednesday evening the 21st inst. Mr. James Holmes, Vice-President of the London Secular Society, lectured at Science Hall to the Liberal Leagues of this city. His subject was "Eternal Punishment," the lecture being a reply to the Rev. DeWitt Talmage's discourse on "Is There a Hell?" Judging from the importance which Mr. Holmes has given this discourse by preparing an answer to it, Talmage made a much greater impression abroad than he has succeeded in doing at home, for no American Freethinker has ever considered his arguments of sufficient consequence to merit public criticism or even public notice. Mr. Holmes looks like the representative English lecturer, and speaks the American language with a slight English accent. He is apparently from thirty-five to forty years of age.

This lecture, the speaker remarked, after being introduced to the audience by Prof. Rawson, was a somewhat peculiar one, being the identical lecture which had secured his dismissal from the ministry as a "preacher of the gospel."

He then referred in a humorous way to the manner in which he had been indicted by a conclave of ministers and expelled from their society without an opportunity of being heard in his own defense, and how, after being condemned unheard by those very liberal gentlemen, he was asked if he had anything to say for himself. He then proceeded to take up Talmage's arguments categorically, and, in the Doctor's own style of treating the subject, practically answered them, concluding that if the Freethinker was to be damned for his honest convictions, then he would stand before the Almighty on the last day, not as a criminal, but as an accuser.

A gentleman in the audience arose at the close of the lecture and remarked that he considered it somewhat behind the age; that the American people held whatever DeWitt Talmage might say as of no account whatever, and he should prefer to hav heard something of more vital importance to the Liberals of to-day. In reply to this criticism Mr. Holmes justified the delivery of the lecture on the ground of the peculiar circumstances connected with it, his expulsion from the ministry before mentioned, etc., and was sustained by the audience.

Mr. Holmes comes highly recommended by Charles Bradlaugh, is evidently thoroughly honest and in earnest, and will use his best endeavors while in this country to further the interests of Liberalism. His present address is with Prof. Rawson, 34 Bond street, this city.

JOSEPH J. HAWKINI, who left Salt Lake City to escape the persecutions of the Mormons, called upon us recently. He thinks the Mormons are no improvement on other religious bodies, and is now lecturing upon "Mormonism Exposed." He gave one lecture in Science Hall last Tuesday evening. He is an earnest friend of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and while within the limits of Mormondom did much to extend its circulation. He also informs us that the paper converted several to the ways of common sense.

League Notes.

MR. E. M. SELLON, who has consented to act as chairman of the New York State N. L. L. sub-committee, has decided to devote nearly his whole time to the Liberal League cause, and for the present will make a specialty of circulating petitions in favor of church taxation. His address is No. 12 South Division St., Buffalo, N. Y. Every Liberal in the state should open a correspondence witn Bro. Sellon.

THE First Liberal League of St. Joseph County, of Michigan, which has for some time been a very active, independent League, at its last meeting indorsed the National Liberal League platform, and the resolutions adopted at Cincinnati, and voted to take out a charter and become auxiliary to the National Liberal League. This is a valuable accession.

OUR young Liberal speaker of Shrewsbury, Vt., writes, "We completed our organization yesterday with seventeen charter members, as noble an assembly of men and women as ever met in this town." This is the second League organized in the Green Mountain state, and I hope our earnest representative on the Executive Committee for Vermont, Bro. Paul Dillingham, of West Pawlet, will see to it that the work so well commenced will continue.

TO MY knowledge the Liberal League movement has no better friend or worker than Bro. Walter Walker, our representative of Utah, and I was sorry to see him so severely criticised in a recent number of THE TRUTH SEEKER. There is nothing that retards our cause so much as the publication of such communications. Of course our Liberal friends are not perfect, and at times must disagree, but for the love of the cause they should not bring these things before the Liberal public. Our enemies will do all that is necessary of that kind of business.

MR. HENRY DAMON, our Massachusetts representative, gives a good report from the Bay state. He writes: "We are progressing in Boston in League work, having made a steady gain in interest and attendance at our meetings. Paine Hall Liberal League holds its regular monthly meetings in Investigator Hall, and has become an institution united in the bonds of fraternal feeling, agreeing to disagree, and I think this League can always be relied upon as true and steadfast to the cause. Shawmut Liberal League has been for several weeks past holding public meetings and discussions in Wadsworth Hall on Sunday evenings. The hall was crowded last Sunday, Jan. 11th, and the League is flourishing like a green bay tree under the lead of its president, Frank Rivers.

THE readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER will bear me out in saying I seldom find fault with anyone, but as I hav written one item of that character in this communication, allow me to add another. There is no writer in THE TRUTH SEEKER whose writings I hav admired more than friend Leland's; but I hav been greatly pained to see him place Prof. Oliver's name with that of Joe Cook and others. There is no Liberal in the United States whom I prize more highly than I do Prof. Oliver. He doubtless has his mistakes—and I honestly think Prof. Oliver and the Tompkins County League made a mistake in the action they took some weeks since—but where do we find people who do not make mistakes? But I know the Liberal League and the Liberal cause hav no better friend than Prof. Oliver. At Cincinnati Elizur Wright stated publicly that he would like to hav Prof. Oliver to be his successor as President of the National Liberal League; and I must say I do not know where we could find a more worthy man to take Mr. Wright's place. These are my honest views, and I would like to hav them appear in THE TRUTH SEEKER. H. L. GREEN.

Is Dr. McCosh Indictable?

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: Fair play is a jewel, and consistency, if not a virtue, is at least a propriety, provided it does not involve persistence in the wrong. I am not at present going to argue against a law which makes indelicacy of language a penitentiary offense, but simply to suggest that, while it is a law, it should be impartially administered. Rev. Dr. McCosh, President of Princeton College, who is well known to be riding the two horses of science and theology at the same time—and if any man can do that successfully he can—has lately published a book on the "Emotions," in which is a section on the "Love of the Sexes." Dr. McCosh undoubtedly means no harm, but this section more effectively undermines the existing laws of marriage than anything which the Freelovers, so-called, hav ever published. Moreover, it contains expressions (see page 221) which, as United States Judges Clark and Benedict hav interpreted the law, are unmailable. Therefore, if Rev. Joseph Cook and his zealous coadjutor, Anthony Comstock, should entice Dr. McCosh to send a copy to Mr. Comstock through the mail, the President of Princeton would hav to go to Albany to assist D. M. Bennett in making shoes. And unless Mrs. Hayes should change her opinion, he would hav to stay there, whatever opinion Mr. Hayes and Attorney-General Devens might hav about his work on the "Emotions." To such nonsense and folly does a civil government stoop when it succumbs to ecclesiastical dictation.

The Idea of a Soul.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: In your issue of January 10th, M. S. Sherman, M.D., gives an amusing view of the human soul and attempts to throw some light upon that subject, but the attempt throws only a pencil ray, which makes the darkness upon that subject more felt.

Now, since all theories ought to be founded on facts, all explanations supported by facts, and all reasoning in accordance with facts, I would ask Mr. Sherman how he knows there is a "progressed soul" that "has lived in all progressive forms of life from the atom up to man." Can he remember when he was a progressive soul-atom progressing up to man? or can he remember anything before he was born? The progressive soul-atom, progressing up to man, ought to remember all the progressive forms it has passed through, unless the progressive atom is unconscious, in which case it is not a soul. And for any one to say that a soul exists without consciousness is equal to saying that an organized body exists without form.

The question, "What is the soul?" Mr. Sherman does not answer. The first part to prove in this subject is that a soul exists. The next is to prove what it is, and then find proof of its eternal existence. Any one undertaking this task, let him make his explanations plain enough not to require another explanation.

If Mr. Sherman supports the theory that there are atoms of matter in existence which possess the intelligent and conscious-giving principle to an organized body, he is as much a Materialist as any of us, but makes use of a misnomer in the word "soul."

Say, is a progressive soul-atom divine?
Is this said to puzzle or to lose time?
A great eternal progressive imaging—
Pray catch and cage it;
Bring it to me that I may guage it.
I must confess I love to chatter.
But I, like you, know nothing else about the matter.

The idea of the human soul grew out of human pride, and the word soul "is a word to flatter human pride and hide its ignorance." WM. S. DEEDS.

Moses and Modern Greenbackism.

HOW A DISCIPLE OF THE FORMER WAS MADE TO SUFFER FOR THE SINS OF THE LATTER.

I received No. 3. Vol. 2, dated Dec. 18th. Reading down the first column, my eye fell upon this heading, "For Preachers and Praying Men." I knew this included me, because I am a praying man; and by the time I had read a dozen lines I thought it seemed as though it was pointed directly at me. I followed the article until I read, "Take from your table that book, the Bible." I did not read another word, but reached for the book, which was on the table at my side. I opened it and began to read Genesis xvi, 1, and read four verses I stopped. I read it again. "Now," I said "I know that the Sentinel means me," for my Sarai also is barren. I pressed the blessed book to my heart and said, "What a comfort thou art to a Christian man!" I wondered who had made my case known to the Sentinel: it was highly gratifying to see that paper taking such a lively interest in my happiness. In the anticipations of the moment I forgot the paper. I read the four verses in the Bible again. I pondered over them and read them again. I wished to enjoy those pleasures which Abram, "the father of the faithful," had enjoyed, the Bible sanctioned, and so many preachers partook of. However, my way was not clear; my "Sarai" and the "handmaid" (hired girl) were both Infidels and would not accept the teachings of the holy writ.

After revolving the matter in my mind for some time, I concluded that it would be best to say nothing to "Sarai" about it, but appeal direct to the "handmaid." At first I was troubled with some doubt, but remembering that our Savior said that "if we had faith as a grain of mustard-seed . . . nothing should be impossible unto us," I took courage. The first thing to be done was to get "Sarai" away from home. A plan soon presented itself. I gave her fifteen cents and told her to go down town and get five cents each of bread, coffee, and sugar. I had a dollar besides, but I wanted to giv that to the Foreign Mission fund. As soon as "Sarai" had started, I called the "handmaid" into the sitting-room and read to her the four verses that had filled my mind with such great anticipations, and asked her what she thought of them. She turned on me with all the vengeance of a tigress. She said that such stuff was not fit to be read by decent men or women, and that I might be a Christian, but that I was no gentleman. With her eyes flashing fire she left the room and began picking up her clothes with the purpose of leaving the house. I pleaded with her and begged of her to stay and let the matter drop and think no more about it; that I meant no harm; that I had only read what was in the Bible, and that the book was written by God, and therefore there could be nothing bad in it; but it was of no use. On her way down town she met "Sarai" coming with her groceries. She told "Sarai" all that had happened. They parted. "Sarai" came home on the quickest time of her life. Rage was pictured in her every feature. "You're a nice thing," she said, as she opened the door. She said but little, but began packing clothes, dishes, bedding, and in fact about everything there was in the house. I said, "What are you going to do?" She answered, "I am going to take all that I brought with me and go home to my father and mother." In an hour she was gone with her goods, and I was left alone, seated on the floor, surrounded by bare walls, meditating on the changes that may occur and the "trials and afflictions we are destined to endure while traveling through this vale of tears." I realize the fact that "man that is born of woman is of few days and full of trouble." A hope flashed across my mind that Edison or some other inventor might contrive a new mode of being born. The relaxation was but momentary. At that moment I heard a rap at the door. I opened it and there saw Hans Little, the constable. He said he had a warrant for my arrest.

I was forthwith dragged before his Honor Esquire Schmidt to answer to a charge of making vile propositions, etc., to a certain H. M. (handmaid) Hager. Our late handmaid was the complainant and chief witness. The court, the constable, and all witnesses were "hard-money" people. I could tell this by the hardness of their faces. I saw at once that there was no hope for a Greenbacker in such hands as theirs. I called for a jury, but the summoning was so manipulated as to place all hard-money men in the box. My courage was gone. I scarcely knew what to do. At this discouraging moment the case was called. The testimony of the prosecuting witness was taken by the court. I was called to giv answer to the charge. I wished to be put upon oath, and called for a Bible upon which to swear. His Honor said that there had never been a Bible in his court, and asked why I was so particular about having one now. I told him that I did not think it possible for any person to tell the truth without having first sworn to do so, with his hand on the holy writ. The Bible was brought and I was duly sworn. I thought I had done nothing but what was sanctioned by Scripture, and ought not to be punished for endeavoring to liv in accordance with it; but it was of no use. From the moment that it was known that I read a Greenback paper they were determined to convict me of something. The court in his charge to the jury said: "The religion of the prisoner is not to weigh against him in this case, but if you, after cool deliberation, are satisfied that he is a Greenbacker, you are to bring in a verdict of guilty; but if, on the contrary, you find that he is for hard money—that the rich may become richer and the poor poorer—then in that case you will find him not guilty." At this moment a paper was slipped into my hand by the clerk of the court, upon which was written: "Recant your Greenback doctrine, join the hard-money party, and your case is won; otherwise you are certain of a term in the state prison, if for no other purpose than to get rid of your vote." I was struck with terror. I said to a man standing near that it was terrible to think of going to prison where I could not see a Christian face until my time was out and I was free again. "Oh," said he, "you need not trouble yourself about that. The prisons are full of Christians; almost every convict that is sent up is a believer in a vicarious atonement. You will hav plenty of religious company; but you will find no Greenbackers there." The jury was out just long enough to frame the following verdict: "We find the prisoner guilty (the court smiled) of being a Greenbacker, but not guilty of any other offense, as his actions are sanctioned by Scripture." The court raved, and said: "This country is not governed by Scripture. It has nothing to do with the law of the land. By its authority innocence has been butchered in the cradle; women hav been slain for no other crime than being mothers; thousands of virgins hav been turned over to a beastly soldiery; fathers hav been put to the sword for defending their homes; murderers hav been said to be men after God's own heart; human sacrifice has been encouraged, polygamy sanctioned, adultery practiced, incest tolerated, drunkenness allowed, thieving recommended, slavery justified, and every vice has been made a virtue. No, gentlemen of the jury, you hav missed your mark. Go." The jury saw their mistake, but it was too late. They left the court-room with their faces somewhat lengthened, saying as they left, "We'll salt him next time." As there is no law for punishing Greenbackism, I was discharged. I went home and finished reading the article. My God! what a mistake I had made! I hastened over to the minister and gave him the paper, and asked him to read the article carefully, and to take the subject for a text to preach from next Sunday. YOUNG GREENBACKER.

THE Henderson Philanthropic club of Henderson, Sibley county, Minn., has filed articles of incorporation in the office of the secretary of state.

A FELLOW in the crowd started out, and meeting one of the Greenbackers who had been counted in, kicked up a fuss with him, and among other things called him a "loathsome pariah." "What's that you say?" yelled the Greenbacker. "You're a pariah, sir; a loathsome, web-footed pariah." The Greenbacker knocked him down, stepped on him several times, whipped his limp form round a lamp-post, and threw him over into a friend's yard with this piece of advice, "Never insult a man's mother, not even in Latin, for there's no telling how well the fellow may be up in the dead languages."

THE Peruvians had not a particle of free agency. The government of the Incas extended to all private conduct, words, and even thoughts of its vassals, yet it was mild and paternal, and the people were prosperous and happy and contented, as well as very moral and free from vices. Robbery and theft were unknown, and everything was conducted with great order.—Prescott.

Are Public Schools to Be Considered as Religious or Sectarian Institutions?

As a citizen, I shall take it in this scriptural sense, that "the last shall be first, and the first last," that no pre-eminence shall be given to God's elect. The broad basis of American freedom, guaranteed by its Constitution, is the birthright of all freemen, no matter in what clime or condition circumstances hav placed them. All men are free and equal within the law. Divine law says, "God has endowed man with will, memory, and understanding (capable of governing himself), a free agent to do good or evil." Of all evils I choose the least. With due respect to all Christian admirers, and to all who may differ in opinion, I ask, if there is a wrong in our public or social system, for those who are aggrieved to state their grievance before the public in their respective localities, in public halls, and not in priestly conclave where the people are excluded. Let the disaffected hear the voice of the people, for all things should be in common for the good of the people, by the people, and for the people? Our public schools hav derived their authority from the fathers of this republic, irrespective of church or creed. As I find no religious sect undermining those fundamental principles but the holy Roman Catholic church—giving to it the title it claims—I shall hav reference to that church more than all others. The laity of the Roman Catholic church are a generous and industrious people, who would never meddle with our public schools in their mode of discipline were it not for their crafty clergy, who pay no honor or allegiance to any authority outside the church of Rome. Their vows at their ordination are ample evidence. When they can vow or swear at their altars, in their churches in the United States of America, that they owe their allegiance to the pope of Rome in preference to all other men, and to promote the interest of their church, I grieve that so generous a people as the Irish, more so than the German or French Catholics, should be so deluded. The popes of Rome hav already, and from time to time, made manifest their dislike to public schools. The bishops in Ireland hav echoed the same tune as the pope, and the bishops and priests in America, with their instructions from the fountain-head, hav terrified their pious people into the delusion that our public schools do not teach morality or virtue, but Infidelity and Freethought.

Let us meet our public school question upon a religious basis for their especial benefit. Brotherly love, or love to one another, is all religion can boast of, and the law and the prophets are fulfilled.

In a letter from the Bishop of Tournai on "Religious Education in Belgium," as published in the New York Freeman's Journal, December 13, 1879, this respected bishop says: "The education which it is proposed to giv children, and which is called by the name of Christian in order to deceive people, is based on the antichristian maxim of equal respect for all modes of worship. This education they impudently adorn with the fine name of national education. Every school where children are taught this fatal maxim is by the very fact anti-Catholic and antichristian, and can only serve to form Freethinkers. There is but one only God, one only Savior, one only true religion, one only church, outside of which there is no salvation. Everything is conveniently arranged; the masters and the mistresses of schools are trained to carry out this perfidious design to the end."

This is the general teaching that Roman Catholic bishops and priests impose upon their respective flocks in America. Should such preachers be admitted into the privileges of citizenship in this republic? No. They are wolves in sheep's clothing. No republic can exist where they hav influence. Their titles are obnoxious to our public institutions. We don't grant foreign titles to our public officers, nor to our sons of toil; but we hav titles conferred upon ecclesiastical citizens of America by a foreign prince, the pope of Rome, to "His Eminence, John, Cardinal McCloskey, Archbishop of New York," and to bishops and vicar-generals pretending to be citizens of this republic.

I shall now quote from the text-book of those divines, as published in the English college at Rheims, A.D. 1582. Jesus sent twelve disciples, and commanded them, saying: "Go not into the way of the Gentiles, and into the cities of the Samaritans enter not, but go rather to the lost sheep of the house of Israel. Preach, saying, The kingdom of heaven is at hand. Heal the sick, raise the dead, cleanse the lepers, cast out devils. Gratis you hav received; gratis giv" (Matt. x, 5–8).

There is no authority here that Christ established a Catholic church with a pope or vicar-general at its head to dictate to any race of people how they shall worship or teach school. Do as you are commanded to do and you do well. Stop your increasing revenues by taxing your church property and you might do better. "For I say to you that unless your justice abound more than that of the scribes and the Pharisees, you shall not enter into the kingdom of heaven" (Matt. v, 20).

Jews, proselytes, Cretes, and Arabians, we hav heard them speak in our own tongue the wonderful works of God which were spoken of by the prophet Joel and was St Peter's sermon to the people, as related in Acts ii, 11, 16. We American citizens want you to confine yourselves to the things that are of God and not to the things that are of men, fearing you might be rebuked, as Christ rebuked Peter: "Go after me, Satan, thou art a scandal unto me, because thou dost not relish the things that are of God but the things that are of men" (Matt. xvi, 23).

I compare you to the Pharisees, a precise set of men, making profession of a more exact observance of the law than your divine master gave you any authority to do. The scribes were the doctors of the law of Moses, and Christ said, "I am not come to destroy but to fulfil." (Matt. v, 17). In this nineteenth century hav you Romanists set yourselves up to destroy our religious or secular institutions?

Religion has always been an enemy to social and political happiness.

George Calvert, of Danbywiske, in Yorkshire, England, Knight of Baltimore in the county of Longford, in Ireland, under James I. of England, was one of the principal secretaries of state under said king, and resigned his office after five years' service, freely owning to his majesty that he was become a Roman Catholic. He obtained a patent of the province of Avalon in Newfoundland, but finding it exposed to the French, was obliged to abandon it. He came to Virginia, and, after taking a view of the country, returned to England and obtained from Charles I. a patent granting Maryland. It was called so in honor of the Queen, and was the first colony which was erected into a province of the English Empire. This grant by King Charles I. to George Calvert, Baron of Baltimore, in Ireland, was given June 20, 1632.

About two hundred gentlemen, chiefly Roman Catholics, sailed from England in November, 1632, and landed safe in America in the beginning of the next year. People of other respected religious denominations soon increased this new colony. In 1787 there were nine churches, which belonged to the following sects: German Calvinists, German Lutherans, English Episcopalians, English, Scotch, and Irish Presbyterians, English and Irish Roman Catholics, Baptists, Methodists, Quakers, Nicolites or New Quakers, Friends, and Memnomists, all enjoying the liberty of conscience. Lord Baltimore laid the foundation of this province on the broad basis of security to property and liberty in religion, establishing Christianity agreeably to the old common law, without allowing pre-eminence to any particular sect.

Happiness did not reign long among those people. A third assembly was held at St. John's in February, 1638–9, at which time a considerable change took place. "Holy Church shall hav all her rights and liberties," said the good Catholics. What rights or liberties do they want more than other religious sects if it is not to make their church the established church of the land or country wherever it gets a foothold? If Lord Baltimore, after he became a convert to the Roman Catholic church, could not see the absurdity of putting restrictions and penalties upon his subjects for not speaking with respect of the Virgin Mary, he should hav studied his Bible before he enacted laws in a new colony, promising to become great in the future, and see what Jesus Christ said of this woman Mary at the marriage feast in Canaan of Galilee: "Woman, what is that to me and to thee?" (St. John, ii, 4)

On another occasion, when the people said to Jesus that his mother and brethren were outside, he said, "Whosoever shall do the will of God, he is my brother and my sister and my mother" (St. Mark iii, 35; St. Luke viii, 21).

Lord Baltimore might rest assured from the sacred text that Jesus Christ had no respect of persons when he did not honor his mother with the respectable name of mother.

Religion goes beyond what its mission is. Love God and mind your own business is all that is required of you, and there is no danger that you will injure your neighbor.

After the Indian war was suppressed, in August, 1646, the assembly, being composed chiefly of Roman Catholics, passed an act "concerning religion." It recited that the enforcement of conscience had ever been of dangerous consequence in those countries in which it had been practiced, and it was enacted "that no persons professing to believe in Jesus Christ should be molested in respect of their religion or in the free exercise thereof, or be compelled to the exercise of any other religion against their consent, so that they be not unfaithful to the proprietary or conspire against the civil government."

The Liberal religious views of the Roman Catholic laity in this country before it became a republic are very different from the religious ideas of the Roman Catholic popes, bishops, and priests since the country became a republic. Do they not refuse absolution to the parents that send their children to the public school, and threaten them they shall die without a Christian burial? This alone is enough to drive fears into a superstitious believer in the church.

Alas! there is another consideration here; they know what portion of their respective flocks to take advantage of; it is the illiterate portion and those that are not the supreme heads of their own families.

Let us look at religious legislation a little later in the new colony—how freedom of conscience is tampered with. In the Legislative Assembly of the new province it was enacted "that any one speaking reproachfully against the Blessed Virgin or the apostles should forfeit five pounds [twenty-five dollars]; but blasphemy against God should be punished with death." This act passed in 1649 and was confirmed in 1676 among the perpetual laws of the province. How many thousands of people in America to-day don't respect the name of those illiterate fishermen, who had neither principle nor faith in their leader, Christ!

The New Testament will satisfy any impartial reader. Should we be persecuted for conscience' sake and made to believe as holy church teaches? We find most all religious sects disagree with the religious theory of their religious neighbors, and the Roman Catholic church making war upon our American schools of learning because they are public and free to all, Turk, Jew, or heathen, without respect of persons.

Let there be taxes immediately put on church property of every religious sect and apply it to the support of our public schools in the country at large. Don't let Bibles or prayers get a foothold in any of our public institutions; they are dangerous weapons to a republic. Let sectarian schools and churches be supported as private institutions by their admirers. Let the freedom of all our public schools be supported by the general tax of church property, which will lighten the tax upon every industrious producer. Agitate this question all over this land of liberty, the home of the oppressed from every clime, and don't let the fire of indignation kindle into a blaze, and we suffer as the Irish suffer in their native land by their clergy abandoning them for the love and support they get from monarchy.

The American Constitution the pope has violently condemned. The Syllabus says that men are not free; that they are not capable of taking care of themselves; that the laity in the most important matters must be guided and governed by the clergy; that the press ought to be under a censorship; that the Catholic religion being true, all others are false, and therefore ought not to be tolerated.

Under such teaching as this, every true Catholic is bound by ecclesiastical submission to think and act as his priest tells him. A republic of true Catholics becomes a theocracy, administering to themselves a tithe or tax for their support, as the history of the Old Country can testify. All public offices must be filled at their bidding, or the country is in danger of hell's fire and excommunication.

No republican form of government of the people, by the free will of the people, and for the general good of the people, can exist where priests, prophets, or popes are always aiming to destroy man's will, memory, and understanding—a natural right that we are all endowed with—if we only apply it to the best interests of a free government for the general protection and happiness of all men, irrespective of color or creed. We cannot hav any form of law more simple and just than what our Constitution declares, to wit, that all men are free and equal; they can worship as their conscience dictates. We thank Infidel ideas for this noble blessing. What improvement can you add to it? If any citizen interferes with the liberty of conscience, aiming to infuse any religious dogmas or teaching of the Bible or prayers in our public schools or national institutions, or where citizens assemble to make laws for either national or state interests; for such offense let such citizen be disqualified and be no longer a citizen. Then, as an alien, let them be sent to the court or church they owe their allegiance to, paying the cheapest rate of travel therefor, to get them outside the limits of our republic. Our American republic cannot exist with such an enemy as a citizen. All religious denominations are free to worship God according to the dictates of their own conscience, but they must not meddle with our public institutions, the safeguard of the people.

When a church sets itself up as superior to all others, it is time to know where it gets its authority from, that we might worship faithfully in their fold. Barnabas and Saul (Paul) are the first lights of Christianity.

The religion of the apostles was simple and easily understood, if you read the Acts of the Apostles and teaching of Paul.

The Roman Catholic Church is a mysterious church, preaching mysteries and adoration to saints, holding fast that their ministry is the great inspired spirit of all ages and nations, a theory as absurd as the preaching of Mohammed, who said he was a greater spirit than Moses or Christ. Put Catholic theories into our public schools, and what do you profit by it? A nation of serfs to the church of Rome, by whom all presidents and public officers receive their power, and not from the people.

The apostle Paul, speaking of the Romans, says, "They are wise in their own conceit." Popes and bishops can see the mote in their neighbor's eye, but don't see the beam in their own. The Catholic church is not a universal church, as they proclaim it to be. There is no nation under the sun that recognizes it as such. All other churches are more respected for their fidelity and obedience to the laws of the state. There is no nation where the various religious sects are not protected under their various forms. Rome, until recently, denied them protection.

The Roman Catholic church don't observe the law and the prophets that Christ, Peter, and Paul preached. "To love God above all things, and your neighbor as yourself," these are the only precepts, and the law and the prophets are fulfilled.

The Roman Catholic church has instituted seven sacraments and vows of celibacy, and an endless host of saints' festivals entirely foreign and antichristian to the preaching of Paul, the apostle of Christianity; foreign to the teaching of Christ, brotherly love, and foreign to Peter. Christ has no respect of persons. The Roman Catholic church is delusive. It says mankind of every description is your neighbor, but it does not practice the theory. Therefore it is false, and dangerous to a nation's prosperity.

"Ye men of Israel, hear these words: Jesus of Nazareth [not the son of God], approved of God among you by miracles and wonders and signs, which God did by him in the midst of you, as you also know, you hav crucified and put to death by the hands of wicked men" (Acts ii, 22, 23).

"And it shall come to pass that whosoever shall call upon the name of the Lord shall be saved." The apostles were Communists; they communed, with their saints in their various localities. "All they that believed were together, and had all things common." Breaking bread from house to house, they took their meat with gladness and simplicity of heart. They did not set themselves up superior to other men.

Peter, opening his mouth, said: "In truth, I perceive that God is no respecter of persons; but in every nation, he that feareth him and worketh justice is acceptable to him" (Acts x, 34, 35). Jesus of Nazareth, Peter said, "God anointed him with the Holy Ghost, and with power, who went about doing good, and healing all that were oppressed by the devil, for God was with him. We are witnesses of all things which he did in the land of the Jews, and in Jerusalem, whom they killed, hanging him upon a tree."

Where is the Roman Catholic church not striving to preach a false doctrine to this, by making three Gods out of one? "By the imposition of the hands of the apostles, the Holy Ghost was given" (Acts viii, 19). Can the popes or bishops of Rome giv the Holy Ghost by the imposition of hands; if so, it is the third person of their blessed trinity. But they would like to be taught in our public schools, with a cross to worship with the initials, J. N. J. R. (Jesus Nazarenus Judacorum Rex), in English, Jesus of Nazareth, king of the Jews. Leo XIII, Christ's vicar on earth, and counselor of all law, human and divine. It would be a nice looking picture in a public school, where the walls should be covered with the likenesses of George Washington, and his brave companions in arms, struggling for the universal freedom of mankind. Their sectarian schools would be draped with saints and sinners that never advanced the human happiness of any race of people.

The Holy Ghost was a thing very common in the days of the apostles. "The faithful of the circumcision [they were not Roman Catholic] who had come with Peter were astonished because the grace of the Holy Ghost was also poured out upon the Gentiles" (Acts x, 45). There is no separation from the Jewish faith all through the lives of the apostles, and Christ being dead at this time, where does the Roman Catholic church get its authority from, or its pre-eminence over any other church? It is an assumed authority, and they would inculcate this absurdity into our public schools if they had the chance. The church that was at Jerusalem sent Barnabas as far as Antioch; he exhorted the people there to continue in the Lord. "For he was a good man, and full of the Holy Ghost, and of faith" (Acts xi, 24). After a year's preaching in Antioch, "the disciples were first named Christians" (Acts xi, 26). The name of Roman Catholic was not known to those early Christians. Peter defends his having received the Gentiles into the church in Acts xi. The little pet phrases that are so well impressed upon young and innocent Catholic minds, Go teach all nations; Behold, I am with you till the end of time; The gates of hell shall not prevail against it (our church). There is no teaching in the New Testament or in the Acts of the apostles, where the apostles ever went out of their own neighboring nations, until Paul went to Rome. And their religion was the Jewish religion, and no Roman Catholic need apply. Salvation was of the Jews.

The Roman Catholic church in America would like the voice of the people to extol them, as the poor dupes did Herod, the king of Judea.

When Herod, in royal apparel, sat on the judgment seat, and made an oration, "the people with acclamation cried out, It is the voice of a god, and not of a man" (Acts xii, 22). When the pope sits in his judgment seat in his royal robes, it is pronounced by the cardinals, bishops, priests, and all believers in their faith, that he is infallible, and Christ's vicar upon earth.

So it is that nations, like individuals, get filled with the Holy Ghost. If Saul and Barnabas are sent by the Holy Ghost, as Acts xiii says, let us read Paul's epistle to the Romans at Rome: "For I am not ashamed of the gospel. For it is the power of God unto salvation, to every one that believeth, to the Jew first, and to the Greek" (Paul to the Romans, i, 16). It is evident Paul established no Roman Catholic church in Rome, neither did he appoint a pope and a host of cardinals, neither did he make laws of celibacy, for he understood human nature as it was in his time, and would be for all time. He prophesied well what they would do, "and in like manner the men also leaving the natural use of the women hav burned in their lusts one towards another" (Paul to the Romans i, 27). Where is the Roman Catholic church in its teachings sustained by the apostle of Christianity. Read also the first epistle to Timothy, third chapter, second and twelfth verses. The doctrine of the Roman Catholic church for many years and centuries has not been Christian according to the teachings of Christ or any of his apostles. For professing themselves wise they became fools. "Glory, and honor, and peace to every one that worketh good, to the Jew first, and also to the Greek. For there is no respect of persons with God" (Paul to the Romans, xi, 10, 11.) Inside of the Roman Catholic church none can be saved. When the Gentiles who hav not the law are a law to themselves.

What advantage hath the Jew? Much every way. First, indeed, because the Word of God was committed to them. (Paul to the Romans, iii, 1, 2.) According to this testimony Paul was a Christian Jew, but not a Catholic Jew. The decoy word Catholic means universal. Paul did not say prayers to Jesus Christ, the carpenter's son, or to Mary, his blessed and holy mother who was conceived by the Holy Ghost without her consent. Such prayers were not known in the Apostle Paul's time. They hav been manufactured by the church of the Gentiles at Rome, and handed down to posterity as a legacy.

Paul says, "This is the word of faith which we preach, That if thou confess with thy mouth the Lord Jesus, and believe in thy heart that God hath raised him from the dead, thou shalt be saved" (Paul to the Romans, x, 9). "For I say to you Gentiles, as long indeed as I am the apostle of the Gentiles I will honor my ministry" (Paul to the Romans, xi, 13). "For I say that Christ Jesus [not the son of God] was minister of the circumcision for the truth of God, to confirm the promises made to the fathers" (Paul to the Romans, xv, 8).

Now, from the written testimony of the apostle of Christianity, Paul, how can the Roman Catholic church delude so many people into the belief that there is only one true church, and that Jesus Christ established the holy Roman Catholic church, and promised the popes and bishops that he would be always with them? "Whatsoever you bind upon earth shall be bound in heaven, and whatsoever you loose on earth shall be loosed in heaven." Confessing your sins, or daily walks through life, is antichristian according to the apostle Paul's teaching. "All is vanity and perplexity of spirit."

Christ's teaching is very plain, and easily understood; the teaching of the church of Rome is never understood, only as their clergy explain it. They speak in a language that is foreign to the people, and the apostles preached that they might be understood by the people. These truths were preached by the apostles at the church of Jerusalem, and, by the apostles Paul and Barnabas, at the church in Antioch. They preached to all nations, as it was understood at the time in the various cities in Judea and Galilee. They communed with the people of those cities, as they termed them saints, hence the Catholic church of Rome prays for the communion of saints. England, Ireland, or Scotland they had not yet visited, nor did they liv long enough to emigrate here. America was unknown to them, even to Christ himself. Now we hav plenty of pretenders of his preaching and divine religion, but we do not want it introduced into our public schools.

I am an Irishman by birth, but an American by conviction. I was a Roman Catholic, but I abandoned the silly faith and hypocrisy of the clergy. I learned my education in Catholic schools in my native Ireland; my children are educated in our public schools in America, and I am satisfied they must and shall be preserved. My religion is Infidel for the past twenty-five years, for I find them more honest and truthful in their teaching than the general teaching absurdities of ecclesiastics or ministers of the gospel. I am at a loss to know whose gospel they preach from. It is no wonder men would sever their religious ties from them, and become free and independent thinkers. If Roman Catholics would read more of their Bible and less of their catechisms, wisdom would flow to them as it does to me.

Let every patriotic press in the land publish candid sentiments, and we will soon eradicate usurpation and bigotry from our public schools. M. H. BLACKFORD.

Thoughts for the Thoughtless.

INSCRIBED TO J. H. DODD.

"For aught you know you might be needlessly damning souls."—J. H. Dodd.

I hav never been the cause of damning one single individual soul in all my life. This is a certain fact, for the reason that no great, wise, and good being would allow one of his creatures the power or the opportunity to damn another. Common sense scouts such a preposterous idea. Would a good father allow a child of his to be led into vice and ruin by any person when he knew beforehand that this was to occur and he could avert it. Now, if there be a God he knows I am doing all I can to teach what I think are facts and truth, and to exterminate what I believ to be erroneous and evil; and if my honest efforts for the good of my brothers and sisters were really a means of damning them, this God would know it and take measures to avert so awful a certainty. If an Infidel rears a large family in Atheism, and the children grow up in utter unbelief of gods, Christs, and Bibles, are they to be cast out from eternal happiness because they chanced to be born in an Infidel home?

Such ideas as this one of yours that heads my letter are a disgrace to the intelligence and good sense of the educated thinkers of the age. I do not see how thee thyself can believe it to be true that a God would remain passive and see me "damn scores" of his children when with a mere effort of the will he could either render my teachings nugatory in effect, or take from me a life so destructive to the best interests of humanity?

Please try again, my friend, and giv me some better reason than this for ceasing to propagate my opinions and ideas.

I hav yet to hear the first reasonable objection from thy pen to my course and my work. If this is thy best argument, I can joyfully go on, certain that though I accomplish but little good I am surely doing no evil or injury to the present or to the supposed hereafter of any one.

"You say there is a God
Above the boundless sky,
A wise and wondrous deity
Whose strength none can defy.

You say that he is seated
Upon a throne most grand,
Millions of angels at his beck—
Why don't he lend a hand?

See how the earth is groaning,
What countless tears are shed;
See how the plague stalks forward,
And brave and sweet lie dead.

Homes burn and hearts are breaking,
Grim murder stalks the land;
You say he is omnipotent—
Why don't he lend a hand?"

The Jealousy of the Gods.

The gods of olden time were said to be jealous of such as aspire to final absorption.

We'll hope for better things of the gods of this progressive age.

In all deference to the "Trinity," and with great appreciation of the good derived therefrom, we arrive at the conclusion that when educated in and imbued with the likeness of our holy eternal parentage, wisdom and love, wisdom to guide our footsteps, our thoughts, love, to deal kindly, affectionately with all, unfortunates not excepted. When our "earthly house" is kept in order by the tabernacle, the temple of the living God, we hav no further use for a "trinity," nor for a third thereof.

We're in for final absorption, swallowed up in wisdom and love, the desideratum of all well-balanced minds in all ages since humanity began to be, to do, and to suffer.

W. S. Bell's Lectures.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The crowded houses that greeted W. S. Bell in his recent course of lectures in our little village shows that the common people are beginning to do their own thinking. They turned out to hear about hell, morality, and revivals as considered from the standpoint of this century. They came out to hear a man who had climbed out of the old rut, made two thousand years ago, and whose eyes hav been opened to a new world of beauty, lying out in the free air of nature. The thousands in the rut know nothing of the beautiful flower-carpeted fields of science and reason, but to them, tramping along in the deep-worn rut, all is mud, mud, mud; all is vanity and vexation of spirit.

The members of our young League think they hav made a paying investment in getting Mr. Bell to lecture to our people. He handled his subjects in an able manner, and has left a good impression. His lectures are well calculated to do good. The only one of our members who has heard Mr. Underwood thinks highly of him, but prefers Mr. Bell as a lecturer.

There is only one church here in good running order, and that is the Methodist church. Then there are ten or a dozen people who talk and consider themselves the society, good society, cultured. Most of them hav been for years quietly hanging on the church just by their eyelids, and it has taken lots of church festivals and "sich" to keep them from falling off. Now, when the truths of free and independent thought are shaking the old church to its deepest foundations, the frantic efforts of those who hang by their eyelids to keep from falling is ludicrous to behold. Their fancy paints a great gulf below them, a bottomless pit. Poor creatures, they don't know that their feet almost touch the solid ground. If they did they would open their eyes, slip off of the frail, trembling, rotten old structure, and stand erect and alone on terra firma, like full-grown men. As it is they patronize the church for business and society's sake, and the church keeps its thumb over them, and its insatiable grasp on their pocket-books, all for the sake of Jesus. And the ins and outs all unite, like a happy family of doves, geese, foxes, weasels, chickens, and skunks, to pluck the poor Infidel, about this time of year, when a revival of religion and salary is to be shouted for. Take them when no common danger or mutual profit is scented and you ought to see the fur and feathers fly in the fighting among themselves.

If a man who does his own thinking lets them alone in their glory, as we all ought to do, it does no good; they are after him with a sharp stick as soon as they see that he no longer comes to their mill with his grist. Let them do what they may, it is their privilege; but let us continue to do our duty to ourselves, our children, and to the cause of truth, based as it is on the eternal principles and properties of the living matter that evolves a universe without limit in either space or time. GEO. W. MOREHOUSE.

Parallels.

Galileo was imprisoned in June, 1633, by the Christian Inquisition for an opinion; viz., that the earth revolved around the sun, when scripture and the church said it did not. This crime (?) was called "heresy."

D. M. Bennett was imprisoned in June, 1879, by the Christian Inquisition for an opinion; viz, that an American citizen had a right, on paying postage to his government for carrying a pamphlet, to hav that pamphlet carried; but his government, prompted by the church, instead of delivering the pamphlet as agreed, had the sender arrested and charged with "obscenity."

Galileo's offense was heresy, and he was imprisoned for it. Bennett's first offense was heresy, for which the church arrested him, but public sentiment was against imprisoning for heresy, and so they varied the charge to "obscenity," and imprisoned him for that.

Galileo endeavored to point out to his persecutors that scripture and theology were for salvation, and not to teach or to overturn science, but the inquisitors overruled this and condemned him.

Bennett endeavored to point out that it was against the Constitution to try him for such an alleged offense; that the matter posted was not obscene; that malice dictated the prosecution; that the judge, as such, ought not to decide the whole case as if no jury were present, etc., etc.; but the modern Inquisition would hear none of this, and sent the victim to prison.

Galileo had numerous friends in the church and elsewhere who personally loved and respected him, although some could not concur in his opinions. These did all they could to commute, or at least to mitigate, his imprisonment. At length he became blind, and the church then sarcastically gave him permission to see his friends.

Bennett's friends, not in the church but otherwise, tried to get his sentence commuted, but with no better success than Galileo's.

Many of Galileo's friends, in his day, were churchmen. Few or none of Bennett's friends are churchmen. Just here the parallel fails.

Galileo was imprisoned, and the cause was an astronomical opinion.

Bennett is imprisoned, and the cause was freedom of the press and liberty generally from church domination.

Thus two or three centuries of time hav elapsed and finds the United States courts parallel with the "Holy Inquisition;" and the church, "holy mother church," in statu quo; like Napoleon, "hereditary asses, they learn nothing and forget nothing." F. J. EMARY.

Letters from Friends.

GOATS VS. SHEEP.

UNIONTOWN, CAL., Jan. 1, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I perceive things in the Liberal ranks are working beautifully; the sexual-purity, high-bred, and cultured chaps are finding that their naturally timid natures and tender feet unfit them to follow their more hardy, clear-sighted, and sure-footed neighbors, the goats, in climbing the high crags and rugged cliffs of common sense into the clear sky of Freethought, and are gradually dropping back into the smooth green pastures of moral purity and Mother Grundy respectability. All right; that is just what is now and has been for a long time needed. These sanctimonious, self-righteous Pharisees hav been a dead drag to the car of mental liberty and social equity long enough. When I read the lauguage of that noble Roman, Elizur Wright, in which he defines himself on what he considers moral eligibility in a person as a member or officer of the National Liberal League, I felt like throwing up my hat and cheering the old hero.

I am sorry te learn that Mr. Underwood has concluded to range and pasture with the sheep; but since he cannot follow the bobtail goats, I am pleased to see that he also has expressed himself in a manner to leave no further doubt whether he is sheep or goat on the minds of his many admirers for his scholarly contributions to Liberal literature.

Nothing but a strong, sturdy, practical, common-sense remedy applied to all matters relating to the welfare and reformation of humanity, whether it is sexual, social, moral, religious, or political, will do humanity any good. Reformers in all the different branches must take the human race just as it is and work upwards, and not shut their eyes to the fact that we are nothing more than educated animals instead of gods and angels. If they will keep these facts in view they will see that this angelic purity business is a miserable farce, and can no longer be forced upon a healthy and intelligent humanity. If human beings could be produced as we raise potatoes or cabbages, and without sex, the saintly-purity stand might be reached; but as long as man is born of woman, selfish, ungrateful man will take advantage of woman's loving, trusting, and confiding nature and misuse and abuse it at times. The only thing that can be done towards remedying this great evil is to educate man up to a standard of manhood where he will consider it the lowest and basest cowardice to take undue advantage of woman's confidence in man, and teach woman how to guard against the evil consequences and undesired results of a compulsory and unhallowed association with man.

Here is the primary cause of nine-tenths of the misery and wretchedness of humanity, and unfortunately, as yet, the purity party who strive to ignore these stubborn facts hav and do exercise the legal power to say to mankind, "You may experiment and familiarize yourself all you want to with the laws regulating the sexes of the lower animals, but you must and shall not investigate the sexual laws of your own species."

Here is the great secret in a nutshell, and this vital question, although not openly acknowledged, is what is causing a final separation of the short-sighted sheep from the practical bobtail goats in the Liberal folds, and every true lover of his race will rejoice in getting clear of the encumbrance.

It is the sacred duty of every honest man and woman who has any regard for the welfare of the human race to make a determined effort against this fiendish and tyrannical suppression of knowledge and information throwing light on this highly important subject. You will be denounced by the purity shriekers as "rag-tags and bobtails;" you will be called uncultured, ignorant, obscene, and vulgar, but if you honestly and sincerely desire the relief of humanity from the evils alluded to you will pay no attention to the bleatings of the silly, timid sheep.

Mr. Bennett is now incurring the wrath of the hypocritical hyenas who delight in keeping mankind in ignorance for his manly defense of the rights and liberties of humanity. It is our duty to assume our share of that great responsibility by openly declaring our determination to do what we can to put a stop to this injurious, hypocritical nonsense.

Especially do I wish to call the attention of those honest sons of toil who sweat over the forge, shove the jackplane, and follow the plow, to what Mr. Bennett has done for them through THE TRUTH SEEKER in giving them wholesome Liberal instruction in his plain, common-sense style, which is now, by the kid-gloved Liberals, called vulgarity, and you, with the rest of us, are styled "rag-tag" and "bobtails." Sustain THE TRUTH SEEKER and uphold the fearless champion of your rights. A. LOHRY.

JAMESTOWN, COL., Jan. 11, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As I am not a good letter writer please accept my indorsement of the best sentiments written in your behalf in the columns of THE TRUTH SEEKER. The only regret I hav after perusing your paper every week is that there are not thirty-two pages instead of sixteen, even if the price were doubled. However, your letters and Mr. Leland's are well worth the present price if there were no more. There is only one thing needed to enhance the value of THE TRUTH SEEKER, and that is an article from the pen of Col. Ingersoll every week. Accept my kind regards, and I hope you may liv fifty years yet to conduct THE TRUTH SEEKER. JAMES MORRISON.

RENO, PA., Jan. 11, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav been a reader of your valuable paper for over a year, and am now a subscriber, and intend to remain one as long as it is conducted as at present. I think it never was better. As for your stepping down and out I say no. A man that has the honesty to confess his error as you did cannot be too highly esteemed. I know how to sympathize with you, for I hav been the victim of too much Christly love. I am one of the parties that refused to pay ten dollars to help support an idle minister to come here once in every two weeks and advocate views I despise. As a consequence, I am now working on three-fourths time. Yours, WM. COURSON.

OAK RIDGE, MO., Jan. 12, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: The old Christian time-keeper marks 1880, and I find myself a poor old man marking sixty-two; a recipient, however, of the cultured and moral Index to the tune of two of the "5,000 extras," laden with extra morals and sweetened with Christian modesty. Is it not to be feared that Abbot and Bundy, in their combined thirst for good morals and human decency, may thrust their proboscis through the crust of the earth and extract the seven thousand miles of molten matter, then, in moral rage, kick the shell to fragments and send us all in the direction of Ward's ducks and granny's teapot? For fear, I advise all tag-rag and bobtail to provide themselves with kid-gloves, that they may save their hands from the debris.

Come what will, send me the rough TRUTH SEEKER to the extent of the inclosed bit of steak from Aaron's calf. If earth remain, and I stay on top, and old Sol continues to dispense light and heat, when the amount is exhausted, I shall pick the flint and try it again.

To the family of truth-seekers, I greet you all a Happy New Year. M. J. HINES.

SOUTH BARRE, Jan. 19, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, now of Albany, by neglect of President Hayes, and he knowing said Bennett to be guilty of no crime, and having been petitioned by two hundred thousand American citizens—a number before unknown in our history—to be set at liberty, and yet heeds not the request. What language, many are asking, can be used in condemnation of Hayes for such inhuman neglect and contemptible truckling to priestcraft?

I voted for Hayes, and hope Mr. Bennett will forgive me. I do not expect God will, for he cannot forgive sin. If the leader of a party will neglect to adjust such flagrant wrongs as has been done to Bennett only to gratify the church, then what may we not look for to re-elect the present inners? I did belong to the Republican party until their conduct became too glaring. Never in our country has a party favored personal and private ends or wants as the present one. I think the time is not far distant when justice and necessity will demand a change. The people are ready. We want leaders to organize.

I hav been West for the last two months, and wherever I went I found a growing displeasure among the people and less and less confidence in Hayes. Many church-members are surprised at his course with Bennett. He is overdoing for Christ at the expense of justice and liberty.

I am more and more convinced that the R.-P. Journal is not what the people want on this or the other side. Acting for their interest some years since in securing patrons, I was not a little surprised on having some come to me and show me charges from the office against them for not paying when they did, for I received the money from them and sent it to the R.-P. Journal office. This of course placed me in a very unpleasant position, implying, of course, that I had not sent the money. I called for an explanation and requested my paper stopped. After a long time I received an explanation that all was right. But that was nothing compared with the R.-P. Journal's attack on Bennett in prison; it is so cowardly. Well, it is said God hates cowards, and we hope the people will learn to. I think Bundy is jealous of THE TRUTH SEEKER, for he knows hundreds of Spiritualists are taking it. I hav taken it from the beginning. I hope the paper will survive, and I shall do all I can for it. Please find inclosed $5 and place the same to my credit, and oblige yours,

M. B. DE LANO.

DANSVILLE, MICH., Nov. 26, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: As Mr. Bennett, in his "Fourth Letter from Albany," expresses a desire that all of the patrons of his paper giv their views with regard to his continuing his connection with THE TRUTH SEEKER (of course he means on his release from prison), as one of the subscribers, I will only answer for myself.

First, I hav no fault to find with the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER since Mr. Bennett's sentence and incarceration last June, yet I would like very much to see or know that the old hero was restored to liberty and in his sanctum managing his own business in his own way like any other free-born American citizen.

I must say I admire Mr. Bennett's open, frank, manly, and honest manner in treating the subject out of which Abbot and Bundy are trying to make so much capital, and that, too, while Mr. Bennett is confined in a Christian prison and unable to defend himself. Such defamers of character and under such circumstances! Why, if the whole vault of heaven were one vast sheet of canvas, well prepared for the artist's brush, and earth one vast cauldron of paint, and the fabulous Angel Gabriel, or even Omnipotence himself, to handle the brush, they could not do justice to such characters as Abbot and Bundy. It is utterly impossible to paint the character of the slanderer, either with pen or brush, and do the subject anything like justice. It is quite probable that if the little peccadilloes of those two immaculate, pure, and withal cultured gentlemen's lives were laid open to public gaze, they would not be held in any higher estimation, even by the elect, than most other people.

But keep THE TRUTH SEEKER alive. If I had the means I would cheerfully do more than my share; but, unfortunately for myself and the cause of liberty, I am very poor in this world's goods. You hav my best wishes and sympathy in the good cause to which your noble paper is so faithfully devoted. But to Mr. Bennett I would say, Cheer up, old hero; better men than you in the Christian world's estimation hav smiled on woman. Old King David, the "man after God's own heart," had to kill Uriah in order to carry out his designs in regard to Mrs. Uriah. And even Christ himself is reported to hav smiled on the fair sex, or at least to hav entertained them very kindly; and last of all, but not the least, the God-ordained and immaculate Beecher is reported to hav been very soft on a woman not his own. I venture to say that if Mr. Bennett had been a member of a popular Christian church he might hav been guilty of ten times as much as he now confesses to, and had he made as clean a breast of it as he did, the church would hav elevated him to the topmost round in the ladder of fame for meekness and honesty. In fact, it would hav been the making of his fortune in this world and a sure passport to the next.

In conclusion, Mr. Editor, giv the twain, Abbot and Bundy, plenty of rope, and it will only be a question of time when they will eventually hang themselves.

Yours for the broadest liberty, E. J. SMITH.

MARIPOSA, CAL., Jan. 12, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I send you P. O. order for five dollars—three to renew my subscription to the paper for this year, and the two dollars is my promise to pay twenty-five cents a month from the time you were sent to prison.

Now, friend Bennett, you said in your "Fourth Letter from Albany" that you wanted to hear from all Liberals, and if they wished you to step down and out from the editorship of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I, for one, say, Go on. I hav talked with a good number of Liberals in this part of the country, and I hav not seen one but says he thinks more of you since that outspoken, manly confession than before. I and all whom I hav talked with are of the opinion that Abbot, Bundy & Co. would, in such a situation, hav fallen back behind a breastwork of lies. As for myself, Abbot, Bundy & Co. are too mean and contemptible to talk about. There are not enough words in the English language to express my contempt for all their kind. Cowards, sneaks, and all that, is drawing it very mild.

You must be of good cheer, old man; you are now on the home-stretch. Don't worry. I hope the cold winter will slide by and spring will come and find you healthy and strong. And the first day of May may be the happiest May Day you ever saw in your life.

Yours for the cause of justice, now and till death,
S. L. HOGAN.

HARRISBURG, OR., Dec. 26, 1879.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav attentively read the details of your persecution, with a full exhibit of the torrents of cowardly malignity that hav been aimed against you. I was pained upon the reading of your confession, but found ample compensation in its pre-eminent candor, cogency, and heroism. I now know more of the native power and nobility of your mind. I pledge the cordial hand to you and the Liberals everywhere. Our cause is imperative. It is the only rational exponent of the interests and rights of man. False theology has ever been the prolific source of ignorance, superstition, war, and tyranny. Away with it. I here speak for myself, as well as for the inclosed list of renewal and new subscribers for your brave and racy paper. Success to the champions of knowledge, liberty, and happiness! Respectfully, J. C. SNODGRASS.

ROCHESTER, MINN., Jan. 12, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: You are doing a noble work, as seen by your increasing list of subscribers. It is arousing thousands from the lethargy into which they hav fallen by being able to read both sides and note the injustice done D. M. Bennett. Once break through the bitter prejudices of the people and giv them something "new under the sun" to explain and reason upon, and they are on the road of progression, which, to me, seems limitless.

The request of H. L. Green in reference to Mrs. E. D. Slenker is a very thoughtful one. I hav forwarded my mite. Such able writers ought to be kept busy.

This city, with a population of five thousand, and no less than a dozen churches, cannot afford a Liberal League organization yet, nor does it sustain a Liberal lecturer. We hav a reading-room, but papers like THE TRUTH SEEKER, Banner of Light, and Mind and Matter are not to be found there. I would like to ask why reading rooms and libraries are closed on Sundays? Is there anything immoral in going there to read? That is the only day laboring people hav the time to spare. Custom seems to me wrong, and the sooner obliterated the better for humanity. I want to urge the necessity of women thinking and reasoning more for themselves—learning the laws governing their physical and spiritual bodies, for it is said we hav two.

Inclosed find $1.50, for six months' subscription. Wishing for THE TRUTH SEEKER many years of usefulness and the early release of D. M. Bennett, I am, for reform,

MRS. FLORENCE W. FOX.

LANCASTER, WIS., Jan. 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS: I think it an outrage the way Mr. Bennett has been treated. I subscribed for your paper when it was first started at Paris, Ill., and hav taken it ever since, and would take it for a thousand years if I could liv that long and hav money to pay for it.

I hope friend Bennett will soon be released from prison, where he was put without any cause whatever, and enjoy the liberty which he has been so unjustly deprived of.

Inclosed you will please find draft for five dollars, three to pay my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880, the other two to be used to pay expenses in battling against your enemies or as you see fit. Your friend, as ever,

JOHN WOOLSTENHOLME.

HYDE PARK, MASS., Jan. 17, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER: I regard Mr. Bennett as a truth seeker, a truth speaker, and a doer of righteousness. Now that he, like many an ancient worthy, is in prison, I would speak to and for him words of truth and tenderness. For no evil deed of his own is he now suffering. He is a martyr to truth and liberty. To many honest people he is now a rock of offense; but the offense is not in him but in themselves. His day of rejoicing and theirs of repentance, as I believe, will yet come. I greet him as a brother beloved.

I wish to subscribe for one copy of "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," mentioned in Mr. Bennett's sixth letter from Albany. Yours fraternally, A. E. GILES.

PITTSBURGH, PA., Jan. 19, 1880.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT: I hav thought several times of writing Mr. Bennett, personally, a letter of sympathy, but I understand from one of his letters from "Behind the Bars" that he has been supplied with so many that I hated to bother him, as he still complains about his head; but I hope he will be able to hold out until his time is out, and that he may liv long enough to see the result of his incarceration for trying to do good in his own way to his fellow-man. I hav perused his letters carefully and am satisfied that he has not wronged any one; but I am not his judge to pass sentence in his case. What has any one to do with another's private business? I hope he will still keep up his courage and be of good cheer. I know he has quite a number of friends in Pittsburgh—more than he had a year ago—and they are still on the increase. I hav in my own way distributed quite a number of last year's TRUTH SEEKERS, with good results. I know of some who hav by that means subscribed for the paper.

Friend Macdonald, I hav a good word for you for your perseverance and manly assistance in keeping the paper going so well in the absence of our friend Bennett. I hope you will stick to your post until he is able once more to take the lead. I say you hav done well. Let Bundy and all his kind go to grass. They are like mud—the more you meddle with it the dirtier you get. I hope to join with some more Liberals to giv Mr. Bennett some pecuniary aid on his departure from his present abode. I got over sixty names to a petition for the release of Mr. Bennett, and was sorry that like the others it failed to hav the desired effect.

Inclosed please find a post-office order for ten dollars, five as per what five dollars will do to renew my subscription for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880 and Viscount Amberley's "Analysis of Religious Belief," three to pay for Mr. Bennett's new book, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," when ready, and the other two for Mr. Bennett's fund. With the best of wishes to you all, and especially Bro. Bennett's health and the prosperity of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I am yours respectfully and truly,

JACOBUS JOSEPHUS.

IRVING, MINN., Jan. 10, 1880.

DEAR SIR: I want you to send a copy of your paper, so as to find out the subscription price. I might hav taken stock in the R.-P. Journal a few days ago but for a dirty, malicious editorial on the unfortunate Bennett, for whom I hav a profound esteem. That paper is sinking in popular estimation every day by its pestilent overtures for Christian recognition and approval, especially in the minds of Liberal men; and its assumed championship of a purely orthodox morality is rather "fishy" for intelligent acceptance. It may need all the aid it can get to exist in its role of arch-inquisitor. It is too bad to see the columns of a Freethought paper prostituted to revengeful uses, which can only awaken disgust and hate in the minds of disinterested people.

Yours truly, WM. G. JEBB.

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., Jan. 1, 1880.

DEAR BROTHER BENNETT: Little more than a year has passed away since I first saw a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER and became acquainted with your agent here, Mr. Emerson, from whom I purchased several of your Liberal books. From first to last I hav taken a very deep interest in the paper, and still greater anxiety for your personal welfare. It is very true that I hav had much grief and sorrow in consequence of your unmerited and dreadful persecutions and incarceration, but most of all for the wicked, cruel, untimely assaults upon your private character; but I am truly thankful that the noble champion of truth and his glorious paper still survive.

Long may both liv and flourish and wave
In a land of the free and a home of the brave.

The word "truth" is dearer to me than any other word in our language. It is peculiarly adapted to a Liberal paper. The Sun, Banner of Light, and many others, are very suggestive, but none seem to me as appropriate as THE TRUTH SEEKER. During the past year circumstances hav transpired to prove that the man who chose this title for his paper has regard, reverence, and love for truth—to him more precious than liberty, or even his very life itself. THE TRUTH SEEKER should be universally patronized for its impartiality and justice no less than for its advocacy of truth. It gives pro and con with equal fairness on every subject, which no other paper in America can equally boast. For these reasons I patronize, read, mark, learn, and inwardly digest it, and truly love and admire it and its heroic and manly editor and proprietor. But what can I say in favor of your opponents, persecutors, and defamers? Here allow me to contrast the opposing parties.

I perceive that the party of persecutors and defamers are not either truth seekers or truth speakers. The proof of this is found in a careful perusal of your unanswerable reply. As a "truth speaker" you are noted by all true Liberals for veracity, and you need not fear that your reputation will suffer in the least from the falsehoods of your would-be assassins. You stand acquitted of all guilty intentions in the minds of all lovers and champions of truth. The poisoned arrows of slander not only fall harmless at the brave old truth seeker's feet, but they also infinitely increase your fame by contrasting truth and falsehood. I was never more pleased than while perusing your answer to those incarnate fiends, Abbot, Bundy & Co. Their characters now appear more infamous, if possible, than they ever appeared before. T. C. Leland's article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of December 20th, 1879, has the ring of pure metal, well calculated to put Abbot, Bundy, and the rest on the stool of repentance. I hope it will hav that effect. I am decidedly of the opinion that you hav been sufficiently Comstocked, Benedicted, Haysed, and almost crazed, for all practical purposes, without the addition of being Bundied and Abboted to death. I believe that you hav told the truth, the whole truth, and nothing but the truth. With no criminal intentions, your fault was the sin of omission, evidently not of commission; therefore, we unhesitatingly pronounce the verdict of "Not guilty."

I conclusion I beg to offer a little gratis advice to all who hav had their fingers

In those delicious pies,
Bundy and Abbot lies.

First. Dear truth speaker, if you had gone and done it, you would not hav been exposed and persecuted; therefore, be advised, and do so no more.

Second. We advise that "young virgin" to go to the priest and make a true confession of all her sins; then "go and sin no more." Surely, "that's what's the matter with Hannah!"

Third. We advise Bundy, Abbot & Co. to take a little rest. Their characters are buried so deep in infamy that they never can possibly be resurrected. Their "truth-loving" subscribers should now desert them and patronize THE TRUTH SEEKER for truth's sake.

Fourth. We advise Inquisitor-General Comstock to repent and truly reform; otherwise, when he arrives at Hades, the "unconverted," whom he boasts of having sent into eternity, "in their blood and in their sins," will get their revenge and satisfaction by poking him in the fire with red-hot pitchforks forever, as they ought to do.

Fifth. We advise Judge Benedict to go into some innocent, harmless, useful occupation; for example, take hold of a plow-handle, and in future follow plowing, which would be infinitely more honorable than to condemn so many innocent, helpless victims to jails, fines, dungeons, and would-be fires.

Sixth. We advise President Hayes to redeem his administration and immortalize his name by performing a simple act of justice before he loses the opportunity forever.

Seventh. We advise all our law-makers to perform a lustration. Do keep within the bounds of the Constitution and annul all laws contrary thereunto, and, as in duty bound, we will every pray.

Bro. Bennett, I beg to be considered one among your true friends. Allow me to assure you of my increasing regard and esteem, and also to express the hope that you will outlive the prejudices and wrongs of all who, without any just cause, still continue their cruel, merciless, unprovoked, unrelenting persecutions. May God hav mercy upon their souls!

I close by sincerely wishing you a prosperous and a happy New Year. I hav the honor to be, sir,

Very respectfully, fraternally, and truthfully yours,
E. N. KINGSLEY.

PERSECUTION CONTINUED.

Belief that the Lord by himself was created.
Is very essential to keep man from hell;
Indeed, did God know that mankind were all fated
In unending torture and anguish to dwell?

Did Jesus forsee that by his crucifixion
But one out of thousands to glory will go?
To Greeks this is foolishness, fable, and fiction
Both truth and philosophy prove that is so.

Will God's love permit man's eternal perdition?
Will the most learned Christian be pleased to reply?
Can this be the deity's highest ambition?
The devil outwitted God. Who can tell why?

There's nothing in all the vast bounds of formation
Give proof of a dogma so clearly absurd
As infinite punishment—endless damnation—
And found nowhere else but in God's holy Word!

God made sinful man, sinful man made money;
This nursery rhyme should be laid on the shelf;
'Tis not very logical but 'tis very funny
How God out of nothing created himself!

God also made Satan, and Satan made sinning,
And God made mankind both to plow and drink tea;
God also made pigs in the very beginning;
God, Christ, drowned the devils and swine in the sea.

Now, all things do truly exist by formation,
And nothing was ever created, is true;
Whoever made hell and eternal damnation,
Alas! should hav found something better to do.

God never could keep his dear children's heads level,
So down to the bottomless pit they must go,
And all unbelievers must off to the devil
And always be roasted in brimstone below.

But bloodthirsty Christians already forgiven,
Who murdered vast millions of their fellow-men,
Faith made them all saints, sent those demons to heaven;
You call this God's grand philosophical plan.

Go open your dungeons, you heathen believers,
And let your poor victims once more see the sky;
Creeds, false and immoral; dupes, frauds, and deceivers;
Yourselves and your gods and your fables will die.

LOCUST BAYOU, ARK., Dec. 15, 1879.

MR. EUGENE MACDONALD, ESQ., Dear Sir: The Bible says, "There is more joy over one sinner that repenteth," etc. I think that poor encouragement for a person to be strictly honest and upright to hav nothing to repent of; but still I like Mr. Bennett's manly confession. He made a clean breast of it, and I forgive him. It is much better than denying it and smoothing it over.

I wish to congratulate you on the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER while its editor is lying in his cold and lonesome cell. We ought to get up an indignation meeting against that part of a man, Hayes, for his non-interference in Mr. Bennett's behalf. My respects to Mrs. Bennett. She must be of good cheer. Please find inclosed three dollars, my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER for the year 1880.

Yours truly, JOHN H. HASLAM.

HART, MICH., Dec. 13, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I see in your paper of November 29th, "Anthony Comstock: His Career of Cruelty and Crime," for 25 cents. Please find stamps inclosed and send it to me. I think it is just what I want for this neighborhood. Things are not as they were a year ago in this place. It is as the old Dutchman said: "The sooner vot a man livs in dis vorld, the more he finds, by Jesus Christ, right avay oud!" Yours truly, CHAS. V. WARREN.

HILLSDALE, O., Nov. 26, 1879.

FRIEND BENNETT: In reply to your letter, published in THE TRUTH SEEKER last week, I would say: Two years ago, having heard the "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" read aloud, I made the remark, "That paper should be stopped." Now, since then, I hav changed my ideas concerning those things. I hav been for some years a truth-seeker, mechanically also being a watchmaker. I hav been a subscriber to your paper a short time, but I prize it very highly. In regard to the late attack on your character, I am surprised and completely disgusted to think that men who pretended to be friends to the Liberal cause should so basely attack one of its most earnest and zealous supporters for so trifling a matter. And if our old friend has been a little imprudent, is not every man liable to be inclined a little that way at least once in his lifetime? I propose that the President of the Liberal League accept not your resignation, which you offered, for I don't think you hav done anything worthy the loss of our highest esteem and confidence. I hope that every truth-seeker will early respond an emphatic No, THE TRUTH SEEKER shall not be stopped.

Yours in sympathy, H. A. BOLEY.

BASCO, ILL., Jan. 2, 1880.

DEAR FRIEND BENNETT: The tenets of the Christian religion command its devotees to forgive their enemies; then we Liberals, shall we not forgive our friends for their little peccadilloes, especially when they confess and repent? Why yes, certainly, we forgive you, old warrior, and we want to keep you at the head of the army of the Liberals of this country to marshal our forces and lead them to victory and success.

Yes, sir, I for one say continue to be editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER, the most radical, the most sensible, and the most fearless opponent of religious superstitions and falsehoods. THE TRUTH SEEKER came to my notice at its birth, and I liked its countenance and character, and I befriended it from the first number until now, and hope to continue to do so as long as it keeps at its work of truth seeking.

I hope the Liberals of the country will uphold and keep alive THE TRUTH SEEKER, the most potent weapon they hav to oppose the hordes of orthodox hypocrites, and come to its support according to their means.

I send to-day six dollars for one year's subscription. My dear friend, I feel very indignant at those rogues, scoundrels, and religious hypocrites who forced you into a felon's cell among thieves and murderers; and still more indignant with the President of the United States, who has the power to liberate you, when he knows full well that you committed no crime at all, and keeps you there by the order and under the direction of the Pharisaical, jesuitical priestcraft. I hope and like to suppose that your keepers hav some sense of humanity and honor, not to treat you as a criminal but as a victim of religious persecution. I think when President Hayes will leave the White House for home he will still feel the pangs of burning shame, especially when he meets a Liberal friend, if he has any, for not having done right toward a persecuted fellow-citizen.

The few Liberals in this neighborhood sympathize with you for your unfortunate present situation, but we hope you will come out all right.

Yours, for the extirpation of error and wrong,
JOHN DIDIER.

GRAND RAPIDS, MICH., Jan. 19, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: The Paine celebrations now coming very soon suggest an idea, which if acted on with energy, in real live earnest, will present a front to the enemy and kindle a flame of general interest that will strike with awe and power.

If our hero livs to pass those bars, let every League and handful of Liberals be ready on the day of his release to commemorate the event, and publicly protest against a government stained with the crime of imprisoning an honest man in the interests of sects, of tampering with the mails of free citizens, the taxation of the people to support church interest, and all the doings of the enemies of freedom to domolish the statue of liberty.

Not that the dead and their great works are of any less interest than ever, but the living and the stirring events of the present time, profoundly significant as they are of what is yet to be, are greater.

Liberals, Spiritualists, progressive Christians, all who value the principle of toleration bequeathed to us by our sires of '76, call and arrange the meetings. Let D. M. Bennett, the man of to-day, who is the representative of our crushed liberties, hav a greeting of remembrance, as he passes out of his cell, from all over the land, such as has never been given the enfranchised before—solemn, earnest, honest, intense, and alive with premonition of our future. "The voice of the people is the voice of God."

MARY KELSEY BOOZER.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: We hav not forgotten you. We are still with you in sympathy, and shall continue to do all we can to keep THE TRUTH SEEKER from going down under the Abbot and Bundy wave of virtue. Your position is grand. I'm glad you hav taken it. You display a generalship worthy the name of a reformer. You hav displayed two virtues at least—sincerity and fortitude, both cardinal. Sincerity, the grand virtue which deals plainly, without disguise, falsehood, or hypocrisy. Candidly, as knowing your error (if so it be), you take the chastisement with a fortitude which says, "If 'tis just, submission's here; I'm in the dust."

We claim the right to question these very virtuous gentlemen as to whose business it is to define another man's virtue. Emerson says: "Many a reformer perishes in his removal of rubbish, and that makes the offensiveness of the class. They are partial; they are not equal to the worst; they pretend they lose their way in their assault on the kingdom of darkness, they expend all their energy on some accidental evil and lose their sanity and power to benefit."

We might ask, Is it virtue to kick a fellow-editor when he is down? Is it virtue to bribe? Is it virtue to corrupt language by calling a fellow-mortal ugly names? Of all of which our friends Abbot and Bundy hav been guilty. But 'tis human to err, so we look upon their shortcomings as we would on any other mortals,' only we ask these few simple questions to remind them of the fact that vice and virtue are with us according to our surroundings and organisms, and our ability to do good or bad has no bearing as to what is good or bad. One pleasing thought presents itself to me as I contemplate the dawn of a new era, in which men and women will allow one another to stand alone; an age of glorious individualism, wherein there will be no incentive to hide the true character of individual communities; no governments, where each and all will be a law unto himself. We shall neither blame nor praise unduly when the mist has cleared away. Then will the pseudonyms "vice" and "virtue" be struck from the vocabulary of expression. Virtue is that beautiful trait of character which sees no evil in a faulty organization, covering the defects with that chaste robe of charity whose ample folds "covereth a multitude of sins."

I trust every reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER will help by word and deed to assist in carrying out the good work of D. M. Bennett. The fruit of his labor should be enough to stir them to action. The old tree of Liberalism is grafted largely with the fruits of the labor of D. M. Bennett. They cannot make an abortion of his life-work. He has done too much; the cause needs him. Make the burden as light as you can for him while the American Bastile holds him behind the bars.

O. D. Phelps, of Kansas City, concluded a course of lectures at this place a few days ago. We would recommend him to the friends in Kansas, as he is now in the field as a Liberal lecturer. He is a genial and scientific gentleman and a pleasant speaker. He left us minus his Bible, a well-marked volume, to which he referred as a monitor of evil. He left it in the schoolhouse, where it was found by the Christian teacher, who, I presume, subjected the poor book to cremation in honor of his departure, which was hailed with gladness by our Christian friends, whose eggs "would'nt rot," so they said. J. E. BALL.

LEADVILLE, COL., Nov. 27, 1879.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I hav just finished reading your "Fourth Letter from Albany," of the 16th inst, and it makes my blood boil with indignation at the wrongs heaped upon you. I realize that "although you are slightly disfigured you are still in the ring" and able to deal some sturdy blows, right and left, to your enemies, who seem bent on crushing you. And now, as one of the jury referred to in your letter, I pronounce you not guilty. Long may THE TRUTH SEEKER wave, and long may D. M. Bennett liv to direct it, is the wish of your friend,

F. H. MOORE.

CABERY, ILL.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I was rummaging through my papers just now, trying to find a copy of my pamphlet entitled "Women's Rights and Men's Wrongs," but I cannot raise it. Send me a copy, for which find pay inclosed. I want to re-write the essay and put it into my dime course of lectures.

Poor old Bro. Bennett! how does he get along? I do hope he keeps up his spirits while grinding out those thirteen months of unrighteous imprisonment, all for mailing that dry and sleepy "Cupid's Jokes," I would call it, instead of "Yokes."

That love-letter boom which his enemies got up against him has, like the boomerang, recoiled most gloriously upon those who sent it forth. Bro. Bennett, the noble old Roman that he is, is too great, too good, and too honest to try to hide or to cover up anything, while all the critical world around him is doing nothing else. He shirks no responsibilities and keeps nothing back, but puts the worst side out. He just throws the doors and windows of his soul wide open and invites a scandal-loving world with sniffing nose to walk in, and look and smell around to its heart's content. If open confession is good for the soul, then the soul of the brother must be as white as snow. But oh, don't I hate a nasty, dirty, plotting, black-mailing woman anyhow? JOHN SYPHERS.

WEST FAIRVIEW, PA., Jan. 18, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find $2, part due on THE TRUTH SEEKER. I hope to be able to send you more soon, as I think it the ne plus ultra of Liberal papers. Their are many books on your list that I would like to hav and hope to be so circumstanced soon to gratify my desire in that way. Hav been a subscriber to the R.-P. Journal eight years, but it has got too pure for me. Poor little Bundy! I remain, Yours, J. G. MAY.

The Golden Calf.

BY CHARLES F. ORMSBY.

The Israelites had journeyed on Through many a mile of sand;
They had left their homes where they were born
In search of the promised land.

Jewels of gold, and silver, and brass,
Jewels of copper and tin,
They had borrowed from their friends of the Egyptian class,
But their friends were well taken in.

Those jewels that were loaned were never returned,
For you see it was not to be,
For the parties that loaned them were nearly all drowned
While trying to cross the Red Sea.

But what was the value of their jewels now,
As they glittered in the rays of the sun?
A barrel of gold would not buy a cow,
Nor even a Springfield gun.

What cared they now for their jewels of gold?
For their jewels of silver and brass?
They wanted a leader both brave and bold,
And for their herds they wanted grass.

Moses, their leader, had gone up the hill,
He had gone up to talk with the Lord;
He'd been gone many days and was absent still,
And from him they'd not heard a word.

They saw the lightning and heard the thunder,
And saw the thick, black clouds,
And they looked and listened with fear and wonder
As they gathered together in crowds.

They remembered the plagues of darkness and blood
And the hailstorm in Egypt's land,
That slew the cattle wherever they stood,
And the plague of lice-stricken sand.

They remembered the plagues of locusts and frogs,
And the slaying of Egypt's first-born,
And they shook and trembled within their "brogues"
As they wondered where Moses had gone.

They remembered the story of the burning bush
That grew near Jethro's land;
They remembered that water from a rock did gush
When Moses gave the command.

Then they were reminded of Aaron's rod,
For Aaron was Moses' brother,
And they called upon Aaron to furnish a God,
For they said, "We must hav another.

We are ready to die for thee and thy rod,
We are ready, if needs be, to rough it;
But we certainly must and will hav a God,
And our God shall hav a prophet."

Then Aaron was pleased as he looked around;
In his mind all their gold he did measure,
And he told them to make a great heap on the ground
With the whole of their golden treasure.

Then the crowd did gather round his tent,
Those sons of Isaac and Jacob;
A very big heap each one of them meant
To do his best to make up.

The women they took the rings from their hands
And also the rings from their noses;
They were ready to obey their leader's commands,
For he was the brother of Moses.

The rings from their ankles they did each of them kick,
The buttons from their coat they did twist.
Each man did take the gold chain from his neck
And the bracelet he took from his wrist.

A maiden fair, though she mourned the loss,
Had determined that she'd do her part,
So she gave up a chain, with a bright golden cross,
She'd been wearing next to her heart.

The farmer then sawed off both the brass knobs
From the ends of the horns of his ox,
And declared it was one of the very worst jobs
He'd ever done for the contribution-box.

A soldier fetched his epaulets, then,
And was parting them with sorrow,
Said Aaron, "I don't want them, my man,
For they were made in Atterborough."*

When Aaron had obtained the whole of the gold,
As he leaned upon his staff,
Said he, Well now, upon my soul,
We'll make a golden calf.

Then Aaron at the gold did laugh
As he threw it in the fire;
But at last drew forth a golden calf;
If you doubt it, just inquire.

Then Aaron said, "O Israel,
What think ye of it, now?
Come closer, that ye may view it well,
This daughter of a cow."

And then they climbed upon its back
And crawled between its feet,
And gave it many a hearty smack
And declared it couldn't be beat.

Said Aaron. "I took frem you all of your watches
And kindled a fire with lucifer matches,
And I threw in your gold in several batches,
And now you can see what a golden fire hatches.

'Behold your God, oh, men of toil,
That led you forth from Egypt's soil;
Fall on your knees, and offer prayers,
And you'll be relieved from all your cares."

Then the Israelites threw down their tents,
And hung their clothing on the fence;
Some did dance, some ran about,
Some did pray, and all did shout.

Now while this folly Aaron instigates,
He suddenly hears a crash,
And turning around he sees the slates,
Which Moses is trying to smash.

While Aaron was tampering with the Israelites,
Moses himself was returning,
And now he has seen such horrible sights,
That his face with anger is burning.

Then Aaron did tremble and shake with fear
And said unto Moses, "'Twa'nt me;"
And said that he was willing to pay for the beer,
If Moses would just let him be.

Said he, "What I did was to prevent strife,
For I knew not what else to do,
And I never would hav done such a thing in my life,
If I had known where to find you."

Said Moses, "Now rally unto me, all
The men that are on the Lord's side;"
Then the Levites did quickly respond to his call,
For their folly they wanted to hide.

And then the very next words that he spoke
Could be heard far out on the plain,
"You need not tell me that this is a joke,
Nor that you won't do so again.

Gird on your swords, my gallant band,
Let each man smite his neighbor,
And leave him gasping in the sand,
With a death wound from the saber.

Go up and down, throughout the camp,
Slaying every man his brother,
Till in the darkness and the damp,
You can't tell which from 'tother.

Let every man his companion slay,
Spare neither old nor young,
If I had rope enough this day,
The whole crowd should be hung."

Then was heard an awful crashing,
Swords together were loudly clashing,
Warriors here and there were dashing,
And each other's skulls were smashing.

Then were heard loud cries of pain
From wounded people on the plain.
Feeble moans and awful groans,
From helpless people with broken bones.

Three thousand men that day were killed,
But the wounded they did not count;
And with anguish many a heart was filled,
At the foot of Sinai's mount.

And then that golden calf was burned,
So many a man supposes,
And into powder then 'twas ground,
By order of Mr. Moses.

And that powder then was mixed with water,
And it made a golden chowder;
And the people drank it after the slaughter,
That mixture of water and powder.

Then Moses climbed the mount again,
As he had done before;
And he brought down commandments ten,
There were neither less nor more.

To read to them it needed cheek.
At the foot of that great hill,
To read the law of which I speak,
That is, "Thou shalt not kill."

Cook, the Cancer.

BY ALHAZA.

He dwells in a city, the "hub" of our planet;
He poisons the land once delightful to view;
How craven the people, who make him their idol,
The brain of a chicken, the soul of a Jew.

He knows that the world is in misery sunken;
That goodness must bend to the powerful whim;
He strikes not a blow at the heart of the evil,
One hundred a night is sufficient for him.

He drives his gold chariot, pompous and wordy,
Through every old rut where mankind hav been led;
He calls on the lightnings, all shivering with terror,
If the "felon" but turn in his feverish bed.

But to find a new path, no, he has not the genius;
He fears every stump, every hornet, and fly,
Then bounds on the martyr and seeks to destroy him,
Who works for the nations, to heal them or die.

Now craft sits enthroned as American justice,
But, freemen, oh say, shall it always be so?
Then let the bald eagle fly back to his eyrie,
While the vultures may gloat on their carrion below.

Book Notice.

HOW TO LEARN SHORTHAND; The Stenographic Instructor. An Improved System of Shorthand Writing. Arranged specially for the use of those desirous of acquiring the art without the aid of a teacher; being the simplest, most practical, and the best adapted for reporting. By Arthur M. Baker. 12mo, paper, 25 cents. S. R. Wells & Co., publishers, 737 Broadway, New York. For sale at this office.

This is the latest manual published on the subject of shorthand writing. It does not propose to teach an entirely new and untried system, but is based on the best and most successful of the older stenographic (as distinguished from the purely phonetic) system of writing. The instruction is clear and readily understood from beginning to end, and "How to Learn Shorthand" ought to prove very useful to all engaged in literary work, or desirous of taking fuller notes of scientific lectures, etc., than they can possibly do with ordinary writing, no matter how much abbreviated.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,

141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams. Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth, $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

By this WONDERFULLY PERFECTED system, patients are successfully treated at their own homes, matters not how far away, without the necessity of seeing them, (in the majority of cases) forwarding their treatment by express, with very ample directions for use, and with continued correspondence kept up—based in the first place, upon a searching DIAGNOSIS of each case, either by chemical analysis of the morning's urine (urinary Sanguinis), showing the condition of the blood, or psychometric examination by photograph and lock of hair, or both, as may be deemed essential, where personal presence is not had.

FEES.—For the first month, $15, including analysis and diagnosis; or $35 for a course of three months' treament, securing inhaler, with whichever one of the following inhaling vapors is found to be needed, viz., The Balm, The Tonic, The Expectorant, The Anti-Asthmatic, The Anti-Hemorrhagic, The Anti-Septic, The Magnetic Blood. Also, with effectual remedies for Cough, for Night Sweats; Vital Tonics, Magnetic Embrocations and Plasters for relief of Pain and Soreness, and every medicament, magnetic or psychic, deemed necessary to each patient. Thousands of patients are thus annually successfully treated at their own homes that are not personally attended, because, under the wonderful development of the new dispensation, guides and healers invisible are constantly deputed in each case, bringing about wonderful visible effects.

Lessons of instruction and discipline in Urinology, in Vital and Animal Magnetism, given by correspondence to students, or to progressive physicians that cannot conveniently personally attend, and a Diploma conferred.

The art of healing taught in this College combines the science of Animal and Vital Magnetism, Medicated Electricity, Equalizing and Adjusting the Positive and Negative Forces, Diffusing into the Blood and Brain and Nervous System Vital Force by Impartation and Induction of Psychic Force, according to the law of natural sympathy of healing as practiced by Jesus, the Prince of Healers.

The vitalizing magnetic power of healing by Sun and Medicated Baths, imparting the needed deficient primates, and causing elimination of effete matter by cutaneous secretion. The doctrine taught at this College is emphatically to construct, to build up, to nourish and develop the physical constitution to its highest standard of perfect health and strength.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

Price, paper, 75 cents; cloth $1.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Odds and Ends.

"Press me close," said Kate last eve.
"'Tis bliss to suffocate"—
Quoth George, "My pet, if you'd jus' sleeve,
With thee I'll suffer, Kate."

"'Twas the night before Christmas,
And all through the house
The tom cat was chasing
A tan-colored mouse."

"Dear Louise, don't let the men come too near you when courting." "Oh, no, dear ma. When Charlie is here we always hav one chair between us." Mother thinks the answer is rather ambiguous.

"Jennie Dare," whoever she is, has come out with a new song, "Love Me a Little while the Roses Bloom." Well, it isn't exactly the thing, so long as we are legally out of the market, but we'll do it. And then, when the roses peg out, we'll love you a considerable through the verbena season, and then we'll keep it up while the —how do you spell those flowers that sound like Xenia, Ohio? Zinnia? thank you, while the zinnias flame out, and then we'll hire a conservatory and keep the old thing going till along about Christmas. Bless you, there's nothing mean about us, and if the young men of this country hav got so slow you hav to make appeals of that nature to the public, we'll discount all the roses between here and the vale of Cashmere.

MORNING.

Night flits away; morn rises in the East,
And all the Eastern sky grows hot and red;
For nature's morning is of rosy hue.
The early cock takes perch to make a crow,
And reckless flings good notes on every side;
The hen leaves stick on which she's rooster been,
And gravely scratches round the lichens green,
Or, seeking gravel, sharply pecks the quartz,
And from a stony field a full crop takes.

And lo! the lowing kine rise from their beds,
And past your gardens to their pasture go;
The sheep good wether far afield pursue;
The ducks sit down to lay the morning eggs;
The turkeys gobble up the early worms;
The cat pursues the bird far up the trees;
The grunting pig goes swiftly to his pen;
While on the path, before the kitchen door,
The house-dog idly sits and points his tail.

The husbandman goes swiftly from his wife,
So as to sow the crops he'll later crop;
His wife, to husband well her consort's goods,
For breakfast gives to all the Indian meal,
And fills the hungry boys with boiling mush;
The cowherds boldly drive afield the cows
That lack their lactage, which fills full the pails;
And though the stars hav faded from the sky,
The dairy-maid has still her milky whey.

The sun soon mars the splendor of the East
By further moving up in heaven's vault;
Soon clouds are missed as swift they fade to mist;
From off the trees, and shrubs, and plants, and grass
The morning, with Sol's aid, collects its dues;
While little birds send into fruit their bills,
And bees wax busy roun the honey flowers;
And though the eastern sky is full of gold,
'Tis plain to every one that morning's broke.

Mr. Alden, of the New York Times, evidently shares the weakness of journalists for military criticism. After describing the recent hostilities in the First Reformed Presbyterian church at Pittsburgh, he asserts, in effect, that the congregation blundered whenever its two factions engaged. "Not the slightest knowledge," he says, "of the elementary principles of strategy was shown, and the means of assuring victory, which would hav been apparent even to an average militia colonel, were totally disregarded. It may be laid down as a principle of church fighting that the pulpit is the commanding position. The party which wished to conquer at Pittsburgh should hav occupied the pulpit in strong force at an early hour, posting at the same time, a number of picked elders on the pulpit stairs. The choir-gallery should also hav been occupied, thus placing the body of the congregation between two fires. Had this been done by the Clyde party, it would hav been impossible for the Woodside party to hold services in any part of the building, unless they could hav successfully stormed both the pulpit and the choir-gallery. This might possibly hav been done, but the struggle would hav been a hard one, and the carnage would hav been fearful. Nevertheless, neither party seems to hav thought of this method of securing victory. There was also a failure on the part of all the combatants—with the single exception of the man with the poker—to use their weapons with any efficiency. The fire of Bibles and hymn-books from the back-pews was nearly ineffectual. Those weapons hav a comparatively short range, and, except in the case of a plunging fire from a gallery, do little execution at a long distance. There was a large fifteen-inch Bible in the pulpit that would hav done tremendous execution had it been thrown into the struggling mass of elders at the foot of the pulpit stairs, but no one had intelligence or presence of mind enough to use it. There were also foot-stools in many of the pews, which might hav been effectively used, but the 'Covenanters' seem to hav entirely forgotten the example of Jenny Geddes, and not a foot-stool was used. Such a fight as this does not deserve the name of a battle. A dozen stalwart Irish Roman Catholics, accustomed to ecclesiastical fights with their Orange enemies, or a small gang of earnest Methodists inured to expelling roughs from Missouri or Arkansas camp-meetings, could hav put the entire First Reformed Presbyterian church to flight in five minutes."

To the Legislature of the State of New York:

We, the undersigned citizens of the state of New York, petition your Honorable Body to repeal the present laws of the state which exempt church property and ministers of the gospel from taxation; and we thus petition your Honorable Body for the following reasons:

1. Because by exempting church property and ministers' effects from taxation the state is assisting to support sectarian religion, which is unconstitutional, and foreign to the purposes for which our government was formed; and (2) it is extending charity to the clergy, a class better paid than any of the mechanics who are taxed, and better than members of many other professions, thus constituting them a privileged class.

2. It is a principle of justice that whoever enjoys the protection of a government should assist in its support. Churches and ministers demand and receive protection from our government; and should riots occur by which such property should be destroyed, the state would be compelled to make good the same, although the property had never contributed to the revenues of the state.

3. By continued exemption of church property from taxation, ecclesiastical corporations are enabled to amass immense wealth, the exemption of which lays much heavier burdens upon secular property. One corporation in New York city owns $15,000,000 worth of property, $9,000,000 of which pays nothing for the support of government. In the state of New York there are $110,000,000 worth of property exempt from taxation.

4. It is a matter of history, with which every member of your Honorable Body is no doubt acquainted, that whenever, by a long term of freedom from taxation, the state has aided the church, it has at last been compelled, in self-defense, to confiscate the wealth gathered by the church—which, by its power and influence, owing to such aid, was becoming dangerous to the peace and welfare of the state. The examples of Mexico and Italy are respectfully submitted. In the neighboring city of Montreal the church owns nearly two-thirds of the real estate, which forces one-third to pay taxes sufficient to protect the whole. The value of church property in the United States is $500,000,000, and should its increase in the future be in proportion to its increase in the past, in the year 1900 it will reach the sum of $3,000,000,000, a third more than our national debt. Foresight now, on the part of your Honorable Body, may avert future disaster from our state.

And for many other just reasons which will readily suggest themselves to your Honorable Body.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

Badges to be had only from the patentee, LUCY L. CHURCHILL,
West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

Salamanca, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.
Miss Churchill: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus "let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. Green.

Newburyport, Mass., May 19, 1879.
My Dear Madam: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.
Very truly yours, James Parton.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

Doctor R. P. Fellows is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician.

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good doctor is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

THE banker of the Vatican, who managed al His Holiness' financial business in Rome, has taken to flight, and has left behind debts amounting to more than $150,000. Several high ecclesiastical officials, who had intrusted all their fortune to the specious swindler, are suddenly plunged into the greatest distress. One of the last Cardinals created by Pius IX. is said to hav been hit so hard by the defaulter that he has not a centime left.

THE Rev. Mr. Cowley, ex-shepherd, was a few days ago admitted to the fold for black sheep in Center street, known as the Tombs. But even in there, among the men upon whom the law has fixed its clutches, the Rev. Mr. Cowley finds himself a pariah. Vulgar criminals who can barely write their own names shrink with loathing from the learned clergyman who is accused of starving and torturing helpless little children. It is one of the cases in which the touch of nature makes philanthropists and sneak thieves kin.

WHEN Naples was ruled by King Bomba, his majesty one day paid a visit to the ship of an English commodore lying in the bay. While the commodore was receiving his royal visitor on the quarter-deck, a member of the Neapolitan suite cruising about amidships mistook a windsail for a pillar, and leaning against it, suddenly went below head foremost. The only witness, an old tar, thereupon made for the quarter-deck, and having saluted, said, "I beg pardon, commodore, but one of them ere kings has fell down the hatchway."—Chamber's Journal.

REV. A. W. PAIGE, of South Glastonbury, Connecticut (a man of family), was taken from the Haddam Jail to this city this morning. He had served his sentence of thirty days for lascivious carriage To-morrow afternoon he will be brought before United States Commissioner Marvin for a preliminary examination on the charge of sending obscene pictures and obscene writing through the mail. Two specimens of the drawings made by Paige will be brought in evidence against him. They are of a most foul character, and the offense is made all the worse in that they were sent to a lady. He is broken down and abject. The prisoner is sixty-two years old. He was accustomed to walk at night all the way from his home to the woman's residence where his alleged adultery was committed. Her brother, happening to get hold of one of Paige's letters, "went for him" with a pistol, and Paige "caved." The woman was sent to the insane asylum at Middletown. Perhaps she will become insane, if she is not now, in such a place. Paige has been, in Glastonbury, the leader of the prosecutions of all liquor sellers. The latter and their friends hav been crowing over his downfall and sending him printed songs, the burden of which was,

"He is safe from all temptation—
Paige is safe in Haddam Jail."

SELDOM does a village experience such a mental shaking up as Brockport, N. Y., experienced during the past two weeks over Col. Ingersoll's lecture, delivered at the Opera House. One of the local papers, on what it considered reliable information, stated, in announcing the lecture, that "clergy as well as other professional men had expressed an ardent desire to hear this remarkable man." This raised such a breeze in the ministerial camp that they issued a manifesto over their united signatures denying the allegation, and had the same published. Then as a further vent to their outraged feelings, they took occasion the next Sunday to denounce the lecturer and admonish their flocks "not to sanction his iniquitous heresies by their presence." Mr. Ward and his Opera House also came in for a share of the clerical condemnation. Of course all this was the biggist kind of an advertisement, and "Bob" spoke to a crowded house. But the end is not yet. Last Sunday the Presbyterian minister again opened on the subject, and on Mr. Ward, who was the leader of the Presbyterian choir, and who was present at his indignant outburst. Mr. Ward's resignation was handed in the next morning, and the church now has on its hands the most orthodox kind of a quarrel, a large party supporting Mr. Ward in opposition to the dominie.

BAXTER SPRINGS, Kansas, has been all agog for a few days past over a highly sensational scandal that came to light two or three weeks ago. The man is the minister of the Methodist-Episcopal church in that city, Rev. E. W. Howell, and the woman the wife of a prominent business man of that place. She, too, is a member of the church. The story is the old, familiar one of illicit love. A letter, in which he had poured out his soul to his affinity, was intercepted or found by the injured husband, and of course an expose followed. The husband of the woman made the horrible discovery about three weeks ago, and being a considerate man, blessed with a faculty of self-possession, he did not act passionately, as some men would hav done, but considered the situation. He had two children of his own, and though he had been greatly wronged, his sympathy extended to Howell's family—a wife and seven children. These he longed to shield from the disgrace that would follow exposure. After bringing the guilty pair face to face and compelling them to make their acknowledgments, he gave Howell four days to leave the place. Howell at once formed the excuse that his health had failed as a cause for resigning the pastoral charge of his circuit. On Sunday, January 11th, he took formal leave of his church there by preaching a farewell sermon, and on Monday morning he left for Hartford and Leroy, Kansas. Before leaving he himself, after solemnly agreeing to keep the secret, disclosed it to a person in town, which, by some means, the injured husband found out. Having given himself away, and finding that there were already suspicions existing in the minds of the people in reference to the matter, and Howell's continued effort to deceive the people of his church by holding prayer meetings and even going so far as to say that he would preach at the quarterly meeting, which took place soon after, the husband could contain himself no longer, but laid the case before the members of the church. As soon as apprised of the situation, the members of his church aroused to vigorous action. Howell appeared before a committee and confessed that he was guilty of great imprudence and indiscretion, but denied that there was any criminality attached to his indiscretion. How long he had carried on his secret amours is not known to the public, but there is no doubt he was guilty even at the time of conducting a protracted meeting in that city just before the holidays. Howell is a man over forty years of age and has been in the ministry about seven or eight years. His wife is heartbroken.

THE Liberals of Rochester, N. Y., assembled at the Academy of Music on the 29th ult. to commemorate the anniversary of the birth of Thomas Paine. The meeting was organized by the appointment of D. M. Fox as President and F. S. Webster as Secretary. Mr. Fox delivered a short address, giving a history of the life of Thomas Paine and the many misrepresentations which had been made concerning his career and death. He spoke of his course as a patriot and true man. Mr. J. Chapell followed with a few well-chosen remarks, and Mr. Miller delivered an address, the close of which was received with applause. Moses Hays, Esq., was then introduced by the presiding officer. He said that he did not wish to tire the audience, and as he was not a speaker but a worker, he should make but a very few remarks. He thought that Thomas Paine made a more important proclamation than the one issued by President Lincoln when he gave freedom to four millions of slaves, for he invited the whole world to rise up against ecclesiastical superstition. He advocated political action and advised the Liberals to come out square at the approaching election and vote for the men who would best represent their views. The president then introduced Mrs. Amy Post, and stated, what is no new fact to the people of Rochester, that she was an earnest worker in the cause of liberty in the days of slavery and always was found laboring for the good of society. Mrs. Post had read Thomas Paine's works secretly when she was a young girl, and was then convinced of the truth of his reasoning. She had visited his grave and saw the monument which had been erected by friends, and which she had this evening learned had been defaced. The prejudices of the people who then owned the land where he was buried were so strong, although they were Quakers, that they would not allow the stone to be placed within the inclosure which surrounded the grave, and it was placed in the road at some distance from the last resting-place of the apostle of Liberalism. Mrs. Nettie Pease Fox delivered an eloquent eulogy on the author of "The Age of Reason," and closed with an original poem. Mr. Fox then made a short closing address, in which he reviewed the progress made in that city during the past year. He advocated taxation of church property and stated that a bill for this purpose had been introduced by Hon. Charles S. Baker. He claimed that this was the result of the efforts of the Liberal League, which had asked Mr. Baker to state his views upon the subject last fall. When he answered satisfactorily on this subject they had supported him by their votes. He spoke of the idea which was advocated by orthodox preachers that Thomas Paine was in hell. He had been there according to that idea more than seventy years and if that were so he had certainly made some mrovements in that locality. Col. Fox thought that he would certainly hav introduced drainage and water if they were needed in the infernal regions. He then announced that services would be held at the Academy of Music at 10.30 A.M., and 7.30 P.M., every Sunday during the coming year.

Discussion.

Debate between Prof. W. F. Jamieson and Rev. Jacob Ditzler, D.D.—Concluded.

MR. JAMIESON'S CLOSING SPEECH.—CONCLUDED.

PROPOSITION.—"The Christian religion and the Bible tend to immorality and the injury of society."

I have shown by indisputable facts of history that it perverts history, ignores facts, persecutes scientists, disparages Freethought, and encourages the wildest vagaries. Despite all these facts, which my friend has not met, he says what good there is in Infidels they are indebted to Christianity for. Like the mass of his assertions, he did not think it worth while to prove it. There is not morality enough in your whole system to even go round among the ministers! You have morality to spare. Where is it? I have shown you, proved by your own orthodox writers and preachers, proved by my friend himself, that your Christian atonement scheme lets the bottom out of all the morality you have "borrowed" from the heathen—a scheme that gives murderers a short cut by the rope's end to heaven—a scheme that, as the Chicago Times says, gives men a first-class chance to be "jerked to Jesus!"

Beautiful! is it not? "Salvation's free!" Talk, will you, of the immorality of Infidelity. Why, I think before you would dare to insinuate that any other system is immoral you would open your eyes to the foulness of your own, the pious host of swindlers, Sunday-school forgers, and pious pickpockets generally.

That these are facts no informed person denies. My opponent does not deny them, but called all his Christian garbage "Infidels." Queer Infidels, believing as they do in the horrors of hell, in a personal god, a devil, the blood of Jesus to wash their sins away, the inspiration of the Bible, repentance and forgiveness of sin, no matter how vile; these are Infidels, are they? No, no, my friend, in spite of your despair, I shovel back the load you dumped from your theological cart at our door. Take them, my friend, they are all yours. They are sheep with your D.D. mark. There is not a damned goat among them. Civilization has outstripped your Bible and Christianity, and made you ashamed of your hell, God, and devil—a God that my friend has attempted to defend, a God full of cruelty, a God that he admitted the believer would imitate, and which we have shown was too closely imitated by men and women who hated and murdered each other for God's sake; and even here in Kirksville, Christian men and women looking sour and hate me because I tell them these truths. There is this difference between us, we show your doctrines no mercy. When you Christians bore rule you showed us no mercy. We do you the justice to say that many noble men and women are found in the Christian church, both Catholic and Protestant. Their morality comes not from their religion. Facts which I have adduced show this. I have shown you that slavery existed under the influence of Christianity for centuries. I have shown that the drunkenest nations on the earth to-day are the so-called Christian nations. Many of the vices and superstitions that cursed the world under pagan forms of religion have been embalmed and perpetuated under the Christian form. Christianity, I have proved by historical facts, many of which he has not denied, thus stole its vices and follies from the heathen, as well as its few disjointed moral maxims. My friendly opponent has been unable to put his finger upon a single moral principle in Christianity that is not found in paganism, and existed hundreds of years before the dawn of Christianity; but I proved that every such moral principle was rendered nugatory by its atonement scheme—a sort of heavenly bankrupt act to deadhead mean souls into paradise.

My friend has in various ways tried to break the force of these injurious facts by fixing attention on Infidelity in fierce denunciation, and scarcely the semblance of proof. He has represented that the heathen and savages were under the dominion of my system of nature, but without Christianity. My response was that they were under the dominion of religion, superstition, with the exception of the civilized millions of heathendom, and they are patrons of science, art, and in many respects are superior in morals to Christian nations.

He said men who have no book revelation and no Christian religion, but have nature, are vicious and degraded. I think I showed the absurdity of that position. Nature, the theologiau claims, is the work of God. Strange indeed that works of God would defile men, and that the word of God only could reclaim them. My time is nearly expired.

My friends, many severe words have I uttered against your belief, as you have against the Freethinkers. Let us not hate each other because we differ in opinion. Oh that I could emancipate your minds from the slavery of Christian dogmas, and have you share the joy we experience in freely ranging amid the ruins of old religions, learning the lessons which they teach, that all religions are born to die, but truth is eternal, more enduring than the everlasting hills. Grand is it to stand erect in noble manhood and true womanhood, fearing no ill, trembling before no god, prostrating ourselves before no tyrant. Delicious is the freedom of thought which lifts the mind above the petty annoyances of life, bids it accept truth regardless of consequences, and leave the world at last better than we found it. The glorious sun of the "age of reason" is steadily rising and dissipating the fog banks of superstition. Religion had taught us in mournful numbers, this earth is a "vain world," a "valley of bones," a "house of mourning," a miserable failure of an unhappy, tyrannical, bungling God. The scene is changing; the dark curtain of creed we tear away. How lovely the scene! The storm is passed. All nature smiles. Our globe we see (thanks to the brave brains which filled no cowards' skulls) as a world of more than fabled Eden's loveliness, taking its place among millions of other heavenly floating palaces in ether space, swiftly flying its nineteen miles per second, round and round its center sun, and he, our yellow god of day, swinging majestically around his central orb, perhaps in mighty Hercules, while we humans, like motes in sunbeam, pass our brief summer afternoon of life in obedience to the law of nature, which was never "made," which law whirls worlds and rounds tear-drops.

Ah, my Christian friends, we have no dread of the unknown. You often misjudge us. No thought of ours can change one law of the universe. In orderly march, conflicts, struggles, triumphs, events, large and small, obey an ever-active energy mightier than mind. Why should we fear to live? why dread to die? The best which nature has in store, like a kind indulgent mother, she will give us. Whether we live a million years or one year, it ennobles, refines, beautifies human life to do justice for justice's sake, seek truth because truth is best, do good for goodness' sake.

We have shown that reason is a better guide than faith, and that science will take the place of the Bible and Christianity, and "the world will be the better for it."

Permit me to say, in closing, that it is with the kindest personal feeling toward my Christian friends that I have conducted this discussion. Hopeful am I that the battles of the race, in coming ages, may all be fought on the highlands of the intellect, peaceful, bloodless, glorious. To my opponent I say, I respect him for advocating what he believes is the truth, and for debating. We differ widely on many points. No one side has the whole truth, nor can it be wholly in error. We are better for such discussions.

To the moderators I return my sincere thanks for the aid they have rendered, and to you, ladies and gentlemen, for your uniform courtesy. Good night.

The Godly Women of the Bible.—Continued.

BY AN UNGODLY WOMAN OF THE 19TH CENTURY.

TWO WIDOWS AND A WOMAN NOT A WIDOW.

1 Kings, chapter xvii, gives us a glowing description of a holy man of God, introducing a godly woman, whom we must not overlook.

Elijah swore by God, "There shall not be dew nor rain these years;" and God told him to go and "hide thyself by the brook Cherith," and commanded the ravens, which "brought him bread and flesh in the morning and bread and flesh in the evening, and he drank of the brook." But by and by "the brook dried up because there had been no rain in the land;" a natural sequence. So God did not strive longer to feed Elijah by supernatural means, but said, "Get thee to Zarephath. Behold, I have commanded a widow woman there to sustain thee." Who ever heard of a widow man?

Now, "when he came to the gate of the city, the widow woman was there gathering sticks," so he begged her for water and a morsel of bread. She swore by God she had not a cake, only a handful of meal and a little oil in a cruse, and she was gathering two sticks that she might dress it for her and her son that they might eat it and die. Elijah promised her if she would do as he had told her, and make him a little cake first, that the barrel of meal should not waste nor the cruse of oil fail till rain came and the famine ended. She obeyed, and did thus eat for many days.

What a lesson of faith is this! Suppose our modern tramps possessed this power and could make our women believe it, how many hearty meals and nights' lodgings they could obtain where now they are gruffly turned away by women who are not cooking their last morsel and by men who are rolling in wealth and surfeiting in luxury, and Christians too!

If you will only have faith in God and feed the tramps first, even though you are starving, God will reward you; that is, if the tramp is a "man of God."

But this is not all. The son of the woman fell sick, and there was no breath left in him. She then appears to have forgotten God's goodness and Elijah's miracle, and insinuated that the "man of God" had come there to call her sin to remembrance and slay her son. But Elijah, nothing daunted, took the boy up into the loft where he abode, put him on his bed, and, by a powerful mesmeric operation not unusual with practitioners at the present day, revived him and gave him to his mother.

And this is called another miracle, and is the last we hear of the widow woman in the Old Testament. Jesus refers to her in Luke iv, 25, 26. Her faith is brought up by the holy men of God at the present day to induce starving women to take the bread out of the mouths of their orphan babes and feed them first, and to deny themselves the necessaries of life that some religious society may be sustained through their mites, contributions, and deprivations.

Thus are the godly women of to-day led captive by this sort, which creep into their houses, as did Elijah of old, under the pretense that all their givings will be lending to the Lord, whether it be to sustain his servants, themselves, or for the upbuilding of his Zion in foreign lands in the shape of missions for Bible and tract distribution. Thus are holy men of God in the nineteenth century provided with the good things of this life by women in various ways, from excellent meals at their own tables, donation parties at the parsonage, fairs, festivals, entertainments, and such like schemes of begging up to the regular methods, and taxations for the support of the gospel; women, and poor women, too, contributing not the least for the sustenance of these male members of God's church militant.

Proceeding on to second Kings, chapter fourth, we find Elijah's miracles repeated by Elisha. First, a woman, whose husband was dead, cried unto him that her two sons were to be taken by her creditor to be bondsmen. So the prophet told her to borrow vessels of all her neighbors, "not a few." When she had done so he took the only pot of oil she had in the house and poured from it into the vessels till they were all filled, and the oil stayed. Then Elisha said: "Go sell the oil and pay the debt, and live thou and thy children of the rest."

Surely, Christians who indorse this account ought not to accuse modern mediums and Spiritualists of charlatanism when they profess to produce something out of nothing or to increase a little into much.

Elisha's second miracle was performed for a woman not a widow, and is so similar to Elijah's that it is probable they are one and the same story. This "great woman" said to her husband: "Let us make a little chamber for this holy man of God that passeth by us continually, and let us set for him there a bed, a stool, and a candlestick, and when he cometh to us he shall turn in thither."

Now, Elisha was overwhelmed with this kindness; so, as he lay there one day, he said to his faithful valet: "Gehazi, call this Shunammite." As she stood before him he asked her what he should do for her, naming over several honors he could confer. She respectfully declined them all, and he, in utter despair as to being able to reward her, turned to Gehazi and said, "What, then, is to be done for her?" The servant, more fertile in invention than his master, suggested that she had no children and that her husband was old. (2 Kings, iv. 14.) The holy man of God was pleased with the idea, and said, "Call her"—for she had modestly retired from the presence of these two tramps after the first offer. But at the holy call "she stood in the door," while Elisha lay in the bed, and Gehazi, we may suppose, stood by his master's couch (?). Imagine the tableau while the miracle is performed. And Elisha said, "About this season, according to the time of life, thou shalt embrace a son." And she said, "Nay, my lord, thou man of God, do not lie unto thine handmaid." And the woman conceived and bore a son at that season that Elisha had said unto her, "According to the time of life."

Are we to understand that God wrought a miracle in giving a child to this woman whose husband was old? How was it wrought? Without the husband's interference, we are led to infer. As the story runs, the woman was "standing in the door," and the holy man lying in the bed; therefore, she must have been overshadowed by the Holy Ghost in the presence of these two men, for we are evidently to understand that conception took place at this time.

How many Christians would put such a version on a similar case occurring to-day? How many would believe such a narration? Not one! Besides, the account gives us every possible reason to conclude that Elisha was father of the child. After he told her she should bear a child (verse 16), and where it is recorded (verse 17) that she conceived, there was ample time and opportunity for Gehazi to retire, the woman to enter the room, and a child to be begotten. It appears there was no prowling husband around to watch, and that the master and servant were perfectly agreed in the matter. What would be thought of such a conversation between a married woman, in the absence of her husband, and two strolling male mediums nowadays? Why, they would be called Freelovers, especially if the woman had never had any children before, and at a certain length of time afterward she became a mother. Let the Comstock

Christians take the story and do what they please with it. It is their story, not ours, and we commend it to their prayerful consideration. We think "Cupid's Yokes" not half so bad. Perhaps some reverend man of God of the present day who has entered houses leading captive silly women can best explain its hidden meaning to a wondering laity.

But the story is not yet complete. It has a most interesting finale. The boy was one day out with his father (?) among the reapers, and complained of headache. He sent him in to his mother, and he sat on her knees till he died. Her first thought was of "the man of God," not of her husband. He never left his work to look after the child, sick or dead; and instead of sending for her husband to come home and attend to his dead boy, she went up and laid him on the bed of "the man of God," and called unto her husband and said, "Send me, I pray thee, one of the young men and one of the asses, that I may run to the man of God and come again." Her husband objected, for she had not told him the child was dead. But away she went full speed, accompanied by a male servant, who was commanded not to slacken his riding except as she bade him; for could not the man who had miraculously begotten the child miraculously restore it? (Will the reader not examine the rest of the account in Kings, chapter 4)? When she reached the man of God she was so earnest she caught him by the feet and said: "Did I desire a son of my lord? Did I not say, Do not deceive me?" In her distress she here confesses that the son was "of my lord," and the historian has so chronicled it.

But we must pass on. Gehazi went in before the others and said that the child had not awakened, which was doubtless correct, if there be any truth in the account. But the record declares that the child was dead upon Elisha's bed. Now, it is said he magnetized the child into life, only that word is not used in sacred scripture. Nothing strange occurred. The child grew very ill; the mother, alarmed, laid it upon the prophet's bed, and hastened after him. In order to make the story miraculous it must be stated the child was dead, when a little manipulating—warming and breathing on him—brought him around all right (it seems he had a sunstroke); after which Elisha told his man-of-all-jobs to call the woman; and she took up her son and went out; nor does it appear that her husband knew aught of the matter.

Now, this "holy man of God" seems to have been especially interested in this woman, for we read in 2 Kings, chapter viii, that he was looking after her interests again, and no mention is made of that useless appendage, her husband. He told her there would be seven years of famine, and she must look out for herself; so she went and dwelt in the land of the Philistines the seven years, and then returned to her own house, and by application to the king, through Elisha and Gehazi, succeeded in the restoration of her house and land she would otherwise have lost on account of her seven years' absence.

As we are not treating of Elisha but of the woman, who has not even a name, we will only add that while he would take such special pains to save this one woman's one child, he could by his curses cause two bears to tear in pieces forty-two innocents, all children of mothers, we presume, and beloved by them as much as the boy of this Shunammite mother. This "man of God" has not an exalted character to boast of if the record be correct; but as his sins were sins in favor of Israel's God, they were winked at, even as are the sins of the clergy of to-day, who, in the name of God, outrage all decency, reason, and legal rights. Be that as it may, we are not anxious for a succession of prophets in the line of Elijah and Elisha to lead us up into the Elysian fields of kingdom come, unto the heavenly Canaan of rest.

Thoughts for the Thoughtful.—No. 2.

INSCRIBED TO THE REV J. H. DODD.

How unsatisfactory to hav desires that can never be satisfied! Atheism cannot destroy the great God whom I adore. —J. H. Dodd.

And would men be any happier, on the great whole, were all their desires gratified? Are a thousandth part of their wishes, hopes, and aspirations ever satisfied? Then why believe it a proof of immortality simply because it is desirable, or supposed to be desirable?

Just think of the passionate "desires" of the deformed, crippled, and hopelessly diseased, for health, comeliness, and perfection of bodily development! And of what avail is it all towards the attainment of their coveted treasures? For many a year during my girlhood my longings were intense, constant, and deep for beauty. I read of its charm in novels; I saw its power in the young maidens of my acquaintance; I felt its want in the ball-room, the playground, and the concert-hall. Everywhere was the heartfelt homage paid to beauty, and my soul cried out:

"If I were only beautiful, how happy I would be!
I'd then be loved by every one who chanced to look at me.
I would bright eyes were sparkling beneath rich, glossy hair.
I would my cheeks were blooming, and my brow was high and fair.
They praise the beauty of the mind, and yet they only bow
To the ruby lips, the graceful form, the fair and lofty brow."

And yet to-day I realize how much better it probably is for me that my passionate desires were not founded upon fact. For had I been what I longed to be, I would doubtless hav become a gay butterfly of fashion and my mind would hav been sacrificed to personal charms. Just so, my friend, is it with you God and Christ-believers—you paradise and immortality-worshipers. To a vain dream of what you wish for you are sacrificing the real and tangible now—the bright joys, pure pleasures, and high and holy aspirations of earth-life. What this world would hav been, had men devoted the time, toil, and means, the thought, study, and research, to developing its resources, perfecting the moral and physical nature of its inhabitants, and bending all energies to making a heaven here, no one can imagine; but we must all realize how infinitely superior everything would be to what it is now.

The Infidel is the grown-up woman who sees that the myths and air-castles she once built on the temple of the goddess of beauty are as visionary, illusive, and undesirable as are those you non-progressive, always children, tied-back-to-a-past believers now indulge in as regards immortality of identity. Not till you throw off the swaddling-clothes of your youth, the influences of early teachings, of religious novels, fictions, and myths, will you realize the dwarfing and belittling influence of longing and desiring for the impossible. Let us all make the best of the now and to-day, and we will then see how quickly Atheism and common sense will destroy the God thee now adore, the dreams thee now cherish, and the visions thee now imagine.

Every religion, every god, ghost, demon, and phantom of the past is dead. Every one that now livs will follow in the same way. New gods will arise, and new religions will cluster around them; but just as surely as they are born will they, too, die and pass away, for no one form or identity is, or ever can be, eternal.

On man alone depends his destiny. The gods are nothing. So work, my friend, for facts, work for the real, and leave dreams and fancies for children. The strong man needs strong food, strong thoughts, and strong labors to bring out his powers, his capacities, and his greatest perfections of body and mind.

"'Tis we must grasp the lightning
And plough the rugged soil.
'Tis we must conquer suffering
And plague and murder foil.
'Tis we must build the paradise
And bravely right the wrong.
The God above us faileth;
The god within is strong."

The Oneida Community.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Nearly forty years ago a little band of about eighty persons, strong in the feeling that they were inspired with new and grand truths, and anxious to work them out practically, settled at Oneida, N. Y. They were fully convinced that their inspiration came from the God of the universe through Jesus Christ. As to that we may each hav our own opinion; it matters not so far as this article is concerned. If God does occasionally inspire mankind to do good let us not quarrel with him, but accept it for what it is worth, and profit by it. These people were fired with zeal for the new truth to that extent that loss of funds, malicious misrepresentations, hatred, and even personal violence could not deter them from a trial of what to them was an inspiration. They hav a social system of their own, differing entirely from that of the outside world. It is of this that I would speak. I hav no intention of going into a description of this social system. It can be had from their own works. I wish merely to giv some facts and make some comparisons.

I think when a social system produces such results as hav been produced in less than forty years by this, there is nothing in it that need terrify any one. They hav been invariably orderly and quiet citizens, even under the most aggravating circumstances. They hav established large and flourishing business enterprises. They are all industrious and economical. They number now nearly three hundred, and not one of them out of employment. No tramps among them. They hav established educational institutions that are equal if not superior to any in the nation. They are well informed, this being one of the necessaries of the society. They hav no police court, jail, or almshouse within their domain; neither hav they a house of correction. They hav not put the county or state to the expense, in any way, of caring for one of their number. None of them drink, chew, or smoke. They are so pleasantly and profitably employed that they find no time to "tattle" about their neighbors. Their manufactured articles are sought after by those who hav tasted them. Their canned fruit is unsurpassed. I hav the testimony of a Christian gentleman of good moral character as to the healthfulness, intelligence, and personal beauty of the children. He says: "Too much cannot be said in praise of the method of Oneida with their children. Say what may be against their social system, they hav certainly made some discovery which we hav not in regard to bringing forth and rearing children."

"Some discovery." This Christian gentleman, and all others, ought to know that no mother in all these years was made an unwilling slave to the depraved appetites and passions of brutal lust. None in all that large number of mothers was ever tempted to murder her own flesh in order to hide her shame and degradation. Children are there begotten when both parents desire offspring, and when both are in the best possible condition physically and mentally. This may hav much to do with the uniform good condition so universally spoken of by those who hav seen them. All of those people hav the comforts of life; none of them neither men, women, nor children, are left to the uncertainties of a very cold, uncertain society. They hav made not war upon the outside world, but hav attended strictly to the working out of their own inward thought.

Now, in the face of all these facts, which if not known might and ought to hav been, Christianity, with her hands all begrimed and dripping with the blood of thousands slain, her garments stained with ten thousand nameless crimes, not content to ever behold purity's peace and natural love, true to her hitherto beastly instincts, demands a change in the social system of Oneida. They are not perfect; no one would claim them to be; yet compare them in their home of peace and quiet, with joy and intelligence beaming from each face, compare them, I say, with the outside world, scarred as it is with jails, penitentiaries, houses of correction, almshouses and poorhouses, the wan and haggard look of her who has sought the river or the deadly poison to escape the finger of scorn; the thousands who are homeless, begging, not for bread but for the privilege of earning it; the dens of vice and crime in all our large cities, the manifest discontent and suffering of even those who hav of this world's goods been stuffed to satiety. And can you say to Oneida, "Change your social system?"

Christianity has never been able to liv peaceably with any other system, no matter how pure, if it conflicted in the least wth her established ideas. Differ ever so little from her prescribed plan and you are damned here if she has the power; if not here, you are sure of it hereafter. Her anathema has gone forth against Oneida, and from all appearances her damnation even in this world is sure. She has touched her and her fate is sealed. The people of Oneida can never giv up their central thought and remain pure. Even the Christians will not trust them; they will always believe them to be living above marriage, although they hav themselves forced them to accept it.

O ye men and women of Oneida, many eyes are upon you. Many hav believed that you had well-nigh solved the problem. Sad, sad indeed will be the day when you giv up the principle for which you so bravely suffered at the first! You believed you were right. You hav tried for forty years, and hav evolved success from your thought. Now, when you are prepared to prove to the world by your work that it is a success, to giv up thus were cowardly in the extreme.

Let any one point to any Christian community of three hundred souls in our broad land, and say that in forty years there has never been a theft, a murder, an abortion, some poor girl ruined and deserted, some banker robbing the poor, some victim of the rumseller, some neighborhood scandal, or some one of these, and I will then study to know the social system under which they lived. I am fully persuaded that Oneida owes its success in avoiding all these to the social system under which they hav lived.

Must these people be forced to submit to Christian marriage? Must they, in order to satisfy a system whose very touch is palsy, and upon whose face is written deceit, hypocrisy, falsehood, and lust, giv up that which to them has been not only an inspiration but a practical method of reforming and making themselves better men and women, enabling them also to bring forth the best possible offspring? If Christian society can produce as good results I hav nothing to say; but where are they?

Let some of the apostles of Christian marriage produce such results and I am forever mum. Let them decrease the number that are daily being drawn from our best society into the dens of vice. I might say driven from society, for let one of the frail ones make but a slip and there is no place left open but the dark and dreary downward road to wretchedness and despair. While our society is producing ragged honesty for the many and gorged and bloated hypocrisy for the few, while we hav the ten thousand penniless wanderers up and down our railroad lines, and the railroad king in his palace on wheels, can we with consistency say that we are even trying to solve the great problem of the greatest good to the greatest number. Liberals, while we are striking at all of the evils which infest our land, are we really looking for the best method of making mankind better? To make people good we must make them comfortable. They must not feel that to cease exertion is to starve. They must not feel that with their own unaided arm against an army of speculators they must make their way for themselves and little ones. This it is that fosters selfishness and engenders hatred and strife.

Oneida has made the weak ones feel that they were to receive protection instead of being pushed to the wall. This subject is worthy our attention if we are true to our race. I claim that Oneida has well-nigh solved this great problem. They hav at least pointed the direction in which a solution lies. I trust they will remain true to the principles upon which they were established, for they would prove it to hav been founded upon an eternal principle of truth.

THE "gods" did well when they prevented man from eating the fruit of the tree of knowledge, but they must hav been young and inexperienced to hav created a tree the fruit of which in time would cause their own destruction. Humanity is beginning to borrow and to eat of the fruit of the tree of knowledge and wisdom, and the noble bud of reason is unfolding its precious leaves in the material soul of man, and man will yet be as wise as the gods, for the gods themselves preconceived this. The gods are distant, and are slowly but surely fading away. The gods are doomed.—C. F. Homer.

A Small Roland.

Well, you see, friend Green, the trouble with me is I am somehow so got up (maybe it is constitutional) that I look to principles, hav great respect for principles, with unbounded faith and devotion follow principles. On the other hand, I regret to say that, from long experience, I hav learned not to be the least bit overawed by persons or by great names, especially when the great names hav not much else but name to swear by. The great learning, the respectability, the solemn, high mightiness of university professors, don't impress me worth a cent. I remain calm and unfluttered in the presence of persons with these qualities unless they are accompanied by a high regard for truth, some knowledge of bottom principles, and a determination to stand by principles through all dangers and all vicissitudes.

Just as a half truth is the most damaging of lies, so a half-hearted adherent to any cause is the greatest hindrance to it. I hav heard in the speech of backwoods people something about being "a man, or a mouse, or a long-tailed rat;" and the scripture characterizes some disciples as being lukewarm enough to be spewed out. The amphibii are never quite so graceful and lovely as dear gazelles, and uncompromising loyalty to a cause once espoused, I must believe, will yet for some time be held in fair repute. Let it be either loyalty or entire abandonment. Don't try to make a home where the heart is not.

Now you see the other day a troop of these professors pranced into the Liberal arena, with starting eyeballs and streaming hair, proclaiming that the private relations of a private individual, existing fifteen years ago, are going to knock the bottom out of the universe, right off, to-day, this week; and they were born, oh! cursed spite, to set it right. Now there is no law compelling these gentlemen thus superserviceably to rush to the assistance of the great author of the Cosmos, and they ought to hav known that they would push their enterprise at their peril unless they were adequately armed and surely sanctioned by the eternal principle of things. They came, however, unwarily, incautiously, with a hole in their armor. The opportunity was too good to be lost. The present writer, advocate and defender of the Eighth Demand of Liberalism, let fly a javelin through thorax and heart of the solemn pretense, and it has not been heard of since till now friend Green puts in against me a plea of wrong classification.

Let's see about that. I found Professor Oliver talking just as Abbot does, and as Joe Cook does—demanding for Liberals "a practical standard of conduct above public reproach." I found him talking about "principles which we" (the professors) "deemed injurious to public morals;" and as the League was not organized to promote "public morals," but was organized to assert and in all ways to promote "natural morality," and don't care a continental about "public reproach," why, the conclusion is, these Professors "therefore resolved that we hereby sever our connection with the National Liberal League."

Now that is exactly the sort of talk, of which I cited instance after instance from several columns in the Index invoking "public morality" and quoting and praising Joe Cook. Joe Cook agrees with Abbot about "public morality," and Prof. Oliver agrees with Abbot. These three all agree together, and I cannot see for the life of me how I hav wrongly classified either of them. If O equals A, and A equals C, don't O equal C, Mr. Green? If you don't believe it, ask the Professor of Mathematics at Cornell.

I need but a little piece of the tail of a crustacean, so admirably contrived for going backwards, to construct the whole crab. But I didn't make the little piece of tail, nor am I blaming the crab for his inverse way of getting ahead. I only assign him his place in animated nature.

"Himself it was who wrote
His rank, and quartered his own coat."

And it is himself alone who can get himself out of bad company. If he has made mistakes, as friend Green concedes, let him correct them, and then sin no more. These are days of confession. Others hav had to own up, and it won't hurt Prof. Oliver. Confession is good for the soul, and Prof. Oliver's needs something good for it almost as medicinally as any Liberal I know. He has for his guide the high and noble exemplar now suffering vicarious atonement up there at Albany. He confessed his little peccadillo. The outrage on "public morality" shrank into microscopic proportions at once, and every accuser was dumb. He now stands many altitudes higher than if he had never been accused. Let Prof. Oliver go and do likewise, and he too will develop from the tribe crustacean up into the race mammalian, with vertebrate results.

But has Mr. Green started out to coach Prof. Oliver to run for the Presidency of the National Liberal League? It looks like it. If so he ought to be apprised of the fact that he has taken a "darned long row to hoe." The League, in convention assembled, will naturally want to see that confession, and will call on Prof. Oliver to rise and explain. The League will want a President who don't make mistakes. Its first President was pretty much all made up of mistakes, and we don't want another. Its second President don't make mistakes, and we do want another, when the time comes to change.

Armies hav been known to giv deserters very drumhead treatment and then escort the delinquents out of camp to be shot. Mr. Green would secure discipline by promoting his runaways. He says, "There is no Liberal in the United States whom I prize more highly than I do Prof. Oliver;" and again, "I must say I do not know where we could find a more worthy man to take Mr. Wright's place."

These assertions tax credulity. No Liberal would ever suppose Mr. Green's acquaintance among "worthy men" so limited. You don't know a more worthy man than Prof. Oliver, who has been standing on the order of his going out of the League for two years past, who rises every now and then to explain, "Now I'm going, going," with hat in one hand and knob of the door in the other, letting in the chilly draught, kotowing and waving his farewells, everybody taking cold and getting hoarse responding their adieus, and as yet he don't quite go? who hasn't opened his head in any public way for the League since the eventful day at Syracuse, and who has not lifted his finger in any way that anybody has heard of in behalf of the martyr for all our freedoms, including his own—up there at Albany? Don't you know Mr. James Parton, who says brave words and backs them up by noble deeds for Liberalism? Don't you know T. B. Wakeman, ready in debate, first-class organizer, clear-headed, intrepid, and unanswerable pleader for just laws and their impartial administration? Haven't you more or less slight acquaintance with Prof. Rawson, whom it would be a good "civil service" move to promote from his present hard-worked and unpaid Secretaryship—unpaid except in "slings and arrows" to which your favorite Professor contributes a cruel barb? Don't you know Parker Pillsbury, another of the "Old Guard" in the war against slavery? and as we succeeded so well with one of those veterans, would you object to trying another in preference to the learned Professor? Don't you know McCracken, and Campfield, and Walker, and York—soldiers in the field who by their words and works prove themselves eligible timber for Presidents? Don't you happily know some of our noble women, Amy Post or Lucy Colman for instance—either of whom would be a more "worthy man" for President than Prof. Oliver? Or lastly don't you know yourself, Mr. Green, who would compare with your nominee "as Hyperion to a Satyr" in worth to take Mr. Wright's place? After a statement like that, concerning the only man you know, you owe it to the Liberal public to clearly set forth what Prof. Oliver has ever done to make him a worthy successor of the Hon. Elizur Wright. What are his virtues? What are his qualifications? If he is so very eligible these are the points you will be obliged to me for calling out.

But for myself, as far as I know now, if I've got to go for some great university name very slightly identified with the League, and none but cultured college-bred candidates are to be considered, I do not propose to stoop to any mere professor. I go for a man of Science AND Theology, who is already a president; and Dr. McCosh, of Princeton, is my man. Elizur Wright as good as nominated him, too, last week; or at least he made his rare qualifications known; and between Mr. Wright's two discoveries of sound Presidential timber I go for McCosh. The enemies of the National Liberal League charge that it will never be satisfied till it gets an openly-pronounced Freelover for President—also an undoubted candidate for Mr. Bennett's successor in making shoes. Dr. McCosh fills the bill. It is lucky that all this came out before Dr. McCosh is elected, because it so handsomely discounts the exposure business.

These are a few specimens from a large collection of my "honest views." Let them go forth to the Liberal world through THE TRUTH SEEKER and take a wrestle with those of our ever-esteemed and hard-working Liberal friend Green. T. C. LELAND.

P. S.—I don't propose to bolt if Dr. McCosh goes up Salt River and Prof. Oliver is elected.

N. B—I don't want to "sever my connection."

TAKE NOTICE.—Retreats—steps backward—are not my style. I leave that to the crabs.

☞ I take more interest in the front than in the rear.

"Pessimism" and Positivism.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE HERALD: In your issue of the 26th are some well-timed and admirable remarks on the doleful article of Prof. Goldwin Smith in the February Atlantic. The apparently over-learned professor admits that the world has about done with dogmatic Christianity, and seems to see nothing better for the human race ahead than universal suicide. Nature, including the human, is too bad and horribly tyrannical to be comfortably endured. Having to his own satisfaction worked out a demonstration of despair, he concludes thus:

If a real religious philosophy is possible, this is the time for its appearance. On one side we hav the official defenders of the established creed desperately identifying all religion with the untenable; on the other hand, we hav men trained exclusively in physical science, contemptuously ignorant of history and philosophy, that is, of moral and social man, and determined, with a fanaticism scarcely less violent than that of the theologians, to expel all religion from the world. Between the two extremes is it not possible to find some foundation for a rational religion? It must be possible, if we are in the hands of a being who cares for us, who has power to guide us to the truth, and to whose character the better part of ours affords a real clew.

But Prof. Smith, by a broad and exhaustive collation and induction of incontrovertible facts, has just demonstrated that we are not in the hands of any such being. If we were, there would be good reason for his pessimism. If we are in the hands of any being out of ourselves, and to whose character the best part of "ours affords a real clew," he has not guided us to the truth by the Christian dogmas, for they are exploded. He has simply left us to ourselves, or to be guided by those physical scientists who are so violently fanatical as to be determined to expel all religion from the world, or, in other words, who deny that we are in the hands of any such being. The total absence of a being with power to guide us to the truth, without the will to do it, is the only possible soil on which optimism could grow. And a better quality of it does grow there than ever grew under any variety of theism, unless it be pantheism.

When Mr. Smith assumes that men trained in physical science are trained in that exclusively, and that they contemptuously ignore history and philosophy, and that they wish or attempt to expel religion from the world otherwise than as the knowledge of all that men are capable of knowing necessarily expels it, he is deplorably mistaken. Denying the personality or special providence of what causes motion and life in the universe, if we must postulate a cause, is not denying a future existence to any being by us known to exist. Very few scientists either affirm or deny that. They are not so virulent as to carry on any war with either imagination or hope. When they turn matter into inconceivable tenuity, they at least approach a possibility that we may liv etherially after we hav ceased to liv materially. When they demonstrate that the material man of to-day is not identified with the material man of last year, and yet admit that memory is an attribute of mind reaching back from old age to childhood, they by no means conclude that mind cannot possibly outlive matter. They simply postpone conclusion for further experiment. They determine to take as much pleasure as possible in work and discovery while they hav sense to work with, being sure this will not disqualify them for any work or pleasure which may fall to their lot when they hav none. When God and religion are gone, men, women, and children and good nature are left.

Religion is not a scientific word, because God is not a scientific being. All that distinguishes man from other animals is the superiority of his reasoning faculty, capable of rapid and almost unlimited development and growth. In mechanical adaptations and vividness of emotions other animals may equal if not excel him. Religion never was and never can be a matter of the reason, but of the emotions; and no matter how religious a man may be, his dog is probably more so. The mountain, the cataract, the ocean, the thunderstorm, inspire more awe and wonder in man than any conception of omnipotent spirit. Parents, brothers, sisters, wife, children, neighbors, inspire more love than any being that was ever the object of religion to man. Even patriotism, under a government that is at all wise and just, is a far stronger and higher sentiment than any object of religion ever inspired.

If Prof. Goldwin Smith is in search of a religion, or "real religious philosophy," Positivism surely ought to satisfy him, for it proposes a church without a theology. Of course, it has to giv a new definition to the word religion. But, with the utmost care, it saves the word, and, with unanswerable logic, it contends that it has saved all the meaning of it which was ever good for anything. Yet, after all, it had to invent a new word, and, having done that, the old word was hardly worth saving.

The word which Positivism has added to the vocabulary is Altruism—the love and care for others. It contains all the good there ever was or could be in, or rather under, the word religion. It will probably survive as being the fittest, while religion will become obsolete, for precision requires that, as the world advances, new words shall be introduced and old ones forgotten. Astronomy has displaced astrology, and chemistry alchemy. Altruism signifies what always existed in human nature, more or less, and is the foundation of society. It grows out of every I or Ego. Its good quality is testified to by the very fact that egotism or selfishness is everywhere a term of contempt. Yet no one is considered worthy of respect who does not begin by respecting himself. Only he must not end there. Positivism has, therefore, slightly changed the word egotism to egoism, which means, simply, the indispensable fulcrum of which Altruism is the lever. Positivism, which, having first exorcised the word religion, calls itself "the religion of humanity," makes Egoism or Individualism the center, and its religion is nothing but the attraction between that and other human beings, varying, of course, inversely as the square of the distance. Its molecular unit is the family. Then comes the more slightly cohering aggregation of its voluntary, untheological church, without a particle of damnation for unbelief. It cultivates morality, not by coercion or compulsion, or even by the will or authority of any man, or majority of men, but by the comparison of lives and examples of the highest success in pursuing and imparting happiness. It is a sort of free church, to which a free state can hav no objection.

If any one thinks an old religion cannot be safely discarded without introducing a new one, he or she had better send to the Society of Humanity, 141 Eighth street, New York, for "An Epitome of the Positive Philosophy and Religion," containing not only the religious tenets and details of church organization, but also a very able and valuable letter from the late Harriet Martineau, in reply to the "regrets" and commiseration of certain American friends in regard to her philosophical and religious conclusions.

In this remarkable letter, at the close of her active career, and after she had reached what Christians call Atheism, but many years before her death, and while her mind was in its utmost vigor, she writes:

As for the sense of general health, intellectual and moral, the full and joyous liberty under the everlasting laws of nature, and the disappearance of incongruity, perplexity, and moral disturbance, such as every theory of the government of the universe must cause to thoughtful minds, we can only enjoy these blessings in sympathy with our fellow-disciples. It is only by attaining them that the blessings of them can be understood. What Christians may know by observation, if they will, is, that we who hav gone through their experience (whereas, they hav not had ours) are healthier in mind, higher in views and conduct, and happier in life and the prospect of death, than we were before. Our old friends may wonder at it; but that is their affair. We know our own feelings; and the wonder to us is, that inexperienced persons should pronounce upon them.

How miserably small do the apostles of pessimism appear compared with such a thinker and doer as Harriet Martineau! ELIZUR WRIGHT.

Religious Instruction for Our Criminals and Its Effect upon Them.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The furnishing of religious instruction for the criminal population of this country is something upon which the masses are extremely ignorant. Seldom do we hear anything regarding it from pulpit or press or from our legislators, and the common people giv it no attention at all.

The obligations we are supposed to be under to a Creator for life, health, for all that we enjoy in this life, and for a supposed necessary preparation for a pleasant and happy existence in an imaginary future world with the gods we manufacture, has been so long taught us by designing and often unscrupulous religious zealots and priests, securing a living by working upon the fears and credulity of the ignorant and toiling who hav become still more ignorant and nearly pauperized, till the people hav come to think these teachers and teachings a necessity and that even our criminals are benefited by them.

As religions hav to do with an assumed future life regarding which no two intelligent persons agree and nothing can be positively demonstrated, it is a question whether much valuable time should be taken from the little allotted us here in a fruitless attempt to search out the unknowable and to deal so much with the visionary and unreal, when the entire scheme is based upon assumptions so nearly groundless.

First, the existence of a personal God somewhere in the heavens and outside of nature; second, that we hav a future existence; and third, that our principal business while in this world is in some way to prepare for this imaginary existence somewhere in some world after the death of the body.

This, to us, is the real world; the only one we know anything about; and, so far as science has yet shown, the only one we shall ever see—the beginning and the end with each living, intelligent organism. As we hav no knowledge of a previous existence, there may be nothing after the death of the body. Thus all we now hav, so far as we know, is the result of the growth and development of the body, and may depart with it.

Viewing things in this light, reason would say, Giv your attention to things wholly pertaining to the welfare, happiness, and prosperity of all human beings while in this life, and take care of the next when we find it.

This much hav we said in attempting to show the folly of intelligent, reasoning people outside of prisons wasting so much time and squandering so much money advocating theories and speculating about the next world, as it cannot be done except to the disparagement of this, to the detriment of human happiness and improvement, to the injury of the best forms of organized society, and also by the neglect of much that is valuable, practicable, and useful; thus detracting from the substantial, the real, and the knowable by cultivating the fanciful, the superstitious, and the marvelous, leading to ignorance, intemperance, vice, and crime.

The majority of our one hundred thousand criminals in this country are now suffering through ignorance of a thousand things that should be taught them concerning their actions and duties in this life, and continue to disregard the high moral law of right, disobey the laws of the land, become more degraded and criminal, and will thus continue in these pernicious ways till a radical reform is effected in their teachings.

The teaching is nearly all visionary, absurd, impractical, and useless. Little effort is made to instruct the ignorant, correct their errors, improve or enlighten the intellect, strengthen the weak moral perception, or to provide them with better surroundings, and giv them better ideas of this life; but it is all for the next world, which means neglect in this, and they become more and more debased.

The culprit is told he has disobeyed God and greatly offended him, and if a settlement is effected satisfactory to God he is clear from guilt. The pernicious effect of such teachings to a vicious, debased, and badly organized criminal is terrible to contemplate and destructive to all incentives to reform. He must first be shown he has disgraced himself, and if he cares not for this and has no desire to correct his habits or change his course of life—he may believe in one God or a thousand—he will not permanently reform; but for his own good and the protection of society, prison is his only proper place.

The injury he has done to friends and society is the next in order, and restitution should be made so far as in his power, and he must hav regard for the laws of the land. Self-respect is necessary to start the wrong-doer on the right road; he must be taught the worth of honesty and integrity of character and be brought to see the benefits resulting to an obedient and worthy citizen of the best government in the world, and of his obligations to support it, instead of his duties to imaginary gods, of which our laws take no cognizance.

Secular, rational, truthful, moral, and practical instruction should take the place of the present instruction, which is almost entirely religious. It is generally supposed that preachers of the gospel and pious, enthusiastic religionists are the only proper persons to teach a convict or to hav the supervision over him, but nothing could be farther from the truth.

Their teaching is regarding gods, heavens, hells, devils, and a future world, with which at present a convict should hav nothing to do till he has learned to take proper care of this. None of these are any real help in performing life's duties; therefore should be discarded; and people introducing these fanciful and unexplainable beings, with their imaginary abodes, no matter how good their intention, are doing the culprit positive injury.

The criminal is imprisoned and punished for violating the laws of the land, and not for disobedience to the laws of any god, unless included in these laws; and if included in the laws of the land why speak of them as being the laws of God, as no god helped to frame them or takes any part in their execution? When attributed to a god they do not restrain the criminal, but he will care even less for them than for the speedy administration of the laws of the land, as well he knows by experience no gods execute or administer law.

All the instruction given a convict should help to rectify his mistakes and improve his condition in this life, because no living person can teach him truthfully concerning another; and no religion should be taught the wrong-doer except to do right; that is all-sufficient, as no person in this world can do better than to do right.

Should the convict find another world after death, he will at least be as well prepared for the change as he was on entering this; and if we assume that his effort and time should be expended here in preparing for the next life, by the same logic we may assume the next life should be occupied in preparing for another still in advance.

However pious or good his intention, no such person should be permitted to delude a convict with sophisms and unexplainable mysteries, and make these, as they now do, take the place of real knowledge and beneficial instruction, to call his attention from present duty to himself and community, and by false reasoning from untenable and unsound premises continue to lead him astray.

The most religious persons being wholly engrossed with their religions are illy prepared to giv practical and useful instruction to the erring, as they suppose that religion is all he needs. That being the chief concern with them, it must be good and necessary for a law-breaker, and if accepted by him he will, in the sight of the gods, become more favored than a person moral and upright in character, obedient to law, but who has not embraced religion, become pious, and is not a believer in absurdities and dogmas.

That the natural result of such teachings is to produce criminals and confirm them in crime is evident to the reasoner and to those having positions in prisons who giv attention to the effect upon them, and to those not prejudiced in favor of some religion; being a strong argument against giving convicts religious instruction, as it forms no part of wholesome discipline, does not correct, improve, enlighten, or instruct the convict, or in any way strengthen or assist to a better life.

Religion does nothing to strengthen the weak moral nature of the criminal, and we shall object to these very pious persons who are usually selected to teach them in the Bible class, as they are unbalanced in organization, not properly developed in reasoning and intellectual powers of mind and thought, eccentric, prejudiced and irrational, bigoted, superstitious, and exclusive; often narrow-minded, hypocritical and selfish, illogical and silly in their views and illustrations; and it is seldom that such persons are capable of taking proper care of themselves, and it is impossible for them to improve and elevate a convict.

They cannot benefit the most intelligent class, who are quick to detect the discrepancies in religious teachings, the unsound and foolish absurdities taught, and the small regard these religious enthusiasts hav for justice, moral principle, and right action—but depend wholly on the saving faith of their religion and the help of their unseen and mysterious gods.

This appeal to the criminal is not to his higher and better nature, but the selfish and the inferior; and if he assent to such teachings it is to still further debase him in the attempt to escape hell in a future world and to secure heaven; but it produces no wholesome restraint upon his vicious course and life of crime while here.

No doubt a class of ignorant, vicious, and superstitious criminals are controlled somewhat by a fear of hell, of the devil, and of the priests; and will assent to almost anything taught by those of superior knowledge, yet they are not improved by these delusions; and the state should not suffer any class of its criminals to be thus defrauded, but should furnish them with truthful, positive, and rational instruction that will improve their condition here and now.

These zealous pious people seldom command the respect of the average convict, who ridicules them and their religion in their absence, who becomes the more deceitful and treacherous in proportion as he is being defrauded, and will reduce it to practice as occasion requires. Our best business men are not found among religious enthusiasts and fanatics, neither are our best thinkers, our sound, logical reasoners, our most practical, common sense men, to whom we look for the most valuable instruction regarding the affairs of this life, found among the religious organizations of to-day; because they are too sectarian, illiberal, and exacting of them, and they will not be trammeled.

The best instructors for the people at the present time, and for the convicts, are found outside of the churches, but are not permitted to teach our criminals, because they will not defraud them with religion.

The priests claim the exclusive right to instruct the criminal because they care for and pretend to save the soul, but neglect his body, and are paid for this neglect by all taxpayers, many taking no stock in religion but help to pay for cheating and mystifying the convict with religious speculations.

Men of genuine integrity of character, possessing the most systematic, clear, logical, and comprehensive ideas of human life, having large experience in the different business vocations, liberal, cultured, and unbiased, professing no religion but that of honesty and strict rectitude of life, ar the proper persons to be teachers of the young and rising generation, and very suitable persons to giv instruction to one who has made mistakes and broken the laws of the land, to show him the great loss he sustains while in this life, and the misery and wretchedness he may avoid now; not by becoming a religious hypocrite or a pious knave, but by becoming an industrious self-supporting citizen, an honest and useful member of society.

Scarce a criminal sinks so low but that he has regard for the person he knows to be an honest man, who will no sooner defraud him with religion than with money or things of this world.

Persons who giv their best endeavor to the affairs of this life, who exhibit truth, justice, honesty, and work for the elevation and benefit of the convict now, must be substituted for those who are now treating him to the marvelous, vain, and mythical, which is not real instruction, does not benefit him, add to his knowledge, help him to an honest living, strengthen him to resist temptation, or prepare him to be law-abiding.

The convict has a right to expect honesty in his superiors, and no person, however cultured or religious, should teach him for facts anything in the least doubtful; yet religious people hav a mania for teaching mysteries and fables for facts, and if a convict will believe these absurdities he will be immediately absolved from his guilt and crime. Now who can blame him for becoming a believer? The laws of this land should severely punish this deceiver.

As a teacher having a knowledge of the common branches of secular education is required to impart this knowledge to his pupils without regard to any religion, so the instructor of our criminals should instruct them in secular, moral, and scientific knowledge as the only true knowledge to be found.

It is indeed surprising to find so many zealous, weak-minded, assuming religious fanatics, dealing out religion to criminals in our jails, penitentiaries, and prisons, till they claim the right to monopolize the teachings and make them wholly religious, whereas they should be entirely secular. And still more strange is it that intelligent men in charge of these prisons who know the damaging effect of such teachings upon the criminal, and the injustice done the state, hav not the moral courage to speak their honest thoughts upon this subject.

So long as these morally weak, intellectually poverty-stricken, and visionary advocates for religions and a preparation for the next world, are allowed to defraud our criminals, so long will crime and pauperism increase, and suffering and additional taxation be the result. The influence of such teachings outside of prisons is lamentable, but inside is terribly destructive to the weak morals of the culprit, crowding out all valuable instruction and all persons who might benefit the convict.

Suitable and competent persons can be found amongst lawyers, physicians, teachers, business men, mechanics, and laborers to instruct a convict, and preachers, if they will leave out all religions, creeds, dogmas, superstitions, and mysteries, but not otherwise.

But priests adjudge themselves to be the only competent persons to teach criminals, and with how little reason when their business is to explain to them something of which they are entirely ignorant, therefore cannot enlighten others. They talk of a God of whom they know nothing, as no human being has ever seen him. No one can explain him or demonstrate his existence.

Whether the priest teaches one God, three, or more, he will always remain the same wonderful, unknowable, unexplainable mystery that he was to the Ephesians nearly two thousand years ago, or like the Jewish Jehovah who had no real existence in the minds of an ignorant and credulous people.

Will some learned person tell us what theology or a belief in a God has to do with the duties of a criminal imprisoned and suffering a just penalty for transgressing the laws of the state, and to it only is he, or can he be the subject till he has paid the penalty of his crime, as no person, being, or other power has the least jurisdiction over him, and the law of the land, if obeyed, is sufficient to make of him a good citizen, which in this secular government is all that in justice can be required?

The people are not aware of the virulence with which these priests denounce laymen, who claim the right under this secular government to instruct convicts, especially if they are suspected of holding unorthodox sentiments, or if they giv pre-eminence to his bodily needs and every-day actions, instead of trying to save his soul.

Our opinion is that no permanent good can accrue to the criminal or to society as the result of religious teaching, and this truth is being daily demonstrated by those coming out of prisons, who hav none but religious instruction, as it is seldom that one pretending to become pious in prison stays reformed long after coming out. He depends on religion, his religious friend, the priests, and the gods to help him, and is disappointed by them all; and having lost his own manhood and self-respect is illy prepared to liv an honest life. R. C. TROWBRIDGE.

Auxiliary Liberal League No. 158.

This League was formed at Paterson, N. J., and charter dated Jan. 28, 1880, Mr. John Warr, member of the Executive Committee for New Jersey, being the prime mover in the case. Our English friend, Mr. James Holmes, lectured there a few days since, and the formation of the League is largely due to his effort. There are many hard-headed thinkers among the silk-workers of Paterson, who only wait for the spirit of secularism to move when they will form a large and powerful society, for lectures, debates, and readings.

James Redpath Contrasts Wendell Phillips and Ingersoll.

REPORTER: Among the lecturers of American birth, whom do you prefer to talk about first?

MR. REDPATH: The two orators I know who are most distinctively American in their style and thought—whom no other conntry could hav produced—are Ingersoll and Phillips; and yet they hav hardly one personal or oratorical trait in common. Phillips is the product of Puritan New England culture and blood; Ingersoll is the incarnation of all the tendencies and the spirit of the West. In their manners and conversation they are as unlike each other as in their oratory and methods. Saving in their personal habits of dainty cleanliness, they are almost antagonistic in everything excepting in political radicalism; and even in politics, their methods are at war, for Ingersoll is a politician of great influence in his party, and Phillips has never voted at all, nor even supported a presidential or congressional candidate by his voice. Ingersoll, like "Mose," "runs with the machine;" Phillips is constantly criticising it. Ingersoll, too, is rather luxuriant in his dress; while although Phillips is always well dressed—not a speck on his clothing—you never can remember what he wears. Phillips wears his clothes as long as they will wear and look genteel. I hav seen him with lisle-thread gloves that were darned; but let him wear what he may, he never looks, nor is, either slovenly or shabby. Ingersoll smokes incessantly and indulges moderately in champagne. Phillips would as soon try to dance on a tight-rope as put a cigar between his lips, and he has not only never tasted any intoxicating drink, but advocates the prohibition of its sale by law. I introduced Ingersoll to Phillips. In the course of their talk, Ingersoll wanted to illustrate a point by a certain trick of cards. "Do you play poker?" asked Ingersoll. I shouted with laughter.

REP.: Why?

J. R.: Well, that is a natural question for a Western man to ask, because the Western man is almost as much the "child of nature" as the Indian. But England has a first mortgage on every New Englander's character. The Western man "lifted the mortgage" when he crossed the Alleghanies. English theories of manners, English modes of thought, English religious traditions, English notions of the superlative importance of "blood" and "family," infest the intellectual atmosphere of Boston. No one escapes it. That is the reason why the West is sure to rule this country for centuries to come. As Americans drift further and further away from English influence, the West will govern the republic more and more in everything—in life and politics, because the West is the most American in its character and aims. The Yankee is a clarified Englishman. The Western man is the genuine American. The old Southerners were only English colonial country squires gone mad with provincial pride. Phillips play cards! Not that it is immoral or even improper, but English and New England culture stamps it as vulgar. Of course it is not at all vulgar in its nature, but that doesn't alter the fiat before which New England culture bows.

REP.: So! Isn't Phillips rich? Does he wear old clothes because he's penurious?

J. R.: No, sir; because he is generous. He is well off. I hav heard that his wife and he are worth from $100,000 to $200,000. That's the report; of course I never asked him. But whether he had an independent fortune or not, his fame and genius as an orator would make him well off. He has a cultivated love and critical knowledge of art, yet he has no pictures on his walls. He has all the tastes of a patrician, and yet he livs in a house that any clerk with $3,000 a year could afford. It is in Essex street—a quiet street once, but now all boarding-houses, mechanics' boarding-houses at that—or cheap retail stores. He has lived there thirty or forty years. I hav known him, I guess, about twenty-five years—since the Kansas days—and he had lived there a long time then. It is a brick house, rather narrow, of three stories and a half. His name is painted on the door, black letters, on a dark ground:

PHILLIPS.

That's all. He keeps two or three servants; and long before there was any talking about servant girls' rights he was quietly granting them, both in the form of greater leisure and higher wages. When the girl appears, if you ask whether Mr. Phillips is in, she never lies; she will say yes or no, or yes, but he is engaged. Phillips has never been guilty of the meanness of compelling his servants not only to work for their wages but to tell lies for his convenience—one of the cowardly customs America has borrowed from European domestic despotism. By the way, Ingersoll makes his servants as comfortable as the members of his own family, too. Phillips and he are not antagonistic there.

REP.: Is Phillips' house elegantly furnished?

J. R.: Far from it. When you pass the doorway, you find yourself in a narrow entry, not hall, with a door to the left—opening into a dining-room, I suppose—and at the bottom of a flight of steep stairs, with a well-worn cheap carpet on them. The stairs hav old-fashioned banisters; I think they call it "mold-candle" style. The walls of the entry are covered with a dark-greenish paper that has been there for a quarter of a century, to my recollection. Instead of the artistic or upholsteric hat-tree that you expect to see as a matter of course at the vestibule of the home of a man of taste and wealth, there is a high, old-time hat-rack, with wooden pegs, painted white long age. There is a well-worn oilcloth on the floor. Everything is as clean as it can be kept; but it occurs to you that everything there has been clean for a generation past.

REP.: Well, that looks either eccentric or mean.

J. R.: Well, Wendell Phillips is neither eccentric nor mean. He is one of the most generous and concentric men I know. The noblest men are often called eccentric because they are true to their true natures, and therefore at war with false thoughts and customs founded on them. He is one of this class. But about his home-life. You go up-stairs and land on a narrow passage and enter the front room. This is his parlor and reception-room. It is the width of the house, a medium-sized room, rather low studded. The walls are painted a yellowish-white. There is an old, cheap, but neat and not gaudy, reddish carpet on the floor. The furniture is of the old-fashioned, heavy mahogany style that you can only pick up now in auction-rooms in the East. Beneath the large, old-time mirror, between the windows, there is a table covered with books, papers, and magazines—mostly books, lying rather carelessly. The books are chiefly of political economy and political philosophy, and are all English. I don't think Phillips studies either French or German literature. Sumner regarded him as an English scholar only. In the center of the room there is a large mahogany table, with side-leaves, and it is covered in what seems inextricable confusion with books, newspapers, scores, and sometimes hundreds of letters, manuscripts, and writing paper. On the left hand side, as you enter, there is a large, heavy sofa, near the window a bust of Bowditch on a wooden pedestal made from the rafters of his house or some of his furniture. Bowditch, I believe, was a relative of Mrs. Phillips. Near the door is a tall, old-fashioned "what-not," with books on every shelf, and Brackett's bust of John Brown on the top. Opposite, on the mantel-piece over the fire-place, there is a French clock, small statuettes of Theodore Parker and John Knox, and a few tasteful ornaments. A folding-door—always closed—leads into a dark room where he keeps his library. I never saw it, so I don't know whether he has a good library or not. Between this folding-door and the door of entrance is another small table with books and a photograph portrait of John Brown. I think he has lately placed his own bust, Martin Millmore's masterpiece, in the further corner of the room. All of these busts were presents. There are no pictures on the walls. This is the best room.

REP.: Well, but why doesn't he get elegant furniture and pictures?

J. R.: I once asked him that question abont pictures. He said that when he first entered the antislavery contest, he found that poor working women would sometimes contribute as much as from three to five dollars. "Now, that amount," he added, "represented to them a whole week's hard work. I like pictures, but my taste has been sufficiently cultivated so that no line-engraving, for example, would suit me, or giv me any pleasure, that I can buy for less than one hundred dollars. In view of the sacrifices that I saw poor people make for the antislavery cause, I did not think that I had any right to spend that amount of money to gratify my taste for art." Phillips is a very cultivated person, but for an educated gentlemen he has the most complete ignoramus of a left hand I ever saw. It does not know the first thing about what his right hand doeth; but what his right hand doesn't know about giving to those whom he thinks needy isn't worth knowing. And I hav seen pictures, not in his parlor, but in the street in front of his house, that excelled any pictures of art—the surprised and grateful look of some Kansas boy whom I had introduced to him, for instance, when he found that Phillips had slipped a twenty-dollar gold-piece into his hand as he was shaking hands at parting; and no fugitive slave, or working man, or working girl, or young student, ever went away, that I ever heard of, empty-handed, or without getting such other help as he asked for, if Wendell Phillips could render it.

REP.: About his manner?

J. R.: Well, it is simply perfect, in the New England style. He instantly puts every one at his ease—runaway slave, workingman, or scholar. He charms by his grace of manner and of speech. But it is in utter contrast to Ingersoll's, whose greeting of people is distinctly Western. Phillips is the patrician always. His manner seems so simple and natural; and yet an uneducated man, for instance, somehow feels all the time that he is in the presence of one of the kings of intellect, that there is an invisible divinity that doth hedge this royal man; and he is sometimes puzzled to know why he is charmed and yet not warmed by him. Ingersoll meets every one with a heartiness and effusiveness of welcome that not only puts him at his ease but never gives him time to think that he is in the presence of a great orator—I am talking of common folks now—and it seems the most natural thing in the world for a workingman to call him Bob. Ingersoll seems to them one of themselves—only more of them in one pile—and they talk of him afterward as "a bully, good fellow." No one ever dreamed of talking of Phillips in that way, and no one would presume to talk to him in that way. And yet no one can say that Phillips is aristocratically condescending, for he isn't; nor haughty, for he is only haughty to the powerful or great oppressor of the poor; but somehow I hav often heard workingmen say that he seemed to them as if he was not one of them, and they were puzzled to understand his advocacy of their cause. He impresses them, in other words, not only with the belief that he is a greater man than they are individually, but of a different order. And their instincts are right. Phillips is a noble specimen of the American patrician, one of the purest types of it, intellectually persuaded that democracy is the divine order of government—a democrat by intellectual conviction. His blood is patrician, and blood tells. Ingersoll is a man of the people. New Englanders seem to Western folks to be a cold-blooded race; but persuade them, that is, convince their intellects that a thing is right, and they are earnest enough and generous, but never hearty in their advocacy or help of it. But they are never generous to a fault. They are always generous to a virtue. Ingersoll's face glows when he meets a friend, and he shakes hands with a warmth that delights one. Phillips is as true to his friends as any man is, but only a quiet and kind expression in his eyes reveals the fact that he regards you as a friend at all. He shakes hands with his brain, not his heart. I am not now speaking of my own relations with him—I hav many reasons to love him—but of the general impressions he so often makes on others.

REP.: Just how "blue" is Phillips' blood?

J. R.: Well, true blue, from a moral point of view, and Puritan blue from a social point of view. The first Phillips came over in the Arabella, the vessel that succeeded the Mayflower; that is, he was a passenger in the second vessel that brought emigrants to New England. There has been a clergyman in the Phillips family in every generation, and the Puritan ministers represented the highest education in the New England colonies. The grand uncle of Mr. Phillips founded Exeter Academy in New Hampshire, endowed a professorship in Dartmouth College, and made large gifts to Andover and Princeton. Samuel Phillips, the nephew of the founder of Exeter Academy, founded Phillips' Academy in Andover. During the Revolutionary war he was a member of the Provincial Congress, and afterwards he was a member of the convention that framed the Constitution of the United States. He was a state senator for twenty years, and for fifteen years he was president of the United States Senate. He was an intimate and honored friend of George Washington. But Wendell Phillips has never shone with light beyond the grave. His ancestors will be remembered on his account—not he on their account. Wendell Phillips' father was the first mayor of Boston. His great son was born in Beacon street. Beacon street was the aristocratic street, not of Boston alone but of America. But for this gift to Democracy, I think its sins, which are many, should be forgiven it.

REP.: How old is Phillips?

J. R.: Sixty-eight this very day—November 29, 1879.

REP.: Just giv me a brief sketch of his life.

J. R: He was educated at Harvard College. As a young man he was fond of boxing and out-door sports, and horses. He is one of the best judges of a blood horse to-day, although I believe he has never owned a horse; and he gave so little promise of his coming career, that he was the president of an "exclusive" society among the students known as the "Gentlemen's Club." Charles Sumner was one of his fellow-students. Mr. Phillips once told me that the future senator was a tireless worker, and that often when he and his friends would return from Fanny Kemble's readings late at night, or early in the morning, they used to see the light still burning in Sumner's windows. Mr. Sumner told me that young Phillips once said of him derisively, "Oh, yes, Sumner takes the Liberator."

Mr. Phillips studied for the law. With his ancestors' record, his social position, and his oratorical genius he seemed to hav a brilliant career before him. But when he was twenty-six years old, an event occurred which changed his career. Lovejoy was murdered at Alton, Illinois, by a mob from Missouri. He had offended the slaveholders in Missouri by publishing an antislavery paper in Illinois. When the news came to Boston that Lovejoy was shot dead in his own house in defending his own property, Dr. Channing petitioned the mayor and aldermen of Boston for the use of Faneuil Hall for a public meeting. They refused it. Dr. Channing appealed from their decision to public opinion. Influential citizens seconded Dr. Channing's demand, and then the city authorities yielded. A meeting was held in Faneuil Hall—it was what we now call an indignation meeting—and Dr. Channing and other conspicuous citizens addressed it. A feliow named Austin, the attorney-general of the state, defended the Missouri ruffians. He spoke of the slaves as wild beasts, and likened the rioters of Alton to the Boston mob who threw the tea overboard in 1773. Lovejoy, he said, was presumptuous, and died as the fool dieth. Young Phillips' blood was stirred by this speech, and he rose to reply to it. "He looked as handsome as a young Apollo," said a gentleman to me who heard Phillips make his first public speech. I published a volume of Phillips' speeches. It opened with this speech—just as his great career opened with it. You will find in it the same style and spirit that marks every oration he has made since then, classically pure in its language, and yet so plain that the most ignorant can understand it, quiet, strong, unimpassioned, abounding in philosophical intuitions and gleaming strokes of sarcasm. This maiden speech was hissed and howled at, but the mob found its master, and it was finished. He identified himself with the Garrisonian Abolitionists, and fought in their ranks like a god in the Grecian armies until slavery was abolished and the rights of the negro secured by constitutional amendment. He abandoned his ambition as a lawyer by refusing to take the oath to support the Constitution of the United States.

REP.: Why so?

J. R.: Because he adopted the Calhoun and Garrison view of the Constitution—that it supported and guaranteed slavery. An oath to support it, therefore, in his view, was an oath to uphold slavery.

I remember Ralph Waldo Emerson, speaking of Phillips, said to me about his volume of speeches, "He is a man to be heard, not read;" and again, "He ought not to be among the trumpeters." For more than a generation, it has always been easy to find Phillips' address—just ask where there was a prostrate race, or a humane cause struggling for recognition, he was always there. Next to John Brown, Phillips, I think, made the greatest sacrifices of any conspicuous leader of our times for the negro race and the American idea. And he fought as the great gods fought—without vaunting of his prowess, asking no recognition, letting smaller warriors carry off his laurels, never stopping to count his blows or recount his services. He has redeemed his class—for the rich and cultured class of New England, as a rule, are entitled to no thanks from America. They are a colony of English scholars, not American scholars, with little sympathy for the people.

REP.: Does Phillips write his lectures and speeches?

J. R.: No, or very rarely. Of course he never reads his speeches or lectures. No man can be an orator and read. Once or twice, at some great crisis in the antislavery movement, I hav known Phillips to write out his speeches, so that he might not fail to giv every argument its proper development, and that the expected mob to whom he would deliver his speech might not interfere with his plan before the vaster audience who would read it. At least, I supposed that to be the reason, but he never commits his words to memory and never takes a manuscript with him. Once I heard a Boston mob howling at him; it was after John Brown's raid at Harper's Ferry, and suddenly he leaned over and spoke in a low voice to the reporters who were seated before the platform below him. He seemed to be holding a private conversation with them. They wrote rapidly. The mob, from curiosity, ceased their howling for a moment.

"Go on," said Phillips, quietly, hardly looking up to them; "I do not need your attention; through these pencils I talk to twenty millions of people!"

The Boston mob is quick-witted, and this mob saw the point and never interrupted him again.

REP.: Has Mr. Phillips any family?

J. R.: Yes; a wife. He gives her the credit—as Ingersoll givs his wife the credit—of all the best things that he has done. But Mrs. Phillips is never seen excepting by a few intimate female friends. She has been confined to her bed by some nervous complaint ever since she was a young lady. She was an invalid, as she is now, Mr. Sumner told me, when he married her. She never leaves her room. She is a bright and highly educated lady, and as radical and earnest as her husband. Phillips' friends tell one story about her which I can repeat, as it has been once told in public. At one of the crises of the antislavery movement, as Phillips was going to the hall to make a speech, she gave her parting advice in the words, "Don't shilly-shally, Wendell!" Mrs. Stanton saw her in London after her return from her bridal tour on the continent. She wrote: "Her earnest, impressive manner arrested my attention at once. She was in the zenith of her beauty. She had a profusion of dark-brown hair, large, loving blue eyes, and regular features. She was tall, graceful, and talked with great fluency and force. Her whole soul seemed to be in the pending issue." Phillips is a devoted husband; he always dines in his wife's sick-room, and no chances to make money, however sure or however brilliant, tempt him to take long lecturing tours if the family physician thinks there is the slightest chance that Mrs. Phillips may need his presence. These facts are well known. Once he was almost persuaded by a number of young radical Republicans to become a candidate for Congress; but this consideration finally caused him to revoke his half-promise to us.

REP.: Is it true that Mr. Phillips is orthodox in religion?

J. R.: I believe he is still a nominal member of the Old South church; but I don't believe he ever goes to church—I never heard of his doing so. Of course during the antislavery contest no Abolitionist would even enter a church that sustained slovery in any way, either aggressively or by silence. I once asked Garrison, when I was quite young, what Mr. Phillips' denominational religion was. He said he really did not know; he had never once thought of asking; but he did not know a single Abolitionist who was not a Liberal, whether he was nominally a member of an orthodox church or otherwise. The reason I put this question to Mr. Garrison was because I had neard that Mr. Phillips was orthodox, and yet when I asked him for a contribution for a public library that I was collecting for the then most western Kansas town, Manhattan, he offered to buy a set of Theodore Parker's writings for it.

REP.: Now, then, what hav you to say about Phillips as an orator? How does he compare with Ingersoll?

J. R.: They don't compare; they contrast. When I was in Boston last year with Colonel Ingersoll we took a walk in the Common. A young lawyer—a friend of mine—came up, and I introduced him to the Colonel. He was quite enthusiastic over Ingersoll's lecture, delivered the night before, and he said:

"Colonel Ingersoll, I must say I never heard an orator equal to you, except Wendell Phillips."

That was considered, of course, the very highest eulogy that a Boston man could make on any orator.

"Well," said Ingersoll, taking the cigar out of his mouth, "I don't consider that any compliment at all. Wendell Phillips is no more an orator than a mathematician is a poet."

That young man was like the rich man in the parable in one respect—he went away sorrowing.

I would not mention this incident, but it was too good to keep, and it spread over Boston, although it never got into the papers; but afterward when Ingersoll, in Boston, ridiculed the belief that Milton and Dante were poets, it created no surprise, because nothing then seemed to the "literary fellows" too absurd for him to say in audacious criticism of authors, whether secular or sacred.

Ingersoll, as I understand him, regards all true oratory and true poetry as an exalted expression of the passions and emotions of human nature. Outside of that range you may hav able arguers or able narrators in speech, or able historians and able painters in verse, but because they are outside of that sacred circle they are not orators or poets in any true sense of the word. He spoke contemptuously of Milton as a word carpenter. After all, you see, Ingersoll's seeming absurdity is simply a question of definition. Now, Mr. Phillips never appeals to the emotions. To him the public in a democracy is the Supreme Court of Opinion, and he addresses its intellect only. He is never moved and he never moves, but he is convinced and he converts. He talks as quietly on the platform as if he were speaking in a parlor. He rarely changes more than a few feet from the spot where he first stood, and his gestures are as quiet as his elocution. He never raises his voice loudly, although it is easily heard in the largest hall. Horace Greeley once said that he supposed no young man ever heard Phillips speak without thinking that he could talk just as well without any trouble. Other young critics, who hav not yet found out that it is the lightning and not the thunder that kills, hav sometimes expressed the wish that Phillips would "just let himself out once," and show what he could do. His art is so perfect that it seems to be nature; hence it was often undervalued. I hav even heard intelligent, grown-up men, chiefly Abolitionists, compare him with Garrison as an orator.

REP.: What was the difference between Garrison and Phillips as orators?

J. R.: The difference between a strong, clear, and earnest speaker—that Garrison was—and an eloquent and masterly and gifted orator; the difference between a stout cudgel in the hands of an honest citizen and a Damascus blade in the hands of a master of fence.

REP.: As a lecturer?

J. R.: His lecture on the "Lost Arts," which he has never written, has been delivered for over thirty years, and it is still as popular and in as much demand as ever. It is what newspaper men call a "gossipy resumé" of curious knowledge about arts that the ancients knew and that we can neither rival nor revive. He has another lecture called "Street Life in Europe," a little out of date now in some passages, but just such an account of certain phases of European civilization as a cultivated gentleman with a democratic creed would make in his own home in speaking about his travels to his friends. His lecture on "Toussaint L'Ouverture" was his masterpiece until he delivered his lecture on Daniel O'Connell. "Toussaint L'Ouverture" is a masterly portraiture. It shows a great power of grasping and grouping innumerable and isolated facts, and making a vivid historical picture from them. I happened to hav made a study of Haytian history, and perhaps I am more inclined on that account to put a higher value on this lecture than on some others—the "Lost Arts," for example, which is far more popular. But Phillips' masterpiece, in my opinion, as a literary lecture, was "Daniel O'Connell." I remember I called on him one day and found a number of books on Irish history lying on his table. He was announced to lecture for a Roman Catholic society that night. I called to ask that a report might be made of it. He said there was no use doing it, as he would only try to talk an hour for the benefit of an Irish society, and a Catholic priest had given him a few dates and references. He evidently did not think the lecture would amount to much. I went and heard it. It was delivered to an exclusively Irish audience. Now, to show O'Connell's genius in organization and as an agitator, he had to describe his materials—practically, at that time, an aggregation of impracticable, hot-headed, and quarrelsome semi-barbarians. It would not do to say quarrelsome, for example, to these Irish auditors, but he managed to delight them and yet make his point by talking of their fathers as the "quicksilver-blooded" race. He praised Martin Luther in his speech to these Catholics without offending either the clerical or lay listeners; and he extolled O'Connell for contemptuously sending back the American contributions to the "rent"—when the great agitator told them to keep it and free their slaves—to these Democrats who had denounced O'Connell for doing that very thing; and yet Phillips delighted them. Phillips, like Greeley, has always been very friendly to the Irish and very popular with them despite his Abolitionism. Phillips, in describing O'Connell's genius, for the first and only time I hav happened to hear him or of him—and I hav heard him scores of times—warmed into enthusiasm. Other orators, he said, could touch one note or two notes or three notes, but this man swept the entire octave of human emotions and sympathies. But it was as an antislavery orator that Phillips' power was shown or seen to best advantage. "Eloquence used to be dog cheap at antislavery conventions;" but Phillips, among all this eloquence, was conspicuous like a Henry of Navarre or a Saul among the people.

REP.: Mr. Phillips is as strong an advocate of total abstinence and women's rights as he was of abolition?

J. R.: Yes, and his arguments for both of these movements are as lucid, strong, masterly, and unimpassioned as his speeches on slavery. In his antislavery pleas he drew no pictures of the horrors of slave life; he made no appeals to the emotions, although the topic seemed to compel such a treatment of it; and in his arguments in favor of prohibition he is silent as to the sorrows that intemperance brings to the home of the drunkard's family. Although you hav heard him denounced as a fanatic a thousand times, you will find it impossible, after public passion has been stilled, to quote a single sentence that any reasonable man would accept as a proof of his fanaticism. He is always a philosophic orator. The first speech he ever made on women's rights embodies the entire argument for it. Sumner said to me when I remarked that while the South and the democracy had vehemently abused him for his famous oration, "The Crime against Kansas," not one of their representatives had ever attempted to answer it. "Yes, for that speech is one that the French style sans repliqué: it cannot be refuted." The same remark is true of Phillips' speeches. Harriet Beecher Stowe pays Phillips a just and noble tribute for his services to women. "On the 15th and 16th of October, 1857," she writes, "Mr. Phillips offered at a convention held at Worcester, a series of resolutions in relation to the political rights of women which cover all the ground contended for by modern reformers. His speech on that occasion is one of the most able and eloquent on record, and forms a part of the permanent literature of the movement. He speaks of womanhood with a solemn and religious earnestness, with the fervor of knightly times, and pleads against all customs and laws which bear hardly upon her delicate organization, which mislead her from following her highest aspirations."

Mrs. Stowe tells two anecdotes that I would like you to quote.

REP.: Well, let's hav them.

J. R.: "An anecdote in circulation about Mr. Phillips," she writes, "shows that he not only held such theories but that he was helpful in practice. It is so in keeping with his general character as to be extremely probable. Notwithstanding the unpopularity of his abolition sentiments, Mr. Phillips' power as an orator was such that when lecturing on ordinary subjects he commanded the very highest prices in the literary market. On one of his tours he met in the cars a woman who was seeking a self-supporting career as a lecturer. Mr. Phillips inquired into her success, and found that independent of her expenses she made at the rate only of five dollars a time. He declared that such an inequality with his own success was an injustice, and added that he must beg her to allow him to equalize the amount for once by accepting the proceeds of his last lecture.

"Mr. Phillips," she continues, "had a way of making his fame and reputation gain him a hearing on the unpopular subject which he had most at heart. Committees from anxious lyceums used to wait on him for his terms, sure of being able to fill a house by his name.

"'What are your terms, Mr. Phillips?'

"'If I lecture on antislavery, nothing. If on any other subject, one hundred dollars.'"

Mr. Phillips, by the way, has always been very generous in his dealings with lyceums and managers. No lecturer more so.

A Soliloquy.

And has it come to this that I, who was born in Boston, and within twenty miles of Concord, where Emerson dwells, and where his expounder and protector, and the friend and admirer of brother Joseph Cook, the venerable Bronson Alcott, breathes breath, should be thus treated? That I, who launched the National Liberal League upon the stormy ocean of thought, and rigged her out with masts, yards, and sails, and commanded her for two years, should be deprived of my position as captain, and all my mates, purser, and other subordinates removed from office, and our places filled by pirates and buccaneers? Only think of it, that Elizur Wright, whom I hav honored and trusted, and permitted to giv liberally of his means to keep the craft afloat, should go over to the pirates and actually consent to take my place on the quarter-deck! Who would hav believed that when I lifted my Index finger and pointed out the path of duty to my leaguers, a scrub of no culture, and not born within a thousand miles of where I first saw the light, should hav the impudence to push my finger aside, and point his in another direction? That my subscribers should tire of reading my cultured articles, and those of my contributors, and prefer to read the coarse articles of that rascally TRUTH SEEKER, which Bennett had the sublime impudence to set up so near the Hub of the universe? Only think that since the efforts which Bro. Bundy and myself hav made to protect our own chastity and that of our subscribers, by exposing Bennett's abortive attempt to harm the chastity of an innocent child of nature in her teens, our friends should so poorly appreciate what we hav done! Why, I sent out at great expense five thousand extra copies of the Index exposing Bennett's errors, expecting five thousand replies of the press applauding me for my conduct in the interests of chastity; but instead of cursing Bennett they pretty much all curse me for a knave or a fool, and send in the names of hundreds of new subscribers to his infamous and uncultured sheet! James Parton, upon whom I used to smile, he too goes so far into the apostasy with Elizur Wright as to call Bennett a martyr!

I confess my conscience does giv me a bite now and then on the scorner of consistency, for it is true that Bennett is in prison for a crime he did not commit, and this looks like persecution, and even martyrdom. "Cupid's Yokes" is a foolish book, but not obscene; and the mailing of it is not a violation of the postal laws, as the United States attorney-general has declared. I was also tremendously bothered the other day when one of my lady correspondents in New Hampshire asked me in a letter why I took such "serene pleasure" in Bennett's imprisonment, when I admitted he had done nothing to justify Benedict in sending him to prison. But those love-letters! How it harrows my soul, and Bro. Bundy's, and Bro. Tuttle's, that our chastity should be assailed and imperiled by such doings! It was mean, I admit, to publish private letters gotten by a bribe, and by ruining the reputation of a woman, but we did it in the interest of chastity, and to kill off old Bennett, and little did we think that for this dirty work we should all get from the public more kicks than coppers.

I wish to thunder I could lasso that man Leland of New York and send him to keep company with Bennett at Albany. People even here in Boston hav the indecency to call him the revelator. He has found out Freelove sentiments in the writings of our divine Emerson; and, O ye gods! in a speech and resolutions of one of my lady contributors to the Index. Besides this—was ever a chaste and cultured man so tried—I scent defections in the Free Religious Association. Adler don't liv in Boston sanctified by the presence of Joseph Cook and myself. He livs in New York, and I suspect has caught the contagion of THE TRUTH SEEKER! He may be Felix, but he has made me infelix. I must go off again into a minority, and that of one. I guess there is some intention to propagate obscenity, and I can hav nothing more to do with it. The Free Religious gold looks very much like the genuine article, but I suspect there are many counterfeits, else why should they all hav the presumption to differ with me? Well, if it were not a sin for a saint to swear, I would be tempted to say, Damn the whole set, Free Religionists and Liberal Leaguers; they seem to be degenerating into a Sodom which will bring down fire and brimstone as soon as Bro. Bundy, Bro. Tuttle, and myself, with the savor of godliness that attaches to our persons, will leave it to its fate. The switches are all misplaced! Is life worth living? Hey! my young men, fetch me my meerschaum and a match. There is no obscenity in that.

Christian Morality.

The teachers of the "Word" change not. St. Paul is considered quite an eminent "divine," and so is Chancellor Crosby; at any rate their teachings are wonderfully alike. For instance, Paul queries:

"For if the truth of God hath more abounded through my LIE unto his glory, why yet am I also judged as a sinner?"

At the meeting of Comstock's society on the 16th ult., Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., Chancellor of the New York University, gave utterance to a sentiment that proves him to be no unworthy successor to Paul. We doubt whether his conversion was as sudden as Paul's, but it is of the same kind. He says:

"Deceiving them! I tell you, gentlemen, I believe in deceit. I believe in deceit wherever you hav got a rightful enemy to destroy. Could you carry on a war without deceit? Are you to tell your enemy everything you are going to do? Wherever you hav a rightful enemy, and hav a right under God to destroy him, you hav a right to deceive him."

We would like to ask the learned and respectable body of officers of the University what they think of this code of ethics. Are such morals taught in that institution? We would especially inquire of Professor John W. Draper, who fills the chair of Chemistry and Natural Philosophy with so much ability, whether he is aware of the high stand taken by the Chancellor of the University in religious morals? Do the other officers and instructors know what the Chancellor teaches? If so, do they sanction it? Do Professors Johnson, Post, Martin, Baird, John C. Draper, Henry Draper, Loomis, Weisse, Elsberg, Stevenson, Arnold, Howe, and all the other forty officers and instructors, approve of Crosby's improvement on St. Paul? We should hope that in the hour devoted to reading the Scriptures and praying, the students are not confined to the teachings of Paul, for it seems to us that Romans iii, 7, is a guide only for some college of Jesuits; and the question naturally arises, Did Crosby get his moral education in such a college? Such teachings remove all restraints upon the actions of men. "The end justifies the means," and let such men as Comstock and Crosby be persuaded in their own narrow minds that they are right, and that, under God, they hav a right to destroy the enemy, they are justified and should be commended in resorting to any device, however dishonest and despicable, in destroying that enemy; that teaching breeds the spy, buys up the hypocrite, and givs rise to a class that brings government into disrepute, and finally makes the excuse for overturning it altogether. Laws which only religious organizations care to enforce may safely be disregarded. Such are enacted only for the benefit to be derived from them by the church. They are drawn with the craftiness which catches with guile, and enforced only by spying religious pretenders, who commit crimes infinitely worse than those they entrap.

There is no deeper student of history than Professor John W. Draper, of this University. No one knows better than he the blighting influence of Jesuitism upon science, art, morals, education, and civilization; yet the Chancellor of the University of which he is an instructor is preaching doctrines and enunciating views as subversive of all true morals, and must ultimately be as great a hindrance to the development of society, as any Loyola, the broken-down knight, ever propagated. The curse of France has alighted on our shores and found a home in the New York University. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., is its public protector and defender. Gentlemen of the University, how do you like the moral teachings of your Chancellor? Parents who send your sons to this college, how do you like the morals taught there?

Students, do you wish to guide your life by the principle of deceit? If there were no teachers but Chancellor Crosby, every young man graduating from that college would be an arrant hypocrite, coming out with a diploma for lying in his pocket, signed by a faculty of liars. The course for the Freshman class would be: First term—The Elementary Principles of Deceit; second term—What is a Rightful Enemy under God; third term—Prevaricating by Correct Principles. Junior class, first term—Natural and Intellectual Capacity for Deceiving; second term—Principles of Downright Deceiving; third term—Lectures on Logical Lying. Senior class, first term—The Moral System of Anthony Comstock, illustrated with Living Models from Greene street; second term—Who are the Constitutional Liars? third term—International Lying, and the Connections of Sacred and Profane Liars. The right kind of a faculty would be Anthony Comstock and Howard Crosby, with Samuel Colgate for Medical Director. That college would receive all the church people's sons. Any one desiring a first-class education as a Jesuit would certainly attend. By a diligent application to study, the students would in time become as proficient as Comstock, and could take his place when in the course of time he lays down his cross and goes to join Loyola in heaven. We recommend this change to Crosby if he wishes to raise up a generation which shall not disgrace his teaching by having a modicum of honesty about them.

Circulate the Petitions.

The petition on the last page of this paper explains itself There is no use of Liberals sitting down supinely and having their liberties taken from them by the shallow jesuitical trick of pretended obscenity. One of the best of our number is to-day incarcerated because of his Infidelity, for he had violated no law of the land. It is for the repeal of this law, which is so construed that physiological pamphlets, when sold by Liberal publishers but not otherwise, are deemed obscene. If these laws were enforced impartially they could never hav stood as long as they hav, for the united press of the country would ere this hav demanded their repeal. But when applied, as they hav been, to Liberal publishers alone, the religious press uphold them, while the secular papers will not trouble themselves about them till they are indicted.

This repeal is asked not from any sympathy whatever with dealers in prohibited matter. The sentiments of Liberals in that subject are given by Col. Ingersoll's resolution at the Cincinnati Convention, in which he says:

Resolved, That we are utterly opposed to the dissemination, through the mails or by any other means, of obscene literature, whether "inspired" or uninspired, and hold in measureless contempt its authors and disseminators.

We ask for the repeal because the laws are unconstitutional, oppressive, and are so stretched by those who hav made it their business to enforce them that the most cruel injustice has been done, and by their distorted enforcement the liberty of the press and mail has been abridged. This law is a usurpation of power by Congress, and was passed at the instance of Comstock, backed by the professional lobbyist, Parson Newman, and the Young Men's Christian Association. The states never delegated to Congress any authority in regard to the mails except to establish post roads and regulate the number of pounds, etc., to be carried. The meaning of mailed matter has nothing to do with the post-office. There is no necessity of the service that is subserved by this law, and it therefore has no support in the grant of the Constitution. In 1836, when the attempts were made to exclude Abolition documents from the mails, Henry Clay said:

When I saw that the exercise of a most extraordinary and dangerous power had been announced by the head of the post-office, and that it had been sustained by the President's message, I turned my attention to the subject and inquired whether it was necessary that the general government should under any circumstances exercise such a power, and whether they possessed it. After much reflection, I hav come to the conclusion that they could not pass any law interfering with the subject in any shape or form whatever. The evil complained of was the circulation of papers having a certain tendency. The papers, unless circulated, and while in the post-office, could do no harm; it is the circulation solely—the taking out of the mail and the use to be made of them—that constitutes the evil. Then it is perfectly competent to the state authorities to apply the remedy. The instant that a prohibited paper is handed out, whether to a citizen or to a sojourner, he is subject to the laws which compel him either to surrender or burn it.

Regarding the same thing the Hon. John Davis said:

It would be claiming on the part of government a monopoly—an exclusive right either to send such papers as it pleased or to deny the privilege of sending them through the mail. Once establish the precedent, and where will it lead to? The government may take it into its head to prohibit the transmission of political, religious, or even moral or philosophical publications, in which it might fancy there was something offensive; and under this reserved right, contended for in this report, it would be the duty of the government to carry it into effect.

Obscenity is one of the hardest words in the world to define. The insertion of the word "immoral" in this law renders it very ambiguous. If all immoral literature is to be excluded, we must hav some other than a partisan definition of the word. It is under state laws that obscenity is a crime and should be punished. The Federal government possesses no power to institute inquisitorial jurisdiction over the moral quality of the mails.

Our readers are already well acquainted with the outrageous interpretation of this law, whereby the editor of this paper now lies, sick and helpless, in Albany Penitentiary. They know too the despicable character of the tyrant who placed him there. No argument is needed to induce them to sign and circulate this petition. It should be done at once, that Congress, which already has before its Committee on Postal Matters a bill to make much worse if possible the laws already upon the statute books, may take the matter into consideration. This new bill was submitted by P. M. Key, at the instigation of Anthony Comstock, and that worthy has been invited to go before the committee and plead his case. Prompt measures should be taken to destroy his influence. Perhaps a petition, signed by a few thousand citizens, may do it. At all events, let us try. When the petitions are signed send them in to the National Defense Association, 141 Eighth street, New York city.

Jehovah Impeached.

R. C. Flower, of Alliance, Ohio, lectured Wednesday evening, Jan. 28th, in Science Hall, this city, on "The Bible Jehovah." In this lecture Mr. Flower arraigns the Bible Jehovah at the bar of reason, and impeaches him as a coward and a falsifier, a fiend, woman's most deadly enemy, the ravisher of virgins, and the murderer of innocents.

The lecturer commenced by saying that he would not intentionally misrepresent any one, still less God, for it was bad enough to be a God without being slandered or libeled. He hoped there would be no laughing, for God never could take a joke without getting mad, and it would be like one of his old tricks to strike dead one half of the audience for having a little fun. He knew if what he said and was going to say about God should turn out to be false that he would be pretty apt to get a long sentence from the old gentleman when the time came. But if he proved his charges against the Bible God, he hoped they would not get mad at this but at God.

He first showed that God was not competent to dispense justice; that he always, according to the Bible, punished the innocent and rewarded the guilty. When he spoke of Sarah, Abraham's wife—a beautiful blonde—playing sister, there was loud laughter.

He claimed that Jehovah was a falsifier in his pretensions to superior wisdom. He reviewed the creation, God's first and only attempt at farming, and the swindling job he put up on the children of Israel in the ark transaction, which abounded with wit, ridicule, and sarcasm, and was loudly and frequently applauded. He said: "I do not say there is no God. There may be a hundred for all I know; but I do not believe that the God who created this universe—if a God created it—whose smiles are the birth of worlds, whose tears are the morning dews, whose sobs are thunders, and whose shadows are the soothing drapery of night, ever came down to Mt. Sinai before breakfast, with fire and smoke streaming out of his mouth, and got into a little box two feet one way and three feet the other—called the ark—to tell Moses how to skin a calf. I hav so far departed from Christian credulity that I cannot believe it."

He reviewed God's political career, showed that he failed in politics as in everything else; that God killed Saul because Saul had too kind a heart to kill some innocent men and helpless women; that God never could endure a kind-hearted man, and that he made David king in the place of Saul. David was a murderer, a ravisher of women, and a coward, but God always fancied such men.

The speaker next charged that the Bible Jehovah was a rapist, a libertine. He showed from the Bible that on one occasion God stole a man's wife, used her as his mistress, and then because she smiled on a passer-by, God had her exhibited naked in the streets of Jerusalem, and finally burned. "This is the God," he said, "they want me to love and believe in, and say I will go to hell if I don't. This is the Bible God, the God the churches worship, and the God the clergy are trying to put into the Constitution; and for my part, I would rather go to hell and liv with a half-way respectable devil than to go to heaven and liv with this Bible God."

He next read from Isaiah, where God commanded some young virgins to strip themselves and exhibit their nude persons to him, and that God said the day would come when one would arise in a new world who would do as he had done, and that he should be his son. He then brought up the case of Anthony Comstock inducing certain young ladies to exhibit their nude persons to him to establish the relationship of father and son. At this point there was cries of "Here, here," and loud applause. [A voice from the audience, "That's what Anthony Comstock did."] "But," said the speaker, "I hav some charity for Anthony Comstock, for his father (God) did so before him."

He next showed that God would make laws (according to the Bible), and then by writing letters, or other ways, induce innocent citizens to break them; that this was what Anthony Comstock had done; that there had never lived but two creatures low and vile enough to do such a thing, and that these two creatures were father and son—the Bible God and the Christian Comstock. Here Mr. Flower related an old Syrian fable so applicable to Comstock that it called forth loud applause and laughter.

He next arraigned and impeached the Jehovah as woman's most deadly enemy. This was the hardest on God of all the indictments, and was the most loudly applauded. Mr. Flower stated that he had written Anthony Comstock a letter that day, inviting him to attend the lecture, in which he informed him that he would show from the Bible that he (Comstock) was the only son the Bible God ever had; but he presumed that Comstock, like his father, had business in heaven or somewhere else.

He next defended his picture of God, which caused much laughter. He next contrasted God and the devil, showing that God never did a good thing, and that the devil never did anything very bad (according to the Bible). He offered one hundred dollars to any minister who would point out one deed of love the Bible God ever did. He said it made cowards out of men to worship the old Bible Jehovah, and if they took very much stock in him they became cruel.

He said if his position was correct (that the Bible Jehovah was a myth) that the Bible creation must be mythical also; and if the creation be a fable, then the fall of man must be a myth, the atonement a fraud, everlasting hell a myth of religious invention, and the personal devil a myth of priestly invention, neither of which had even been patented; that the entire bottom of Christendom falls through; that the bottom had fallen out of hell, out of the atonement, and that God and the devil were dead, but surviving all these wrecks beneath the smiling heavens blossoming with stars, in a land and age of progress above the ashes of dead deities, man in his glory remained.

He closed by saying: "I know of nothing higher to follow than my reason. You may hear and read of gods many and lords many, but you will find nothing higher than reason. Labor to make this world beautiful, for it is your earthly habitation. See that your home is your throne, your wife your queen; that you liv in love, deep in the hearts of your children forever.

"For

"'Such a life of work and duty,
Such a life of love and beauty'

will aid you in leaving the world better than you found it. And when proud nature shall transplant you from the sunset cares of age into a blossoming world of higher life—where angels sing throughout the seasons—the God to follow is human reason. You will then find that the pilot of the mind, the hope of the soul, the king of kings and lord of lords, is human reason.

Mr. Flower intends lecturing extensively this season, and can be addressed at his home.

R. C. MITCHELL, editor of the Duluth Tribune, was refused a continuation of his office as Land Register because of his heresy. So many letters were written to President Hayes by Mitchell's religious opponents that the President was afraid to reappoint him, although no one had ever administered the office better. Our government seems to be run by the church at present.

Mr. Parton's Monthly Benefaction.

DEAR TRUTH SEEKER: Here I am again with my monthly pittance, which I trust will find you in good courage. Every week brings new proof of the necessity of standing by Mr. Bennett to the uttermost and to the end. It has become the first duty of an American citizen. Nothing can be plainer than that the spirit of the old persecutors is active among us to-day. I do not refer to such persons as Cook, whose truly hellish utterances you gave us a week or two since. He appears to be an insolent ruffian, bound to thrive by flattering and frightening the Boston provincials. But I confess I was surprised at the remarks attributed to Dr. Crosby in your last number. In private life (as a human being pure and simple) Dr. Crosby is one of the most amiable and generous of men. His engaging traits make him the favorite of every circle he frequents. That he should join in this shameless abuse of an innocent man—a prisoner, who cannot defend himself—fills me with sorrow. It is another proof of the infernal nature of the ideas against which Mr. Bennett waged war, and it enables me to understand how Voltaire felt when he ended his letters with, "Crush the Monster!" I will not believe that Dr. Crosby knows the facts of this case. Yours, very truly,

JAMES PARTON.

A Suggestion from Prof. Rawson

WHICH WAS CARRIED OUT ERE IT WAS MADE.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I was one of the audience at the Sixth Annual Meeting of "The New York Society for the (Manufacture and the) Suppression of Vice," better known as "Comstock's Vice Society," and wish to call attention to a single incident in the proceedings because of its importance in an educational sense.

Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., is Chancellor of the University of the City of New York, and as such it may be presumed he exerts a great influence over the minds of the young men who are being trained in its classes, and, it may also be presumed, a peculiarly strong influence over the minds of the students of divinity. Whatever principles and practices he may advocate, therefore, are worthy of note, since they are likely to affect the well being of many young men who are being fitted for the ministry, and through them the people to whom they may minister.

The managers of that Society met on the Saturday previous to the annual meeting to arrange the programme, and therefore whatever was done at the annual meeting may be assumed as having been deliberately and not hastily done.

Dr. Crosby, following the other speakers, said, among other things: "I believe in deceit when you hav a rightful enemy to destroy. . . . Whenever you hav a rightful enemy . . . you hav a right to deceive him." "If my face," said he, with a chuckling grin, "were not so well known, I would not hesitate to go into any den of vice in this city, if by going I could bring the keeper to justice."

THE TRUTH SEEKER would do well, it seems to me, to inquire of the professors of the University how far they indorse Dr. Crosby's sentiments as to deceit, and if they adopt that principle, or rather want of principle, in their practice as teachers, and also to inquire of parents and guardians who hav trusted their sons to that institution for instruction, if they are content to hav that pernicious rule of action instilled into the minds of their young men, who, if they adopt the lesson, must ever after play the hypocrite in society while pretending to liv and act honorably and uprightly.

This is a serious matter, and one that I hope will arouse the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER to action. However excellent a man Dr. Crosby may be as a preacher of the gospel, he will be no longer useful as an instructor of young men who are expected to become teachers and leaders in society, and who, if they should adopt the practice of deceit advocated by him, would mislead their hearers and associates to degradation and ruin.

A. L. RAWSON,
Pres. Nat. Def. Ass'n.

Prosperity of Minnesota.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Within the limits of a letter I must be content to speak in general terms. Minnesota holds the balance of power of the great agricultural and commercial interests of the Northwest. In now stands in the front rank as a wheat-producing state. In manufacturing interests it will crowd the New England states to the wall. The tide of emigration is not spasmodic, like that of Kansas, but a regular, steady stream. The first settlement of this territory was in 1826, but the flood did not set in until 1850, at which time there was a population of 5,330. Ten years later it was 172,022. Five years afterward it doubled its population of 172,022. It is still rapidly advancing. Wheat, rye, barley, oats, buckwheat, potatoes, sweet potatoes, beans, hemp lint, flax lint, sorghum, and hay yield well—several of the productions better than most other states in the Union. Kansas and Illinois surpass it in corn and Michigan in fruit. The hardier fruits do finely. Sheep-raising is successful to a remarkable degree. Manufacturing facilities are not equaled in the world. The water power of the Mississippi river at St. Anthony's Falls equals the whole water-power of England and Scotland. Then there are the falls of the St. Louis river, twenty-five miles from where it empties into Lake Superior. Next are the St. Croix falls. The saints in an early day had an eye out for this heavenly land, but the sinners hav encroached upon the saintly territory as usual. The saints evidently desired to remain as near the upper heaven, too, as possible, for Minnesota is the highest land in all America. If we were proud and supercilious we could look down on all the sister states of the nation. But we are fraternal and good-natured, and so by lake, river, and railroad are on friendly terms and communicating routes with all the world.

Educational institutions are in a flourishing condition. The most elegant normal school I ever saw is in Winona. Some of our principal cities are Minneapolis, St. Paul, Winona, Rochester, Mankato, Hastings, Red Wing, Fairbanks, Northfield, St. Cloud, Stillwater, Lake City, Wabasha, St. Charles, Owatonna, and Duluth.

I will close this series of sketches with a few references to

LAKE CITY, MINN.

This is our home. Thirty years ago Indians fished in the lakes and brooks. Jacob Boody made a claim in 1853. The next year John Boody and Abner Dwelle staked out their claims. Mr. Dwelle chose what is now the lower part of the little city, and of him I made my purchase. The town is handsomely situated on a plateau which extends back to the bluffs from one to five miles, and above the level of Lake Pepin from fifty to one hundred and fifty feet, an enterprising young town, with city airs. This will be my summer resort, and in my declining years my harbor of rest, for, take it all in all, I no not expect to see its like again. If I could hav the proof of the existence of a summer land beyond the clouds, as I once thought I had, desirable to dwell in, I would be willing to emigrate by and by. Doubtless such a land, if there could be a spiritual habitation, might answer the description which the poet has given of Lake City:

"Dame Nature once in playful mood
Stepped from her favorite haunt, the wood.
When slowly in the gorgeous West
The sun was sinking to his rest,
And, wandering over hill and dale,
She came upon a lovely vale,
Which, long forgotten, there had lain,
A portion of her vast domain.
One side was skirted by a lake,
The other bounds high hills did make.
She clapped her hands, and cried in glee.
'On this bright spot a town shall be!'
And stretching forth her magic wand,
She gave new beauties to the land.
A hillock here, a streamlet there,
Were added, each with wondrous care;
The whole she crowned with native grace.
That men of worth might seek the place
And build a town by means of art
Where she had done such lavish part."

A Correction.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I read in the TRUTH SEEKER of Jan. 24th, under the head of "Liberal News Items," an item in reference to the organization of a Liberal League in Detroit, which says, "I have just learned that S. B. McCracken of the above-named city is moving to perfect such an organization." Grateful to Mr. McCracken for all he has done or may do in this Liberal movement, I wish to correct the impression that he was the prime mover. Feeling that it is but justice to give the credit where it is due, I wish to state that Mr. H. Jacobson, of Detroit, an earnest worker in the Liberal ranks, was the one who made the first move in that direction; and, through his efforts, first set the ball rolling. Others then came to the front ready to put their shoulders to the wheel and aid in the good work, Mr. McCracken with others; but to Mr. H. Jacobson is due the thanks for this Liberal movement in Detroit, which I hope and believe will be made a grand success.

Extracts from "Superstition in All Ages."

BY B. O. FENTON.

I propose to giv a few brief extracts from this masterly book. "That which serves as a basis for all religion is very uncertain," says John Meslier. "The existence of a God is the basis of all religion. Few people seem to doubt this existence, but this fundamental principle is precisely the one which prevents every mind from reasoning. The first question of every catechism was and always will be the most difficult to answer." Is there any doubt about this? "The universe is not an effect, it is the cause of all effects; all the beings it embraces are the necessary effects of this cause which sometimes shows to us its manner of acting, but which often hides from us its way." Isn't this unanswerable?

"The logic of common sense teaches us that we should judge a cause but by its effects. A cause cannot be reputed as constantly good except when it constantly produces good, useful, and agreeable effects." Will any one of common sense dispute this? I attempt to giv only brief extracts so the numerous readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER can get a fair but faint idea of this work which you all ought to own. It is just the work for Liberals to lend to all people, especially Catholics.

"All religions agree in exalting the wisdom and the infinite power of the divinity, but as soon as they expose his conduct we discover but imprudence, want of foresight, weakness, and folly." Is this not true?

"Philosophers in all ages hav taken the part that seemed destined for the ministers of religion. The hatred of the latter for philosophy was never more than professional jealousy." Is not this true?

"Where there are no relations there can be no union, no correspondence, no duties. If there are no duties between man and his God, there exists no religion for man." Self-evident; he uses up the "free will" doctrine and takes the hide straight off from old Jehovah.

"Deliberation," says he, "is the necessary effect of the uncertainty in which we find ourselves with reference to the results of our actions." Again, "The less enlightenment and reason men possess the more zeal they exhibit for their religion." Strictly true.

"Priests in all times hav shown themselves supporters of despotism, and the enemies of public liberty. Their profession requires vile and submissive slaves who never hav the audacity to reason." Strictly true.

"Pride and vanity always were and always will be the inherent vices of the priesthood."

I will stop quoting. Any one can see by these few quotations that Meslier was a thinker. Doubtless most of the readers of THE TRUTH SEEKER saw in that paper of date January 10, 1880, an article from me which contains my views on that work. I want to ascertain where "The Life of John Meslier," by Voltaire, can be had. Please reply, Mr. Editor, and oblige a friend.

I think that the Catholic element is growing stronger and stronger every year in this our free (?) America. I think it is a matter that ought to receive the attention of the Liberals, and at once. We know their history, and from knowing it we have reason to fear their power. There is a fine article in THE TRUTH SEEKER of January 10th, by "H. W. B.," on the Catholic question. The Catholics are bloodthirsty and despotic tyrants. I think for a general thing we do not try hard enough to enlighten them. Let us try to elevate their condition by lending them books, papers, tracts, etc. This is the best way I know of to Liberalize the deluded Catholics.

Just One Word.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Mr. Truesdell says to Mr. Morrison: "As no new or improved system of banking has been proposed by any of our acknowledged economists, not by you, Mr. Morrison, or any of your soft money friends, the question at issue appears to be, Shall we maintain the present safe, economical, well-tried national bank system, or drop back into the old, extravagant, dangerous way of banking under the conflicting state laws?"

There! Could assumption go further? What, in the name of common sense, has the greenbacker's demand—that the issuance of the circulating medium be restored to the nation (to whom it rightly belongs)—got to do with banks of discount? Are there not thousands of banks in the country which are not national banks? The question is not, "Shall we return to the old wild-cat banking system?" All this hue and cry about such being the case is mere demagogic clap-trap to deafen the people to the voice of truth; it is gull's seed scattered to entrap the unwary. There would be just as much truth and just as much sense in saying that the man who should advocate the self-binding as superior to the hand-raking reaper wanted to go back and use the cradle or sickle.

Why should the nation not issue the paper money as well as the gold and silver money? Shall we accuse you of wanting to go back to some remote past and allow each individual to coin money because you are not in favor of delegating its coinage to some corporation? Bah! Has it come to this that Liberals cannot discuss a question without making such uncalled-for wild statements as has Mr. Truesdell in the paragraph quoted and in others of the same tenor? Just see how actively he conjures up the past in the next paragraph. Nicely done, but it won't deceive anybody. No, friends of justice, the question he states as the issue before us is nothing of the kind—don't come within a thousand miles of it. Who believes it?

Yours for facts, E. C. WALKER.

Creation According to Moses and According to Geology.

BY PROF. DENTON.

Let agitation come—who fears? We need a flood; the filth of years has gathered round us. We liv in the nineteenth century, when science has appeared knocking at every door—not excepting the church door—flashing light into dark corners where bigotry and superstition hide in spite of the hooting of the owls and bats that inhabit them. There is no use in hiding, for science carries a lamp that makes day of the blackest night. She dives and scrutinizes the foundations. Heaven is not too high for her, nor can the scorching fires of hell keep her out. We can no longer hide theological questions in the dark. They must come up to the bar in this day of judgment that has at last made its appearance. We can no longer say we believe these things because they were taught us in our infancy, and because our fathers believed them, and the doctors still stand by them. Truth is the first requisite now, and however sacred old teachings are, they shall not prevent the strictest scrutiny; nay, the more sacred a thing professes to be, the more necessity for a thorough examination; and the question of the Bible must come up for consideration along with the rest. We are told that this is a book written by the Infinite Spirit himself, or by men whom he infallibly inspired to write his will for the instruction of ignorant mankind. Is this indeed so? Then it must be the most wonderful book the eye of man ever beheld? What may we not expect if the infinite spirit of all worlds and of the infinite universe has actually written a book for our instruction! What a book that must be! It must be as superior to any book man could write as the revolving heavens are superior to the orreries by which we attempt to imitate their movements. What might we not expect with regard to the knowledge of the universe? Perchance it will tell us the story of the stars, and reveal the origin of man, in such a way that we can clearly see its perfect unity with all that science has revealed. It must be in harmony with the highest revelations of science. There can be no discrepancy between them. But when we examine the Bible, what a difference! How little ground for the fulfilment of our high expectations! You know when the ass put on the lion's skin the first sound betrayed the impostor. When men try to palm a writing upon us in the name of God, the first sentence reveals the counterfeit. "In the beginning"—that clause is sufficient to condemn the whole book—"In the beginning, God created the heaven and the earth." What was there before that? Before the beginning—I don't care how far back you put it—a thousand million years, if you please—what was there before that? Absolutely nothing. But where dwelt the omnipotent male divinity? He couldn't see, for there was no light; he couldn't hear, for there was no atmosphere; he couldn't think, for there was nothing to think about; he couldn't smell, taste, or feel, for there was nothing outside of himself. Conceive of such a condition of things, and for the Eternal! The eternal God in a worse condition than the senseless fish that swim!

And what should awake him from this condition, and lead him to plow the eternal fallow and sow it broadcast with blazing suns, from whose moons might grow worlds for the habitation of mankind? Can we think of anything that would start up such a being, and out of such an idleness? The very first sentence shows the handwork of man—"In the beginning God created the heaven and the earth." How long ago? Less than 6,000 years! But I am told that it was in the beginning, and that there is room in that sentence for all the vast cycles of the great geologic ages. But unfortunately I read that the Lord made the heavens and the earth, and the sea and all that in them is, in six days, and rested on the seventh day, and was refreshed. And man was made on the last of these six days. And then come the genealogies, down to the time of Jesus; the heavens and the earth and things in them brought into existence out of nothingness, all within the compass of less than 6,000 years.

That is the story the book tells us. Is it true? It is only necesary to ask the geologist, and the answer comes, "No!" All geologists are agreed on the lapse of immense periods as essential to the production of geological phenomena. Lyell talks of millions of ages. And so with others. Prof. Hitchcock, of Amherst, says the globe must hav existed infinitely long before man. But our orthodox friends now try to get around the difficulty by calling these "days" immense periods. Well, suppose we read it after that fashion—call them great periods—thus, "And God created the heavens and the earth in six great periods, each period millions of years long. And then he rested twenty-four hours and was refreshed." The time of rest is out of proportion. But I am told that this day of rest may be an infinite period of time. That may mean five minutes or five million years. It is a piece of India rubber that can be stretched indefinitely. "And God blessed the seventh indefinite period of time and hallowed it." The longer that indefinite period of time of rest is to the lazy man, the better.

What kind of instruction is this for theologians to teach a credulous people—that an infinite being can use no better language for the expression of his ideas than this—a language that has to be twisted and modified to suit the developments of science. Then if those days were millions of years, what did God do on those days? In the first place, "God said, Let there be light." In the Hebrew it is "light be"—two words. So it took five million years for God to say two words. If we take the next period, there are twenty-five words, and on the same reasoning the utterance of these must hav taken 80,000 years. God is said to be slow of anger; he must also be very slow of speech.

But the man that wrote the story intended to teach that the earth was made in six days of twenty-four hours each. If I said I made that table in three days and afterwards said it took me thirty years, you would think there was a discrepancy somewhere. We must take the connection in which the statements are made. When a man says, "The evening and the morning were the first day," and "The evening and the morning were the second day," and so on, he is to be understood as saying just what he means, and meaning just what he says—that these were days just like ours in length. It is a plain, positive statement on the very face of it. Men show that they are aware of the weakness of the book when they admit that it needs such patching. From God the book never came. On the first day God says, "Let there be light, and there was light. And God divided the light from the darkness, and called the light day, and the darkness he called night; and the evening and the morning were the first day." The light and the darkness were all mixed up together, like salt and pepper, and so the necessity comes for dividing them. But can darkness and light be mixed together? A man pulls out a match and says, "Let there be light," and there is light till the match goes out, and then it is dark again. To-night the light that is blazing upon San Francisco left the sun just eight minutes ago. The luminous center is there. But the man who wrote this story didn't know that the sun made the light. He puts the day first and the sun comes in afterwards. He evidently did not suppose that that had anything to do with furnishing light. He has three days before the sun comes into being. That the man was very ignorant is easily seen. Just think of it, that this monstrous story is to be swallowed whole, or else we are to be damned.

And on the second day God said, "Let there be a firmament in the midst of the waters, and let it divide the waters from the waters. And he made the firmament, and divided the waters which were under the firmanent from the waters which were above the firmament." He then divided the waters that were on the face of the earth—lifted them up by means of this great firmament that he had created. The man who wrote the story evidently looked up, and said, Where does that water come from? There is an immense ocean up there; what prevents it from coming down? The firmament. And God made a firmament, and called that heaven. Then the question arose, How does it rain? Why, there are windows in the firmament, and when the Lord wanted to drown the world he just opened the windows; and when he wanted to stop the rain he shut them up again. Now, doesn't the veriest schoolboy know better than that? It is simply untrue. There is no such firmament. The waters were not divided in any such way.

"And God said, Let the waters come together, and let the dry land appear? Evidently that man didn't know that water seeks its level, on the principle of the attraction of gravitation. If he had been a geologist he would hav said, Let the earth be heaped up, and then the waters would inevitably hav been gathered together. He represents the waters as being gathered into one spot, and the dry land appearing. Is that true? The very contrary is true. Dana is orthodox, and he says, "While the continents were still under water they began to take shape. Then first the dry land appeared; strata were formed; and mountains arose, each in its appointed place. It took millions of years to make the continents. They hav gradually grown as the earth has cooled." And all this the Bible represents as being done in one day.

Now please remember that we hav got to the fourth day's work, and no sun, moon, nor stars hav yet come into being. We hav had three mornings and three evenings without sun, moon, and stars, when our existence as a planet depends more on the previous existence of the sun than the child's existence depends on the previous existence of his father. What would you think of a book that said, when the boy was ten years of age his father was born, and when he was forty, his grandfather was born? Well, on the fourth day God set lights in the firmament—sun, moon, and stars. And please remember that on the previous day God said, Let the earth bring forth grass, fruit, etc., and these sprang up immediately without any sun. Three days had been spent on this little globe, and on the fourth day the Lord made the sun and the moon, "and he made the stars also." That is, about sunset of the fourth day, he turns out millions of stars, or suns. "And he set them in the firmament of heaven." What is that? It is what divides the waters below from the waters above the firmament. Now the atmosphere doesn't go more than a hundred miles above this planet, so the sun, moon, and stars must be below this because they held this up. The firmament is under the clouds. On a fine day, therefore, we could get into a balloon and go up to the stars, if this man is right. Isn't it remarkable that people of sense can accept this situation? Where is God's throne? Just on the other side of the firmament; and when he gets angry he shakes it and causes the stars to fall like fruit from a fig-tree. When one star falls, there would be 200,000 miles to spare all round.

Turn to the fifth day. God says, "Let the waters bring forth abundantly the moving creatures therein," etc. What is the meaning of moving creatures that hav life? Nothing definite. It would apply to everything that moves. It is the indefiniteness of ignorance. Then we are told that God created great whales and every living creature that moveth upon the waters. Is this in harmony with the truth? Our first living things are the simplest forms of sea life, discovered in those old oceans of the Laurentian, Cambrian, and Silurian times. Not till we arrive at the Triassic beds, millions of years from the advent of life, do we find fowl that fly in the air. And what a class of creatures is here brought together! Take the last day's work, it is no better than the rest; God makes on the last day creeping things and man. And here, again, he puts together forms of life that are separated by millions of years. Our first beasts belonged to the Triassic period, and man does not make his appearance till the period of the Pilocene-Tertiary. Thus the man who wrote this story has crowded together what nature has separated by millions of years.

"God created man after his own likeness." What does that mean? It means that God is made in the shape of a man. The Jewish God had eyes, nose, mouth, arms, lungs, bowels, legs. And he wrestled with a man. The Jewish Jehovah was simply a magnified man; and when men bow down and worship that, it is just as idolatrous as any heathen worship. The only difference is that the heathen God is made with a jackknife, and the Jewish God is a work of the brain. (Though not very much of the latter is manifested in it.) Are they related to the infinite spirit of the universe? No more than the glow-worm to a sun of the first magnitude. Men will outgrow these ideas, and recognize that the infinite, eternal spirit, whom no man hath seen is a very different one from the man-made God of the Jews.

But there is another account in the second chapter of Genesis. The second account was written by a man of narrower head than the first, and much self-esteem. The first man says, "God saw, God made," etc. The second man says, "The Lord God saw, the Lord God made," etc. According to the second account, God made all in a day; according to the first it took him six days. The first man represents God as saying, Let the earth bring forth grass. That is poetic, though not true. God stands and speaks, and a carpet of verdure rolls around the planet, and there stands the world in all its beauty. But in the second account, God makes an oak—roots, branches, and all—and sticks it into the earth. Will it grow? It is a question. After he had stuck his trees in he had to water them. This writer is a bungler. The first one has a better idea, and more poetical. The first writer represents God as saying, Light be, and light flashes across the void of darkness and lights up the universe. It is not true, but it is grand. The second writer says the Lord God made the beasts of the fields. How did he make them? Very much as he made man. And he made them after he made man. The first writer puts the beasts first. The second writer says the Lord God formed man of the dust of the ground, and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life. Ask the first writer how man was made, and he shakes his head; he knew he would fail, so he doesn't commit himself, but simply says, Male and female created he them. The second writer says, I can tell you exactly how it was. God made man out of the dust of the ground. The old negro was nearer right. He said, "Not dust, not dust, Massa, but mud. De dust no stick togedder." Fancy the process. Out of the dust of the ground God made man. Now there is the dust-man, or mud-man, lying upon the ground. The Lord breathes into his nostrils, or, in other words, blows into his nose, and up starts the man. But then there is woman. But she was an afterthought. Now if woman had written that account it would hav been a different book. One woman described it by saying, "That book is a he book." Theology is simply he-ology. No woman would hav put the man first. He would hav been born in a more natural way. If Adam had come as all men came, the woman would hav come first. But this man was an exception. He came directly from the hand of the Creator. And he is to order all. But I wonder if he remembers that fishes were made before man, therefore by the same logic, man should be silent in the presence of fishes and baboons.

Well, the animals were made and brought to Adam to name them. Just imagine that process! Here is Adam, naked, and no writing materials. If he could remember all the names he must hav had an astonishing memory. The Lord brings Adam the animals to name. Here is an elephant; he names him, and off he is sent to his appropriate place. Here is an Asiatic elephant. He names him, and off he goes to his Asiatic jungle. Then comes a hippopotamus; Adam names him, and off he goes. Then God makes a white bear. But lo, that is a hot country. No matter; the angels must hav been ready to lug him off. Then God makes a mouse; then a cat, and immediately the cat springs at the mouse. Now there's another difficulty. There are 8,000 species of birds and 2,000 of beasts. Supposing the Lord and Adam had a minute to each; what a job, and all this to be done before Eve appeared!

Then God casts Adam into a deep sleep, takes out a rib, and makes Eve. I can fancy him waking out of that sleep, and with a polite bow to Eve, saying, "How do you do, Madam?" and in the most perfect language. Did a language ever spring into being at once like that? Ask the philologists. They will tell you it is opposed to all the laws of language. Language came gradually—first a few radical sounds.

We are told God rested on the seventh day. Now when did God ever cease to work? When did the glaciers ever cease to glide, the sun to shine, animals to propagate? "My Father worketh hitherto," says Jesus, "and I work." True. The infinite spirit has always worked. There are no indications in nature of any resting. But our orthodox friends fear that if this story goes, all will go—New Testament and all—for that is built upon the Old Testament. If you prove that one was made by man you prove that the other was. Then let them fall. Let us hav the truth, no matter what the consequences. I was brought up a Methodist; and the first attack on the Bible that I heard made me tremble down to my boots. I can sympathize with our orthodox friends, but the truth is of far more importance than anything else. The truth will remain, while the fire burns up the chaff. Be assured that nothing can be killed but what deserves to die. There is nothing worth saving but what will be saved. Do not think God needs your puny help. You cannot with a farthing candle help the sun to shine. Do no be disturbed. The world has got along so far without man's help, and is likely to keep on. The future is to be better than the past, and the latest religion is better than the first. This must inevitably be as science and intelligence increase. Religion will liv, and the better will crowd out the poorer. The Unitarian and Universalist are late religions, and they are better than their predecessors.

Spiritualism Viewed from a Common-Sense Standpoint.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: You must be aware you hav, along with your numereus fearless-minded readers, a goodly amount of Spiritualists. Now it might naturally be supposed that there could not be much ground for discordancy between your two classes of reformers, Obliviates and Spiritualists, and yet there certainly is.

Of myself I know that to your Spiritualistic readers the late article of B. F. Underwood in The Truth Seeker headed, "Spiritualism from a Materialistic Standpoint," is considered very unjust and offensive, and if not replied to with absolute facts would be very injurious to your priceless sheet. On the other hand, should some competent Spiritualist attempt by argument to rebut all his suppositions and illogical couclusions, and not by incontrovertable facts, it might lead to a controversy injurious to the feelings of both classes of your readers.

Friend Underwood being a professional Liberal debater, I shall prudently avoid coming within the reach of his sweeping skirts or treading on his coat-tails, as there is no room for a wordy controversy. With your permission, let me state a few obstinate facts. Spiritualism cannot be established by argument. There is no richer subject to the pseudo-scientist, the sham, brawling debater, than Spiritualism. It is the butt for all small wits, the ever ghastly pulpit bug-bear of the grave "Man of God," and the fruitful theme—both ways (opposers and advocates)—of much lying and deception.

I hav been a Spiritualist over thirty years, and hav a journalized volume of nearly a thousand Spiritual tests, and under as many different circumstances, through a variety of mediums and channels of Spiritual communication; and it was full two years ere I could yield to the belief of our spirit's continuity of existence after death, my thoughts being greatly strengthened by a previous familiarity with the phenomena of what is known by the name of mesmerism or psychology in its wonderful and confounding phases—a subject, I am afraid, friend Underwood but slightly understands.

I chanced one day in the year 1852 to be in a friend's store in this city, and was shown a small brass permutation combination lock, known as the "Bramah" lock. I shall not attempt a further description of it than say that when the four rings are properly set this lock had 397,856 changes upon it, or in other words, that when it was set to a word or set of numerals there was 397,856 chances that by guessing or by turning the four lettered rings against its being opened but by going over all its different changes.

After the lock was explained to me I was instantly impressed with its novelty, and conceived it would be a powerful test of spirit intelligence and ability could they giv any combination of letters it might be set to, and I immediately determined to get a trial of it. Accordingly I got my friend the storekeeper to secretly close the lock to some combination and hand it to me, and keep a copy, which he did. I was acquainted with several mediums of distinction, some of them public. On my way up town I called upon my friend Prof. S. B. Brittan, then editor of the Spiritual Telegraph, showed him the lock, and told him my intended trial with the spirits and expressed my doubts. He smiled and said they could and probably would do it. I must say I had strong misgivings. With the lock I called at Mr John B. Conklin's. Around his table I found a company of five gentlemen, who, with the exception of Mr. Conklin, were all strangers to me. During a pause in their inquiries I laid the small cylindrical lock on the medium's table and said, "There, Mr. Conklin, is a test for your spirits; let them open that lock." He smilingly took up the lock and said, "Well, where is the key?" I had to explain to him that it required no key; that it was set to some short word or combination of letters of which I was unacquainted; and if the spirits could not in some way give the word it could be opened only by the person who set it, and even not by him if he had forgotten the combination. After these few remarks the lock was laid upon the table, and through the involuntary action of the medium's hand the following was written out:

"You, my dear friend D——, must not let those that seek tests of this character, for the mere gratification of an idle curiosity, permit you to make such trials. You will be sustained when it can be put to a practical benefit. The letters forming the combination are U. F. O. D.—Captain Carr."

I should mention, the Captain was an old acquaintance of mine. We were all astonished when putting these letters in position the lock immediately came apart. Each gentleman in turn retired to some corner of the room and set the lock to his own combination, which was readily tipped out at the table.

Before separating, the assembled gentlemen thought the test so remarkable that they voluntarily gave the following testimonial certificate:

"This will certify that we the undersigned were present at the rooms of J. B. Conklin (31 Howard street) and witnessed the opening of the lock by the medium, who wrote the letters U. F. O. D. through the influence of spiritual power. [Signed] A. A. Miller, 415 6th avenue; W. A. Hunt, Albany, N. Y.; J. Andrews, 68 Fulton street; Thomas J. Harris, Sen., 179 Broadway; John F. Whitney, 68 Fulton street; John B. Conklin, 31 Howard street."

The successful opening of this lock was widely published in the papers of that day, and induced several trials (which were successful) from several quarters, and through other mediums, and Mr. Conklin was overrun with closed locks from various portions of the United States and Canada—many inclosed in sealed envelopes, until this species of test became an annoyance and Mr. Conklin declined to receive any more locks.

I chanced one day to be in the rooms of Mr. Conklin, when a gentleman—a stranger to us both—entered. He showed us a closed lock of superior make and finish, containing six rings. He remarked: "Here is a lock, Mr. Conklin, which has been closed five years by my brother, who for that length of time has been dead. Now, if the spirits or some invisible power cannot giv the combination, it must forever remain closed and useless, for, by computation, there are thirty-three millions three hundred thousand six hundred and fifty-six chances of our guessing the combination." To the surprise of myself and the owner of the lock, Mr. Conklin's hand almost instantly wrote the letters M. O. H. A. W. K., to which letters the rings readily came apart.

One day I called upon a public medium. I found sitting at his table a gentleman—a naval officer—with whom I was acquainted. He had some written questions, which lay folded very compactly on the table before him. Suddenly, spasmodically, as it were, the medium's hand was influenced to write a message, which, on his attempting to read, he was quite vexed, and was on the point of tossing it on the floor, pronouncing it as incomprehensible nonsense and gibberish. "Stop," said Mr. R. to the sitter; "first let me see it." He seized the written paper and was amazed. "By heavens!" he exclaimed, "here's a go! I wrote my question in Spanish and here's my friend's answer in Spanish!" This was a matter of astonishment to us all, as the medium knew nothing of the language. Mr. R——l told us it was from a fellow-officer who was drowned in the foundering at sea of the United States sloop-of-war "Grampus."

Let the foregoing tests suffice for the present. Strange as they may appear to skeptics, they are by no means strange to many Spiritualists. Hundreds of investigators hav each as wonderful tests, messages, and suggestions quite dissimilar and perhaps more astounding. Yours truthfully,

Brooklyn, L. I. David Bruce.

Bible Inspiration.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: If one reads the first four chapters of the New Testament according to the inductive method, as employed in science, what kind of a mess would be had for digestion? Let us see:

The first chapter of Matthew is headed "The Genealogy of Christ." After tracing the genealogy down through three times fourteen generations, through Abram, Isaac, Jacob, to one Joseph, we are then told that Joseph is not Christ's father. How can this make the child Christ—the illegitimate offspring of Mary—any relation to her husband Joseph?

In Micah v, 2, the prophet says that out of Judah he shall come forth. In Jeremiah xxiii, 5, it says a righteous branch shall be raised up to David; and Isaiah xi, 1, says a rod shall come forth out of the stem of Jesse, and a branch shall grow out of his roots. These chapters are all headed, "The Coming of Christ;" but how does the first chapter of Matthew show that Christ is descended from Judah, Jesse, or David? Simply by marrying Mary to Joseph, and not that Mary, the mother, or the Holy Ghost, the father, was any relation to them. The angel of the Lord appeared unto Joseph and told him to call his name Jesus, but God spoke through the prophet and said to call his name Emmanuel.

Let us compare the first four chapters of the New Testament, about the resurrection, and we find that on the first day of the week, as it began to dawn, at the rising of the sun, when it was yet dark, came Mary Magdalen and the other Mary to see the sepulcher, and saw the stone rolled away and an angel sitting on it without. And they said, Who shall roll us away the stone? And they saw the stone was rolled away, and entered in, and saw the angel within sitting on the right side, and they entered in and did not find Christ's body or see any angel within, but two of them without; but they didn't go in, either, or see any angel, but ran back and told Peter and another disciple; and when she came back she just looked in and saw two angels, one at the head and one at the feet of where the body had lain. And as they went to bring his disciples word, Jesus met them, saying, All hail! And they held him by the feet and worshiped him. But Jesus said unto her, Touch me not, for I am not ascended to my father. And of course she didn't hold his feet and worship him, nor did they see him at all, but only a vision of angels that said he was yet alive.

Then the eleven disciples went into Galilee, where Jesus had appointed them; and when they saw him they worshiped him; but some doubted. (Some from eleven leaves how many believers?) Thomas was one of these unbelievers, for he would not believe unless he could put his hand in the wounds, and he could not do this without touching him, and as he had not yet ascended to his father he didn't touch him. And when he left the disciples he was taken up into heaven. But he wasn't either, for he had to catch some fish first for Simon Peter, Thomas, Nathaniel, and the sons of Zebedee—a hundred and fifty and three at one haul.

Men may see this all straight through spiritual eyes, but I fail to see it in a scientific way. Deacon.

A company under the authority of the Michigan State Association of Spiritualists and Liberalists is canvassing for means wherewith to purchase a site for a permanent camp-meeting ground, and a location at Battle Creek, Mich., has been fixed upon. It is already announced, with a flourish in a local paper, that Bundy, of the Chicago R.-P. Journal, has pledged five hundred dollars for himself, and has pledged his immediate friends for a larger amount, in aid of the project. If this means that Bundy is to be the inspiring genius of the enterprise, the friends of truth and justice, and of D. M. Bennett, whom this man has so outrageously and malignantly assailed, will scan the matter closely before pledging to it their patronage or moral support. M. B. S.

Iowa Notes and News.

Let again the roll-call of counties be heard! I hav names in none of the following: Audubon, Buena Vista, Cherokee, Clay, Davis, Dickenson, Franklin, Grundy, Howard, Humboldt, Ida, Kossuth, Louisa, Marion, Mills, Monroe, O'Brien, Osceola, Palo Alto, Pocahontas, Ringgold, Sioux, Union, Van Buren, Winnebago, and Worth.

In the following I hav the addresses of Liberals, but hav received no word from them in reply to letters sent: Allamakee, Adair, Appanose, Boone, Hancock, Hanlin, Harrison, Iowa, Casper, Johnson, Lyon, Mitchell, Monona, Montgomery, Page, Plymouth, Pottawattamie, Sac, and Story.

It will be seen that we hav made substantial gains since the date of our last call in The Truth Seeker, Jan. 2d. I hav received letters from eleven new counties, and hav the addresses of Liberals in twelve more, received since that time.

In Adams county I hav heard only from Prescott and Corning; Benton, from Belle Plaine, Blairstown, and Vinton; Black Hawk, from Cedar Falls; Butler, from Shell Rock and New Hartford; Calhoun, from Lake City; Carroll, from Glidden; Cass, from Anita; Cedar, from Springdale; Cerro Godo, from Clear Lake; Chickasaw, from Nashua; Clarke, from Osceola; Clayton, from Bismarck; Decatur, from Garden Grove; Delaware, from Manchester; Des Moines, from Burlington; Dubuque, from Farley and Dubuque; Emmett, from Armstrong's Grove; Fayette, from Randalia and Fayette; Floyd, from Charles City; Fremont, from Riverton; Greene, from Scranton; Guthrie, from Guthrie Center and Casey; Hamilton, from Hook's Point; Henry, from Mt. Pleasant; Jackson, from Bellevue and La Motte; Jefferson, from Perlee; Jones, from Anamosa; Keokuk, from Sigourney and Harper; Lee, from Keokuk and Donnellson; Linn, from Lisbon; Lucas, from Chariton; Madison, from Winterset; Mahaska, from New Sharon; Marshall, from Marshalltown; Muscatine, from West Liberty; Polk, from Des Moines; Powshiek, from Grinnell and Montezuma; Scott, from Davenport and Le Claire; Shelby, from Harlan; Tama, from Toledo; Taylor, from Bedford; Wapello, from Ottumwa; Warren, from Indianola; Washington, from Brighton; Wayne, from New York; Winneshiek, from Ossian; Woodbury, from Sioux City; Wright, from Clarion; Webster, from Gowrie.

I hav thus particularized that no reader of this paper may think that his county or neighborhood is at work in the good cause when it is not.

Will each Liberal in the counties above enumerated, and in all others where a petition for taxation of church property is not in circulation, send at once for one or more and go to work? Send at once; there is not a day to be lost. You hav waited so long that now you must bestir yourselves with extra celerity.

LEAGUES.

Our friends at Armstrong's Grove are deserving of great praise for the persistent and determined energy displayed by them in the organization of their League, the sixth in the state, considering the fact that theirs is a newly settled section of country, some of their members living nine miles from the headquarters of the League. Mr. Peter H. Burt is one of my most whole-souled assistants in the good work of Liberal organization and propagation.

Ottumwa has a League organized by this time; was to hold a meeting this week. Mr. O. C. Graves and Mr. Wm. Lindsey, of that city, are hard at work waking up the Liberals of that vicinity and circulating the petition.

John Robinson, at Hook's Point; Jerome Dutton, Wheatland; P. C. Corgell, Glidden; E. Hanck, Bedford; C. P. Hosmer, Belle Plaine; C. W. Potter, Harlan; I. N. Harris, Riverton; A. L. Potter, La Motte; and E. M. Stanton, New Sharon, are all alive to the necessity of organization; and if our friends in their respective neighborhoods will but render them the proper assistance, there can be a strong League organized in each of these places. There are more than a hundred cities and towns in the state where there are enough Liberals to form rousing Leagues if those Liberals will but put their shoulders to the wheel and push forward the car of equal rights.

Will all the Liberals of Clark county at once put themselves into communication with Mr. C. W. Dibble or J. G. Watts, Osceola, in reference to the organization of that county? They are live men and mean business.

LECTURES AND LECTURERS.

Hook's Point, Bedford, and Randalia want lecturers. Will all our rostrum missionaries who are intending to lecture in the West during the next few months send me their terms, addresses, and open dates, that I may be able to inform our friends at these and other points, or communicate with the above gentlemen direct?

I am sending out petitions by the hundreds—four hundred this week, and corresponding almost constantly. Will our friends please send in their mites to keep the machinery moving. A few stamps at least. Unite, agitate, each one do his or her part. E. C. Walker,

"CUPID'S YOKES."

GLOBE VILLAGE, MASS., Jan. 16, 1880.

"Cast not your pearls before swine lest they trample them under their feet and turn again and rend you."—Jesus.

I notice that many of your correspondents, who utterly condemn the action of the judicial swine which placed Mr. Heywood and Mr. Bennett in durance vile for putting the above-entitled book in the mails, go out of their way to express their dissent from the book without attempting to controvert a single one of its principles, premises, positions, arguments, or conclusions. This seems to me hardly fair treatment, for they ought to either show wherein the book is wrong or hold their tongues about it, and not prejudice the public mind against it by publishing their extra-judicial opinion without any reason. That course givs us some grounds to suspect them of trying to combine the wisdom of the serpent with the harmlessness of the dove from fear of the swinish public opinion. Well, it is not pleasant to be torn by swine, and not wise to unnecessarily throw one's self or others in their way. Perhaps the wisest way would be to place the pearls in sight of them in a position where they cannot trample on them, and then stir the swine up with a long pole at a safe distance where they cannot hurt you.

The human race are not all swine. There is every degree of development from the unmitigated swine up. And if we would forward the development of the race, we must cast our pearls before the race and take the consequences of some of them falling before the unmitigated swine; but we should never hunt up that type to throw our pearls before, but avoid them so far as truth, candor, and wisdom will allow.

I hav read "Cupid's Yokes" several times, and in the light of science, reason, and common sense, the light of freedom and natural rights, the light of justice and eternal fitness of things, I can see but little, if anything, in it to condemn. There is one thing about it, however, which exposes it to the condemnation of mankind, as a rule, which is, it is in advance of the mental and moral development of the race, and consequently is not appreciated by but comparatively few. It is a pearl thrown before swine, and the maker of the pearl and some of those involved with him hav been torn by the swine as one consequence. But it has also served to open the eyes of some to the conjugal rottenness, corruption, perversion, and degraded bondage in which the race has so long been held, especially women, the consequences of which hav been an inferior development of the race, as a rule, physically, mentally, and morally.

PESCADERO, CAL., Jan. 8, 1880.

It is coming, it is coming—a rational religion founded on nature, science, and reason. There is no blotting it out; it is bound to come, and thousands stand ready to hail its coming with great joy. The old ship of Zion is getting old, leaky, much racked, and is dragging her anchors before the gale. Who can wonder at it? We can only wonder that it has not done it long ago. She was poorly built at first, and upon a bad plan for any use, especially so for running on republican waters. She is monarchical from bottom to top. The Bible—her hulk—is monarchical from lid to lid. It tells us of kings, kingdoms, princes, and principalities; that God is a king, his son, Jesus Christ, a king, and the devil a prince, but not a word about republics. The writers of the Bible were all monarchists; everything that belongs to it is monarchical, yet, strange to say, this Bible religion is the prevailing religion in this republican government, and, still stranger, there are men vile enough to want to establish it by law. O consistency, what a jewel thou art!

He who would sow his field to good wheat and then sow tares on the wheat to make it grow better would be just as consistent and just as reasonable as the builders of a republic who would establish a monarchical religion in it to make it prosper better. Thorns and thistles will no more certainly ruin a wheat-field than the Bible religion will ruin any republic if it is allowed to be the dominant religion in it. The elements in the one case are no more opposed to each other than in the other. Ruin is the consequence in either case. No true republican can be a true follower of Jesus Christ, because Christ is a monarchist in every sense of the word, and his followers are commanded to follow him in all things, even unto the end; and when they enlist under him, they enlist under the banner of King Jesus. From anything that is recorded of him, we hav no reason to believe that he regards republicans any higher than he does publicans and sinners; and, for my part, I don't care whether he does or not, for I don't go one cent on a son who is as old as his dad nor an official who inherits his office from his dad or from any other man. If there is a God (and I think there is), and republican governments are right (and I think they are), it is most evident that a republican government should hav a republican God and a republican religion.

The old ship of Zion lands all her passengers at the port of King Jehovah. The new ship will surely land hers at the port of the great President of the Universe, and it is believed that his court is always in session and that he has no princes of darkness, no bottomless pits, nor lakes of fire and brimstone. And if a man comes before his bar claiming merits on account of having been born twice, he will be told that there is no such thing in the statutes of heaven; that one birth and one death is all that is appointed unto man; and if one comes claiming merits on account of having believed in the Lord Jesus Christ, he will be told that faith is not meritorious in any case, and especially for believing in the old dogmas and superstitions of the Jews; that the human mind is like a pair of scales—the side which has the most weight on it preponderates; that wherever the greatest weight of evidence is, there will be our faith, and we can't help it; faith is involuntary; in a word, all his judgments will be just.

HARWICH, MASS., Jan. 1, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: I am a poor man. I hardly know how to subscribe for another paper, but I must take THE TRUTH SEEKER, not only for its wealth of thought, its bravery and sound philosophical treatment of religion and morals, but also to furnish means of continuing the paper and sustaining the editor in his most noble effort to rid the world of the blighting, blasting, direful effects of superstition.

Oh, what a crushing curse Christianity has been ever since that bloody tyrant, Constantine, introduced it! What oceans of blood it has shed to gratify its love of cruelty and carnage! Its sickening details of fire and fagot, the rack, dungeons, and tortures of every description are enough to make one's blood run cold. Did the "gentle Jesus"—if there ever was such a man—ever surmise what would be done in his name? What would he do or say were he here to-day, affiliating, as I think he would, with the Freethinkers, to see such damnable deeds done in his name? Who ever knew a Freethinker to persecute any one for his opinions? And why do they not persecute? Because they are free from superstition—made free by daring to investigate and by honestly following their highest and most reasonable conception of truth.

Go on, banner of freedom, and may the blessing of all that's good and great rest upon the head of the venerable editor and veteran of Freethought and human rights! God grant him health to pass the ordeal of imprisonment, which, for an old man, must be about as much as his constitution can bear! Let Comstock and his confederates in crime reap their rewards with Jefferies and such as he which will be meted out to them in the coming future. B. F. ROBBINS.

N. Y. MILLS, N. Y. Jan. 12, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed I send you five dollars—three dollars for THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880, and two dollars as a donation to the cause, to use as you see fit.

Yours respectfully, OLIVER GARDNER.

WINDSOR, KAN., Dec. 20, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find three dollars, which will pay for THE TRUTH SEEKER up to January 1, 1881.

Mr. Editor, I received your card all right. I would like to say something to Mr. Bennett and wife that would be encouraging to them, but it appears to me that about everything good has been said by his friends that can be said, and I do not like to steal other men's thunder. I don't think it honorable to do so. You see, I am an admirer of strong language, so allow me to borrow from A. J. Searl: "In conclusion let me say you may plot against me, arrest me, deprive me of my liberty, roast me, boil me, ram me, jam me, double me up, and send me to the infernal regions, but don't, pray don't, as you hope for mercy beyond the tomb, inflict upon me another copy of the Index." I, too, hav received the Index and R.-P. Journal. In one sense, I am sorry that I saw that Index, for previously I had had a better opinion of Mr. Abbot. As to Mr. Bundy, I never went a cent on him.

So, Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, cheer up the best you can. I would like to meet you when your term expires and giv you one hundred dollars, but I don't see how I can. Financially I can do about nothing, and I can write only in the homeliest manner. I never went to school more than a half day each day, and frequently the teacher did not come. My best regards for Mr. and Mrs. Bennett, yourself, and THE TRUTH SEEKER. Yours truly, W. W. ROBINSON.

HILLSDALE, Jan. 16, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: There is a commotion here in the Catholic church which goes to prove the bigotry and intolerance which attends the church, even in a small place like this. The trouble is over the prospective wedding of a Catholic girl to a Protestant. A few days ago the mother of the young lady paid a visit to the priest, who gave her a terrible raking over the coals. Said he: "Why did you not tell me of this a year ago, that your daughter was keeping company with a Protestant? I would hav put a stop to it. I don't want you to forget that you are all under me, and you hav got to do as I say. I would like to know what you think of yourself, bringing up your children to disgrace you in this way. Damn that ——; I would like to take the toe of my boot from the seat of his pants. To think of his taking one of my girls, and right from under my nose too."

Then he wrote to the bishop about it, who sent him some pamphlets, which he read to the congregation. A few extracts were as follows:

"Any Catholic who marries a Protestant commits adultery; it is illegal and disgraceful. And any one taking part in it, or sanctioning it by their presence, are just as bad. And," added the priest, "any one of this church who attends such a wedding I will turn out of the church, and they will go to hell sure."

The wedding is to take place on the 23d. The young lady is a confirmed Catholic, and says she will not leave them, which may cause trouble in the future. Her family, which is quite numerous, were forbidden to attend, but whether they will obey or not remains to be seen.

Yours respectfully, H. A. BOLEY.

FARMINGTON, UTAH, Jan. 7, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I got a letter from the secretary of the Liberal League of Tompkins county, N. Y., stating that they were for splitting off from the "parent tree," and I could not but feel sorry for the folly of such moves; and I thought how we were giving the lie to the old-time Bible assertion that the "children of this world were showing more wisdom than the children of light." What in the world is the matter? Why is it that we must keep making side-issues, and so thwart or help to thwart the very object we express ourselves so anxiously wishing to accomplish?

The article "Off the Fence" well expressed my views upon the subject. What has the question of total separation to do with moral or social standing? Again, what sense would there be in a king abdicating his throne because some of his subjects were vile and bad? Or what would we think of a man who would throw up his membership in some good order, and lose the benefits of the same, because there were one or more members who were not living up to his measure of moral standard? We would count him a fool, and so I count men or Leagues who split off on such pretexts and so help to retard the very object of our organization, wherein such men as our old friend D. M. Bennett and our energetic secretary A. L. Rawson hav been unwise. I am very sorry, but I am certain they will suffer in consequence more than we or the cause of the Liberal League movement need to. "Let him that is without sin throw the first stone." It is a saying that "to err is human; to forgive, divine." Here is a chance for us to show out our better nature. Let us take advantage of the opportunity.

But, after all, for my part I fail to see where there has been so much wrong committed under the circumstances; and I am proud to see the stand our noble chairman and champion takes in the matter.

With kind regards to our friend Bennett, yourself, and all who work shoulder to shoulder with us in the cause of mental freedom and equal rights, I am,

Yours sincerely, WALTER WALKER.

NEW YORK, Jan. 18, 1880.

DEAR FRIENDS: I cannot longer refrain from expressing my appreciation of the marked ability so manifest in the management of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am not at all surprised at the great increase of its subscribers and friends. Its real value as a true mirror of the life, growth, and rapid progress of the times, from superstition and ignorance to scientific knowledge, understanding, and reason, is cause sufficient why it should receive the support and admiration of all lovers of humanity and human progress. Each week I peruse the pithy, earnest, and interesting letters in its columns with great pleasure and profit. Many of our Christian friends might learn valuable lessons of love, generosity, and manly sympathy thereby. Its bold attacks on false and fallacious theories, its staunch adherence to truth and justice, I admire. To cater to the tastes and notions of its numerous patrons must be an arduous task, and one difficult to perform without giving offense to some. Were it possible to make the least improvement in its perfected management, I, individually, believe it would be by saving some of the powder and shot which I think is now wasted on the cankerous and dying frauds and imposters with which the true Liberal cause has been handicapped. I believe that the wrangling and petty quarrels of our Christian churches are doing more to hasten their downfall than any if not all other influences combined. If this is a fact, as wise mariners we should shun the reefs on which other crafts hav been stranded. While we may with propriety admire and emulate the past virtues of those who are now traitors to the cause, if they had any, silent scorn and contempt, I believe, is the most effective admonition for their present follies. We often see examples of this, even among the brutes.

How oft we see the noble dog,
With stately mein and size,
Imperiously pass the snarling cur,
Nor heed its threats or cries!

Others may not think as I do, yet trusting that you will excuse the liberty I hav taken in making the suggestion, I remain, as ever, an ardent admirer and earnest supporter of your paper and the cause it so ably represents,

Yours ever, HENRY A. STONE.

CORVALLIS, ORE., Dec. 30, 1879.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: As one of the many friends of Freethought and admirers of you personally as its representative, for being which you are suffering an unjust imprisonment, I beg to giv my verdict for you. You hav led too many of us from the darkness of superstition into the light of humanity's religion, hav done too grand a work for this generation, to hav us now afford to let you forsake us. No other journal represents us like yours; no other editor is so fearlessly outspoken in the cause of mental liberty. The age needs you; we need you to still further lead the van of progress. You hav done nothing to forfeit the trust that true Liberals reposed in you. Like our dear Mrs. Slenker, if I had ten thousand votes I would giv them all for you. You hav shown yourself to be of the right metal—a true hero, a true believer in the cause you represent. How many of us, though sure we were right, weighed in the same balance, would not hav been found wanting?

Inclosed find two dollars—one to aid in defense fund, the other for Mrs. Slenker's "Darwin's" and "John's Way," and Jean Meslier's "Last Will" (paper), and some Truth Seeker tracts.

MRS. ANNIE EVEREST.

DONNELLSON, IOWA.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: "Champions of the Church" received O. K. It is a magnificent work, fully portraying the crimes and persecutions of the followers of the thorn-crowned Prince of Peace. It should be in the hands of every defender of liberty. Yours, AL. D. LEECH.

FORT SCOTT, KAS., Dec. 30, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Will you please make a correction? A few weeks ago I wrote a letter to D. M. Bennett and directed it to his forced home in the United States Penitentiary at Albany, N. Y. I did not suppose the letter would be published, but I see it has been. In signing my name I signed my true name, which is V. W. Sunderlin. You published me as V. W. Junderton. I think one name quite as good as another, providing there is no ambiguity or misunderstanding; but I am already receiving papers and circulars addressed to V. W. Junderton, put in my post-office box, which I should hav returned to the very discriminating distributers in our post-office and accused them of making a mistake had I not seen that name published in THE TRUTH SEEKER to a letter I sent to D. M. Bennett. I wish as far as possible to correct my own mistakes and to help others do the same, and I am glad that no injury has been done to any one in the one I mention. By the way, I like to see every one who writes any thing to a friend or for publication sign his true name and not a fictitious one. But there are exceptions to all rules.

I am highly pleased with your paper, and so are all to whom I loan it for perusal, except some who hav obtained all the light they desire to shine upon them.

Fraternally, V. W. SUNDERLIN.

SIOUX FALLS, D. T., Jan. 19, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Inclosed find P. O. order for $5, for Paine's Great Works, and THE TRUTH SEEKER for 1880. I am sorry I cannot send for a number of other works of the same quality at this time, but I will in time. The work that Mr. Bennett is writing in prison I want as soon as it is possible to spare money for it, and also the "Sixteen Saviors or None," "The Darwins," and some others.

Are Infidels as scarce in Dakota as reports from there indicate? I think not. There are, however, plenty of Liberal-minded men of all classes. You will find them in fair quantities almost everywhere if you will stop to feel their pulse. I am informed that Theodore Tilton is to lecture here in a short time. Ah! I wish it was to be Col. Ingersoll, Prof. Jamieson, or some other eloquent speaker of that brand; what glorious revivals might not be expected! Here is good material if there was only some one to kindle the fire.

I am pleased to see what a harvest THE TRUTH SEEKER has had from the 5,000 copies sowed by the Index. I move that your paper and its readers vote Abbot thanks.

The explanation made by Mr. Bennett in regard to those letters so canonized is in my mind as satisfactory as any evidence possibly can be. He acknowledges his folly in writing them, and regrets it. Every line is stamped with manliness and truth. Who can doubt his words?

I regret to see some writers in your paper classify Mr. Underwood with Abbot and Bundy. I admit he has made some remarks not to be expected from such a man. But, friends, be not too harsh. I think he is too good and too great a man to be stoned to death. He is needed too much. Even Abbot and Bundy hav done much good in time gone by. Let us hope they will see and regret the injury they hav done to themselves and the Liberal cause they advocate and work for. Yours truly, N. S. JOHNSON.

LINDSAY, ONT., Jan. 17, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: Not one of your many friends in the United States and Canada feel more aggrieved for the great wrong that has been done you than I do. I would hav written to you before this, but was somewhat under the impression that letters would not or might not be delivered to you. Cheer up. A few weeks more and you will be a free man. That your future years may be those of peace and happiness is the wish of Yours sincerely,

WM. MCDONNELL.

THOUGHTS ON CAPITAL AND LABOR.

SOLEBURG, PA., Jan. 1, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I would like to say a short say in your valuable paper on the mooted question above stated, which I believe may be summed up in a very few words, when analyzed as I think it should be, viz, that money as capital, like knowledge, possesses power according to its indivtdual possession, in quantity and quality, and so it may be said of labor; hence it only becomes necessary to determine, as in a pair of scales, the difference in power to show the superiority of one over the other. Power is the one great thing, after all, that may be said to the contrary. I believe with the scripture declaration, that "there is no power but of [science] God," inherent in all the things that be, in the vast, boundless universe of space, which may be termed the great "I am," body of science, "God, wherein we liv, and move, and hav our being." Now power may be compared to the aroma of flowers, too subtle to be seen by mortal eye, but ever operating in all the departments of nature, governed by mathematical chemical laws inherent in all the things that be.

Science, knowledge, God of might,
(No earthly arm can stay),
Moves onward, ever in the right,
In its almighty way,
And swallows darkness in the light
Of one eternal day.

When the light of the moon-reason becomes as the light of the sun-knowledge, and the light of the sun-knowledge intensified as the light of seven days, found in science god, viz, knowledge, wisdom, power, art, wit, skill, and understanding, to behold the glory of the supernal heavens where all is harmony and love evolved from chaotic, mundane life, where the greatest amount of concentrated capital power must and will rule labor as sure as one locomotive will run a hundred cars, which is often done by the concentrated power of steam.

My logic may be thought as wild:
The cause of causes is father to the child.
Let capital and labor labor on,
A line by nature is by nature drawn.
I mean by nature in a sense that's broad,
Including science, nature's god;
The great controlling power supreme,
Producing souls, as butter from the cream.
Let science guide immortal mind,
And stop the twattle of mankind.

According to my limited capacity I sincerely sympathize with Bro. Bennett. May his shadow never grow less.

E. W. A.

TECUMSEH, MICH., Dec. 29, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: I used to read the Index and rather liked it until the intolerable conceit of its editorial figure-head became so disgustingly sickening that with many others I was forced to shut it off. When the famous "five thousand" made their appearance I was of course treated with a copy. I will here say that in a life of nearly three-score years it has been my lot to see and witness much of the darker side of human nature, but I must confess that for downright studied meanness the cultured Francis Ellingwood Abbot has fairly won the belt.

It must hav been his transcendent culture that prompted him to publish these "five thousand" Indexes for the low, damnable purpose of effecting the ruin of two gentlemen as much above him in morals as heaven is higher than hell. Doubtless this cultured paragon of virtue now sees that his pretended immaculateness is being bespattered and bedraggled with the filth he intended for others.

Now I'll wager a horse that the dirtiest, meanest pickpocket within a hundred miles of Boston will certify that were these charges all true to the letter these men would still be infinitely above the man capable of the low, dirty work of their "extra five thousand." Verily he has outdeviled the devil with his low, ineffable meanness, and has justly earned a skunk-skin belt. With all his culture, Francis is still unhappy; and though constituting both the head and tail of his League, like the tadpole, he is pining for a body, with suitable material at hand for a fair-sized belly in Comstock, Colgate & Co. Ah, Francis! your attenuated League, the gasps and struggles of the Index to maintain its existence, while THE TRUTH SEEKER is waxing fat day by day, that's what's the matter with you. Even so mote it be.

Inclosed pleased find remittance in P. O. order for renewing my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER.

BENVILLE, ILL., Jan. 2, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: This unceasing persecution against seekers of truth by an unscrupulous set of hell-hounds calling themselves good Christians is something more than astonishing. I hav read a few numbers of your excellent paper and am convinced that no man could read it carefully and condemn the noble, manly, and outspoken sentiments with which its columns are filled. I hav read it for the last three years as much as a transient life would permit, and hav thought, and do still, that D. M. Bennett is one of America's soundest men. When I wrote you one month ago to send me THE TRUTH SEEKER I did not fully understand the nature of the charge which so unjustly deprived him of liberty. I am located for the winter, and since I hav received three copies of your paper I am satisfied of the unprecedented and damnable wrongs instigated through the medium of Christian prejudice.

My future spare time and energy shall be directed towards the interests of THE TRUTH SEEKER. I am a three-months subscriber; I shall renew for one year ere that time expires. Every one (with few exceptions) likes the paper who has seen it. I believe everybody would be truth seekers and truth lovers if they were not chained down by their cursed creeds. There are a few so-called Christians around Benville who are down on me for subscribing.

Now let me relate a true occurrence which took place in our quiet and well-disposed neighborhood (Benville). I am a magician and ventriloquist. I gave an entertainment at Benville, Oct. 2d. There were a few good church-members who would not pay the admission fee, but ventured near enough to listen to the music; one was a Mr. Lem Ackwright, a class-leader, and, I doubt not, as good a Christian as any. December 16th I was announced for another entertainment at the same house. Mr. Lem Ackwright and brother (both good Christians) used every means possible to injure me. They misrepresented me in every way conceivable, and to cap the climax and prove their real Christian motives they locked the house and induced the teacher to carry off the key, the retaking of which resulted in a general quarrel with one of the directors of the building and the pedagogue. I received a copy of THE TRUTH SEEKER that evening, considerably behind date, from the father of Mr. Lem Ackwright, who is postmaster at Benville. On the Friday following I gave Mr. Wm. Ackwright two letters. The destination of one was Mt. Sterling, our county seat. He mailed one, and, as he had business in Mt. Sterling that day, he delivered that one by hand—illegally—and pocketed seven cents in change. I surmised as much, and as I was in town the next day I asked the man to whom it was addressed, in what way he received my letter. He said, by hand, from Mr. Wm. Ackwright, without stamp.

Now, worthy reader, this is truth. The man who did this little sneaking, petty thieving is a member of God's church and was brought up under Christian influences. The man who so illegally received my communication is the editor of the Brown county Democrat. I am a poor showman and Infidel, but before I would stoop to an act so mean and insignificant as this pure, regenerated Christian, I would commit suicide. Such men are fit only for the hell they are taxed to support. No wonder they commit such sneaking acts when their heads are crammed full of Bible wickedness.

Oh for a general diffusion of the noble principles advocated by the much-loved and honest D. M. Bennett! Oh for the day when the vile salivaried sneaks who continue their persecutions may be swallowed up in the gulf of their own making!

The wrong enacted by the benevolent Ackwright is but a trifling affair when compared to the gigantic wrongs instigated by men who know better. I do not blame these ignorant, benighted subordinates as much as I do those lecherous hypocrites who educate their subjects by thrusting incessantly into their faces tracts and pamphlets rich with the gathered venom of three centuries of religious war.

But, thanks to fate, truth, reason, and science, the walls that hide the rottenness of their pet theory are fast crumbling. The day will come when bigotry and arrogance will hide their heads in shame. By the indefatigable efforts of men like Bennett and others, truth and reason will meet in concord and terminate this pilgrimage at the foot of a God, if you please, that loves not according to circumstances of life, but a God instilling principles and impulses far more divine than those emanating from that lamentably obscene book said to hav been inspired by the Jewish Jehovah.

Respectfully yours, J. W. CARPENTER,
An earnest truth-seeker.

ANGOLA, IND., Jan. 3, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Please find inclosed one dollar, for which send me Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Saviors or None," his reply to John T. Perry's "Sixteen Saviors or One."

I would hav written long ere this to D. M. Bennett, our martyr-hero in prison, but, being a reader of THE TRUTH SEEKER, I was aware of his having as many letters as he had perhaps time to read. But I want to say to him to not think of abandoning the editorship of THE TRUTH SEEKER; it would please Bundy and Abbot too well; that is what they are seeking, prompted by a spirit of envy and jealousy. I hav taken the R. P. Journal ever since its first issue—always paying in advance—until now. I wrote to J. C. Bundy that I could no longer help support an editor that would strike an old man when he was down and could not defend himself.

Abbot sent me one of the "five thousand" samples of jealousy and hatred that he issued and threw broadcast over this country soliciting subscribers, but his ostensible purpose was to injure Mr. Bennett, and his diabolical project has most signally failed in every respect except to enhance the interest of D. M. Bennett, which it has most certainly done. Bundy's and Abbot's object in endeavoring to break down D. M. Bennett is so plain that a wayfaring man, though a fool, can easily discern it.

Although Mr. Underwood says that those who support Mr. Bennett are the tag-rag and bobtail of society (what an expression for a cultured gentleman!), I hope they will show those cultured editors that they can discern between heroic goodness, as represented by D. M. Bennett, and Abbotism, as represented by themselves.

Mr. Editor, when D. M. Bennett, after being accused of writing those letters, rose up and said, "Yes, I did write them, for which I am sorry," he gave his enemies such a thrust as left them hors de combat. Mr. Editor, when I view with my mind's eye Mr. Bennett, with all the calmness of a heroic soul, rise up and say, "Yes, I did it, and am sorry for it," it fills me with admiration. In his great moral honesty, it makes me reflect back a few years when a would-be great man hid behind his pulpit and said he did not do it, when nine-tenths of all intelligent people believed him guilty.

Hoping a speedy release of our martyr-hero from the Christian bastile, I subscribe myself

Yours for universal freedom, DR. J. H. MOORE.

COVINGTON, IND., Jan. 4, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: I still wish you to think of me as one of your friends. Notwithstanding all you hav done, which perhaps I should not hav done, I think more of you than ever before. I am glad you had the courage to confess the truth. You thereby held your old friends and got many new ones for your manliness and disposition to do right in future. I hope to be able to do more for you and your grand distributor of light and knowledge, THE TRUTH SEEKER. Before taking THE TRUTH SEEKER I took the Investigator, and enjoyed reading it more than any other paper I ever read; and after taking that one or two years I dropped it, and hav now taken THE TRUTH SEEKER three or four years, and now believe, after reading your papers and books, I hav enjoyed and advanced more intellectually than in all I had read—which is considerable—in forty years previous.

I am now nearly sixty years old, and I am much gratified to see in your paper communications from some old persons, some a score of years older than I am, rejoicing in manly Liberal views of life, and are cheered in their old age by THE TRUTH SEEKER and Liberal books. I see but little to discourage, while there is much to encourage Liberals to move forward in organizing and spreading Liberal views. It is only a few years back that we hav to look and recall to memory the time when it was a sin and disgrace to speak out what we believed to be the truth, if in opposition to modern Christianity, orthodoxy, or the Bible. But what a change we now see! Liberals who wish to work for the cause in opening the eyes of the blind, or exposing the extreme follies, falsities, and superstitions of the religions of to-day, must be up and doing, or their occupation will be gone. The ministers of the day are growing bold and courageous enough to say in their pulpits that the Bible is not all the word of God, that it contains obscene and untruthful reading. Not long ago the Central Baptist Church minister in Syracuse said in a lecture on "Shakspere and the Bible," that some people object to Shakspere because there are passages in it too obscene to be read in a promiscuous audience. He acknowledged that the Bible was open to the same objection. The next one I read of is H. W. Beecher, at a Friday evening prayer-meeting on Dec. 19th, who said in speaking of the Bible Society: "For one I will not giv a dollar to a society that prints a Bible notoriously false in some parts, and which the society knows to be false. A committee was appointed to revise the present copy of the Bible. It worked laboriously, and made a report recommending certain alterations which were adopted. But some of the old-school members of the board kicked up about it, and the society never had dared to print the revises that it had declared to be correct. I won't giv it a dollar. The same is true of the American Tract Society. It doesn't need nourishing. These societies are of age. Let them swing off and take care of themselves." The Rev. Prof. Swing of Chicago said in one of his Sunday sermons a few weeks ago, "Oh that we had the gems of the Bible selected and printed in a book." The good Rev. Dr. Thomas, pastor of the Centenary Methodist Church of Chicago, said, "The time had come when men who had done so much good for humanity as Thomas Paine, should be given credit for what they had done." He proceeded to pronounce a eulogy on him, and said he was not more than half Infidel, for he believed in God and immortality. Such talk is paving the way and making it easy for other liberally-disposed ministers to do likewise. There are many religious people now who think more of an unbeliever that livs a good moral life than of a religious, immoral professor. Any person who would not be a good Christian, Catholic or Protestant, would not be a good Infidel or anything else. A person who is born right, naturally good, will be good anywhere, and vice versa. Yours truly, WM. S. SEGAR.

PIKE, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: If I hav not heretofore sent in my letter of sympathy and appreciation it has been because of the pressure of other matters, and not because I hav not felt deeply for Mr. and Mrs. Bennett in their troubles through the cruel and vindictive attacks of Bundy and Abbot. I cannot tell you how impatiently I waited for Mr. Bennett's letter of reply. It came at last—a full, frank, straightforward, manly confession of the truth—so characteristic of the man, so unlike the usual course pursued by delinquent Christian clergymen—and I cried, "Bravo!"

"To err is human," but to confess—ah, that is superhuman!

Much as I regret the occasion of that letter of confession—that the equilibrium of the cerebrum and cerebellum forces of such a man should hav been disburbed by a wily enchantress—for the sake of truth and that of our dear Liberal cause, do I rejoice that he did not add perjury to the sin of making a fool of himself, and, Adam-like, throw all the blame upon the woman.

I sincerely pity those illiberal Liberals who, yet possessed of the old Pharisee spirit, cannot say to a repentant brother, "Freely do we forgive thee; go and sin no more." Even the church gladly welcomes the humble penitent. Shall we professing Liberals be less generous and forgiving, and suffer the star of hope to set in the western horizon of the life of this old soldier of liberty, spent and scarred with many battles, forgetting all the good work he has ever done, all the sacrifices he has made for truth, because of one false step? Perish the thought; rather let us cheer his heart and strengthen his hands for more effective work in the years to come by wise counsels, sympathy, and love, determining to profit by the lesson of his painful experience and make our own lives more consistent and exemplary. Let us search carefully along the written walls of memory and see if we do not find the record of some sin of equal magnitude, if not of the same character, before deciding that this one is unpardonable. Should we not find the object of our search let us conclude that possibly the tempter has never approached us upon the weak side, and guard well against his future approach.

The Liberal church—if I may be allowed such an expression—is still young, but when it shall hav reached the present age of the Christian church, having had the same power and opportunities for cleansing humanity of sin and ignorance, if it then numbers as many renegades in its ranks and shows such meagre results of its work as its now powerful (but fast decaying) opponent, its supporters may well hav cause to blush and be discouraged.

Then lift high truth's glorious banner,
Rally round her standard strong,
Let "Excelsior" be our motto
And "true freedom" be our song.

M. SLUSSER.

DENVER, COL., Dec. 30, 1879.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER: Inclosed please find three dollars, which you may place to my credit. I am not prepared to giv up THE TRUTH SEEKER, notwithstanding the fact that Abbot and Bundy wants me to do so. The Liberals here, or such of them as I hav had any conversation with in regard to the cowardly attacks of Abbot and Bundy on Mr. Bennett, express themselves very emphatically against the above-named pair. For myself I hav but one feeling, and that is contempt, and I may say disgust, at the cowardly attacks made by the Index and R.-P. Journal. I hate the very sight of the Index since the Abbot "Letter to Editors" appeared. No matter what the facts are, I hate the man who will stab another in the back or attack him when he is down. I would like to say a great deal more, but am too busy at present. At some future time I may write to Mr. Bennett at Albany. Yours truly, CHARLES ROTH.

Friendship.

BY HENRY A. STONE.

What is friendship? A sacred tie;
Though foes surround, 'twill never die;
A prize indeed, of hallowed birth,
A gem, of nameless, priceless worth.
It is not bought with sordid pelf
Or priceless stones of untold wealth,
But seeks ofttimes the lowly cot,
Where gaudy grandeur enters not.
When once 'tis born, unlike fair fame,
It never will belie its name.
Though sorrows deep or griefs surround,
Yet friendship ever true is found.
It severs not, though ills betide.
It wavers not though seas divide.
It falters not, though fortune's frown
At every step should bear thee down.
Then seek this gem of untold worth,
This priceless boon of hallowed birth,
And let thy life its fragrance lend
To bless and recompense thy friend.

THE Burton-on-Trent Chronicle publishes the following: "To William Richards, laboror, Hanbury-wood-end: Your wife having yesterday announced to me her intentions to hav your infant baptized at the dissenting chapel, I feel it my duty to warn you that if you persevere in that intention, and it should please God that the child should die, I shall not be able to read over it the burial service of the Church of England, since you prevented it from being made a member of that church and procured for it heretical baptism—that is, not performed by a 'lawful minister'—after having been solemnly admonished by me of the consequences of so doing. (Signed) Jeffrey R. Foot, M. A., Vicar of Hanbury. Dec. 4, 1879."

PURSUANT to the advice of the Linn County Association to the churches, requesting an investigation of the cause of separation between Elder Wm. T. Graves and his wife, the delegates of the churches met and organized by electing P. Moore, moderator, and N. P. Hopson, clerk. They then proceeded with the investigation, and, upon hearing the evidence, find that W. T. Graves has been guilty of treating his wife in a cruel and inhuman manner and of other unchristian conduct. We therefore advise Yellow Creek Church to call in his letter of commendation and exclude him from its membership, also revoke his license as a Baptist minister.

A WOLFISH SHEPHERD.—The latest revelations in regard to the management of the institution called the "Shepherd's Fold" show that the first newspaper statements on the subject, so far from exaggerating the actual condition of affairs, really fell far short of the truth. In the pages of fiction there are pictures painted of the suffering and torture of the neglected waifs of society; but no Dickens has ever imagined anything so sad and so distressing as the actual story of the "Shepherd's Fold." According to the testimony of some of the poor little outcasts, as given in the court, starvation, neglect, and immorality went together hand and hand in the Fold. The separation of the sexes was purely imaginary; in fact, body and soul were at the same time being destroyed by the Reverend Cowley. So far as the public at large is concerned, the question, putting aside that of cruelty and inhumanity, for it to consider is this: How under our laws could such a state of things hav existed? The Shepherd's Fold has a charter from the state. It has trustees or directors. It is under the control and direction of the State Board of Charities. With all these safeguards how is it possible that children could hav been half-starved to death? There must hav been neglect somewhere. A grave responsibility rests upon the shoulders of some one. Who is it? Who are they? And if, as has been shown in this case, it is possible that one such so-called charitable institution can exist, and for years and years go on torturing its victims and defrauding the charitable and benevolently disposed, the additional question naturally arises: How many other so-called "Folds" equally bad hav we in this city or the state? How many other children are being starved and maltreated? How many Cowleys hav we? It is to be hoped the state authorities, who are charged with the duty, will in some way giv the answer. —N. Y. Herald.

The Bible of To-day.
By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Taylor, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.
Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

What Is the Bible?
BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.
He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and givs an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

OF
STANDARD WORKS.
Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams. Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Paine's Political Works. In one volume, comprising Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), The Rights of Man, and Life of Paine, with a fine steel portrait. Cloth. $1.50.

The Age of Reason. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 25 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

The Age of Reason and the Examination of Prophecies. By THOMAS PAINE. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."
One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Truth Seeker Leaflets, of two pages each. Thirty-two in number; 4 cents per dozen; 8 cents for the set; 25 cents per hundred; $2.00 per thousand.

Adventures of Elder Triptolemus Tub. Comprises important and startling disclosures concerning hell, its magnitude, morals, employments, climate, etc. By Rev. GEORGE ROGERS. A rich, interesting little work. Paper, 15 cents.

BY

ROBERT G. INGERSOLL.

This volume is printed on toned paper, in clear, bold type, and handsomely bound in muslin, containing 275 pages, 12mo. Price, $1.25.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that have been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You have done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to have answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to have met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

Gems of Thought.

A HOUSE that has a library in it has a soul.—Plato.

I AM weary of life. Whatever path I take, I find it strewn with flints and thorns. Would that the time were come when I might depart in search of a world far different from this, wherein I feel so unhappy.—Petrarch.

THE doctrine of total depravity, as held by Calvin, legitimately nourishes a terrible misanthropy. Any one who holds this theory in vital consistency—that all men are naturally utter haters of good, and lovers of evil, detesting God and detested by God—must become a virtual misanthrope, and desire to escape from the scene of such a demoniac race.—Alger.

DEATH is better than life. Ah yes, to thousands
Death plays upon a dulcimer, and sings
That song of consolation, till the air
Rings with it, and they cannot choose but follow
Whither he leads. And not the old alone,
But the young also hear it and are still.
—Longfellow.

AN artist should be fit for the best society, and should keep out of it. Society has always a destructive influence on an artist; first, by its sympathy with his meanest powers; secondly, by its chilling want of understanding of his greatest; thirdly, by its vain occupation of his time and thoughts. Of course a painter of men must be among men; but it ought to be as a watcher, not as a companion.—Ruskin.

BUT pleasures are like poppies spread,
You seize the flower, its bloom is shed;
Or like the snowflakes in the river,
A moment white, then melt forever;
Or like the borealis race
That flit ere you can point their place;
Or like the rainbow's lovely form,
Evanishing amid the storm.—Burns.

IF justice and goodness be not the same in God as in our ideas, then we mean nothing when we say God is necessarily just and good; and for the same reason it may as well be said that we know not what we mean when we affirm that he is an intelligent and wise being; and there will be no foundation at all left on which we can fix anything. Thus the moral attributes of God, however they be acknowledged in words, yet, in reality, they are by these men taken away, and, upon the same grounds, the natural attributes may also be denied.—Clarke.

VULGAR natures almost invariably affect to look down on their superiors. They are conscious of the difference and interpret the difference as their own advantage. The mechanical holders by tradition consider the prophetic holders masters by original insight, heretics and inferiors. Dante was accused of impiety because he broke the basin in the Florentine Baptistry to save a child who had fallen into it, and was drowning; the idolaters of the latter thought Lossing an Infidel, and the mummers of a formula called Spinoza an Atheist.—Alger.

OUR hearts acquiesce in the dispensation which, instead of creating character in its perfection, leaves it to be perfected by effect. We can conceive no character in a created being worthy of affection which is not produced by a moral struggle; and, on the other hand, the greater the moral difficulties that have been overcome, the more worthy of affection does the character seem. Try to conceive a being created morally perfect without effect; you will produce a picture of insipidity which no heart can love. —Goldwin Smith.

IT is not my doctrine that men should reside in deserts, or sleep like owls in the hollow trunks of trees; but I am anxious to expel from their minds the excessive fear which they too frequently entertain of the opinion of the world. I would, as far as is consistent with their respective stations in life, render them independent. I wish them to break the fetters of prejudice, to imbibe a just contempt for the vices of society, and to seek occasionally a rational solitude, where they may so far enlarge their sphere of thought and action as to be able to say, at least for a few hours each day, "We are free."—Zimmerman.

TO BE capable of a great aim, and of sustained efforts to realize it, is to be one man taken out of ten thousand. They who have this capacity will not be found hovering about saloons, half crushed in the rush to the midnight tables of vulgar fashion. They will be found rooted in solitude. For the sustenance of their spirits they revert from the frothy speeches of the platform, from the spawn of the press, to the alcoved treasures and the aristocratic comrady of the great minds of all ages—the profound masters in the science of monopathy. Who would not rather be alone, and be capable of appreciating the dialogues of Plato, than be amidst the crew of a Mississippi flat-boat, dancing with boisterous mirth to a negro melody.—W. R. Alger.

IF the Christian asserts there is a God, he is bound to prove his existence, according to all rules of debate. I deny that He proves it himself. I deny that there is any proof that the works called his are God-made. Nature attests nothing save her own handiwork. The heavens declare nothing save the powers and potencies of matter. If the fool says there is no God, all nature proves the fool right, and the wise priest will do well to heed the truth. Children and fools are proverbially truthful. Of course I agree that we really do not know anything about the origin of all things, though we do know about the origin of some forms and identities. But matter being eternal, and worlds and all that in them are, being only matter in different shapes and under different combinations, we do not seek their origin, because they have none, as a whole. Only the different individual identities that form along all the ages are original; what they are formed of is eternal.—Mrs. E. D. Slenker.

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petiton is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibiy directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

Odds and Ends.

PUT the arm-chair in the attic,
It has earned a needed rest;
For the pair it oft supported
Now are married and gone West.

SMALL girl: "When I die I shall be singing with the angels;" (and after a thoughtful pause) "but I don't think I can sing much, for I don't know anything but a song or two in Pinafore."

A YOUNG lady at a ball was asked by a lover of poetry whether she had seen "Crabbe's Tales." "Why no," she answered. "I didn't know crabs had tails." "I beg your pardon," he said. "I mean hav you read 'Crabbe's Tales'?" "And I assure you, sir, I did not know that red crabs, or any other kind, had tails."

"ANETTA" wants to know if there is "a healing cure, a tender balm for a love-stricken heart?" Get seasick, Anetta; go to sea for a week; and if the blue Atlantic serves you as it served us you will spread it on record that it is just a little the balm balmedest balm you ever plastered on your love-stricken heart since you were old enough to write poetry.

SOFT as silk with golden hair,
Bright as stars were her eyes of blue;
Truly I loved my lady fair,
Truly my lady loved me, too.
Did it break my heart when my love lay dead?
Why, bless your soul, she didn't die.
Time wrought a change as it onward sped;
She loved another—so do I.

IF the young lady who wrote us those lines beginning,

I luv the twinklin' litl stars,
I luv the bluey sky;
For I kno' well there'll be mi home
When I go up sky high, will send us her address, she will receive by return mail two pounds of arsenic, with full directions for taking. One "sweet singer of wishy-gush" is enough in the same century.

WE do not envy the man who can fall in the public streets and get up with a sweet smile on his angelic countenance. He is a hypocrite and a scoundrel from the top of his head to the sole of his boots, and when he reaches home and he doesn't scold his wife and howl at his children, it is because those unfortunate parties saw him coming and fled in dismay. Thunder and all of heaven's artillery! show us the diabolical wretch. Let us clutch him. Giv us satisfaction in some shape. What is this world made for if a person can't hav the privilege of rebuking hypocrisy? Jupiter and Mars! By the way, Mariar, another pair of pants, if you please.

THE patriot preacher plods along
Through theological deeps,
The while the deacon—bless his soul—
Bows down his head and sleeps.

And when the preacher takes a rest
From theological matter,
The drowsy deacon rises up
And passes round the platter.

And when the plate, well filled with "chink,"
Comes to the pulpit's side,
The preacher givs the well-known wink,
"We've got it; let 'em slide,"

"HANNER, I decline de invatashun to der Grant inspshun at de Gault Tabern, from der fac' dat I mus' lay in mo' coal or freeze; an' seckumly, I nebber could w'ar'er swaller-tailed coat. I'se too fat. Doctor R. P. Fellows is a regularly educated and legally qualified physician.

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the Insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good DOCTOR is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

Freethinkers' Badge Pin.

The cut shows the design and size of the badge, but not its beauty. The whole badge is intended to signify symbolically that the "world moves," and that "universal mental liberty" is being spread over the world by the "leaves of learning." Badges made of heavy gold plate; price of single badge, package registered and postage paid, $1.25. Club of one dozen or more, ordered to one address, package registered and postage paid, $1.10 each. Remit by P. O. order or registered letter. For fractional parts of a dollar, postage stamps of the denomination of one, three, and ten cents taken. Orders filled in the order of their application. Badges to be had only from the patentee, LUCY L. CHURCHILL, West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus 'let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm. I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours. JAMES PARTON.

NOTHING makes a woman so mad as to go to a shoe store to buy a pair of cheap slippers for her husband, and hav a clerk try to sell her the identical pair she had just worked for a Christmas present for her minister.

A WRITER in the Jersey City Evening Journal very reasonably asks if the Irish people need to be fed, or if not what is the object of collecting money for a people who gave, last year, $400,000 to the Pope as Peter's pence?

IT was a temperance meeting. The speaker increases in eloquence and noise, and he cried, "Yes, my friends, we'll lift our temperance vessel out of the mire and mud, onto hard, dry ground, and then sail beautifully along."

AN ambitious Texan having read somewhere about the "Pope's bull," announces in one of the papers published in the interior of the state that he has a three-year-old brindle steer, blind in one eye, that he will match to whip any bull the Pope can produce.

A MEETING of the State Committee of the National Greenback-Labor party is called to be held in Syracuse on Tuesday, the 17th inst., and the chairmen of Greenback county committees and clubs and the editors of Greenback papers throughout the state are invited to meet with them.

A POMPOUS, fat Methodist parson, leading class, came across a lame sister. Thinking to comfort her about her infirmity, concerning which she was exceedingly sensitive, he said: "My sister, there'll be no cripples in heaven." "And no purse-guts, either," she snapped out, winding up the remark with a hearty "thank God!"

THE Presbyterians of Cleveland are warned by the Ministerial Union of that city concerning the alleged wickedness of buying and reading the Sunday papers. No action has been taken by the Union in regard to the papers which are made on Sunday and issued and read on Monday.

MR. STANDING BEAR, the distinguished Indian, heard Joseph Cook lecture the other day. "Heap Smart man," said Mr. Bear at the close of the lecture. "Talkee, talkee, talkee. Big sound. Who wind him up?" "No," said Mr. Cook, when he heard of it, "the Indian cannot be civilized. He's an infernal brute, and I can prove it."

SAMUEL WHITEMAN said "Amen" at the close of the family prayers, at Wayland, N. Y., rose from his knees and saw that John Selbeg, a hired boy, was sitting on a bag of choice apples. This was contrary to orders, and Whiteman pounded the lad on the head with a stick, destroying his hearing. A suit for damages has resulted in a verdict of $1,500.

WHILE the preacher was speaking upon "the seventeenthly" part of his sermon in the Methodist-Episcopal church at Fairfield, Ia., on the 25th ult., A. J. Speers, a young man, stood up in the midst of the congregation and cut his throat. Whether the "seventeenthly" or something else caused the rash act, a Fairfield jury is trying to determine.

A STORY is told of a darkey preacher in the South who took the text from Psalm lvii., 8: "Awake, psaltery and harp." He read it, "peaseltree and harp," and expended his time and energy on the peaseltree, describing its size and flowers and fruit, and how it was cultivated and was used solely to hang harps on. Unfortunately, he said, it could not be raised in this country.

A LAWYER before Justice Flammer cited a legal authority in support of his motion to discharge a prisoner arrested for drunkenness that is not often quoted with such effect in our courts. He read from Prov. xxxi, 7: "Let him drink and forget his poverty and remember his misery no more." The prisoner was discharged. Citations from the same volume might be made that would bring Oroshy's Society up, all standing.—N. Y. Truth.

MRS. JONES of Salt Lake City was much annoyed that one of the Mormon bishops should advise her husband to marry two more wives. So she followed the bishop along the street and smote him a number of times with a large broom. She also made her mark with the broom on the back of Jones, and persuaded him to change his mind as to his contemplated matrimonial complications. The two ladies who had expected to become the brides of Jones are discouraged and will now remain single.

A STOCKHOLDER in the Index Association informs us that the connection of Mr. Abbot with the Index will end next July. The directors hav decided that they cannot longer afford to pay Mr. Abbot $3,000 a year for his editorial services and will place the paper in the hands of the Free Religious Association. A new editor will be procured, who will be under the general supervision of Wm. J. Potter and Felix Adler. What Mr. Abbot will do is not known, but he informs his friends that he still proposes to "battle for the truth."

DAN RYBOLT started for church, at Freesville, Miss., and on the way asked a neighbor, who was to preach. "Parson Newling," was the reply. "I'd rather die than hear him," said Dan, and turned off toward a wood. He was afterward found hanging lifeless to a tree. The belief is that, as the clergyman was delivering a course of sermons on the dreadfulness of sin, and as Dan was an unregenerate sinner, an awakened conscience led to the suicide; but the scoffers hav a theory that death might reasonably be preferred to hearing one of Newling's long discourses.

THE old man Allen who hanged himself on Monday morning in the Tombs, where he had been sent to await trial on the charge of stealing the overcoat of Rev. W. S. Wood, an ex-chaplain of Sing Sing prison, succeeded in putting that clergyman in a very unpleasant position by leaving a letter which contains these lines: "J. W. D. Wood is my prosecutor; he informs me that he is a preacher of the gospel and implores the Almighty to forgive him his many sins, but he would not forgive me one sin. If he had I would not be where I am now. I die that I may sin no more." The Rev. Mr. Wood was in the habit of repeating the Lord's Prayer and preaching from the Sermon on the Mount. —Sun.

A BOY and a man were charged a few weeks ago, in a police court near London, with assaulting a clergyman while he was officiating at the funeral of one of his former parishioners. On the day in question he found the churchyard full of people, some of whom threw turf at him, knocking off his hat. While engaged in funeral ceremonies on other occasions, he had been insulted by boys, and he alleged that one of the defendants threw stones at him. Several witnesses were called for the defense, one of them a church warden, who said the rector on the day in question was so much under the influence of drink that he had to be assisted in the performance of the service.

PROTRACTED meetings in all the churches of Olney hav just closed. Strange to say, there was not a single conversion or addition to any church in that city, notwithstanding the fact that Olney is famous for her fine church buildings, her talented ministers, her fine school, and her intelligent and educated people. Just think of it! These ministers work hard for a whole month in $500,000 worth of churches and —effect nothing. John M. Wilson, ex-mayor of that city, says of it: "The general dissemination of knowledge and intellectual development, a sequence of our free schools, has given a death blow to orthodox intolerance and stupid inconsistency."

THE cap to the climax of the investigations touching the doings of the Rev. Mr. Cowley's "Shepherd's Fold" was furnished on Wednesday by Judge Fullerton's retirement from his position as counselor for Mr. Cowley. The Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children deserves the heartfelt gratitude of every father and mother in the country, and of the grand army of the little children, for unearthing and suppressing the infamies of this "Shepherd's Fold," a "Fold" whose chief shepherd seems to hav been a first-class wolf. The stories of starvation, of beating, of menial service performed by the little ones, and of other and nameless abuses, are enough to keep Cowley's name on the roll of infamy forever.

THE Rev. Dr. Pentecost said in a Detroit sermon: "Show me an Atheist and I will show you a corrupt man." An Atheist retorts with the following challenge: "He and I will go together through the jail, the house of correction, the gambling hell, and the lowest resorts of the city, accompanied by three disinterested Christian gentlemen as arbiters. For each Atheist (i. e. one who disbelieves or denies the existence of a God or supreme intelligent being, (see Webster's Unabridged) he finds among the persons in these places I will pay him $10. On the other hand, for each Christian i. e. 'one who professes to believe or who is assumed to believe in the religion of Jesus Christ,' whom we find among these classes he shall pay me $1.00."

GILBERT S. BALDWIN, a bookseller of 170 Madison street, Chicago, has been arrested by one R. W. McApee, Anthony Comstock's local spy, for selling "Cupid's Yokes." He sold the book on the strength of Attorney-General Deven's letter to Elizur Wright in which he says that he does not confound the book "with those obscene publications the effect of which is to excite the imagination and inflame the passions," Mr. Baldwin was taken before Commissioner Hayne and bound over to the 12th. Mr. Baldwin in a letter to the Chicago Tribune says he showed the book to the assistant postmaster, who declared it mailable. But Comstock seems to hav a perfect disregard for everybody's opinion but his own, and having got Benedict to rule it obscene, and having convicted two persons on it, it will probably go hard with Mr. Baldwin. If the case is tried on its merits there will be no difficulty. We hope there is more justice in Chicago than in New York.

AN informal meeting of the House Committee on Post-offices and Post-roads was held on the 6th, there not being a quorum present. However, it was agreed to allow the champion keyhole scrutinizer and procurer of false testimony, Anthony Comstock, to proceed with his little statement of what he had done and what he was going to do, and to express his opinion of the best method to stamp out this great evil of protecting the privacy of the mails. He also thought the mails should be debarred to newspapers publishing lottery advertisements. He remarked that he had refused to receive any support from the Government for services rendered as special post-office agent, deriving his support from the Society for the Prevention of Vice in New York. Gen. Singleton, of Illinois, was not present at this meeting, nor will he be at any one before which the sneak Comstock, for whom he entertains a hearty and profound contempt, appears. He vigorously opposed the project of allowing him to address the committee, and says that he declines to hear any common informer there or anywhere else.—Washington Post.

THE Leadville Herald is responsible for the following: "The other Sunday, down at Visalia, the theological narcotizer at the church had just triumphantly refuted Bob Ingersoll's doctrines, and had also congratulated his devout congregation that, although there was indeed a hell for sinners, thanks to his exertions, they were forever safe from the fire to come, when an irreligious man stuck his head into the door in time to catch the closing words. 'Do you state that for a fact?' 'Of course I do,' said the minister, much annoyed. 'Well, it's all right. I thought I'd just drift in and mention that there is a big fire in the Sunday-school room underneath; but if you're all fire-proof in here, why, of course, it doesn't matter.' There were only two legs and an arm broken by the congregation in scrambling out over the pews; and when the minister—who had dislocated his collar-bone by jumping from a rear window—came to realize that the fire referred to was confined to the basement stove, he felt convinced that, judging by his own feelings, it would require at least one hundred consecutive Sundays to jerk his flock up to their normal religious status on the profanity question."

The damage done to piers, hotels, and bathing-houses at Coney Island will amount to one hundred thousand dollars.

The Origin of Man.

BY PROF. WM. DENTON.

The universe is a universe of life. Wherever the exploration of discovery or of science reaches, whether it be in the deep mine, or in the ocean depths, or even in the wide air, we find, not emptiness and death, but a teeming world of life; life in endless varieties of form; life within life; life, from the animalcule, and the lowest, minutest forms, to man, the sum and brain of existence. The natural question arises in every thinking mind, How came all this world of life and motion? How came I into being?

The answer must be one of two things. It was either by the operation of miracle, or it was by the operation of law. There is nothing in all the realm of geology, nothing in the majestic revelations of astronomy, so emphatically, so clearly and unmistakably enforced, as the evidence that all things proceed under inflexible law. Our planet was rounded by the law of gravitation. By the law of cohesion the particles of matter are held together; while the law of crystallization give them perfectly geometric and beautiful forms. We find ourselves on a planet that has been developed into its existing state, with all its world of variety in forms of life and natural scenery, under the operations of law; all by natural causes. We do not dream of finding evidences of any intervention of miracle in these operations. The globe spins forever on its axis, as it goes whirling around the sun, bringing summer and winter, seed-time and harvest; the sky is lighted at dawn and at sunset with the perfected glories of color, on a mighty scale, now, as in the ages past; the woods wave, the fields grow green, the waves dash against their rocky shores, generations of men and other creatures come and go, and ever the old world is being pulled down, and the improving new world built up; the acorn becomes the oak; and out of the same law, and the same process of unfolding and progression, is developed a Lyell, to show us the meaning of the earth's rocky ribs and containing crust, or a Humboldt, to show us the law of all things.

It wasn't long ago that our teachers taught us that the crashing thunder was the voice of an angry God, that the lightning was the flashing of his indignant eyes, that the destroying tornado was his wrathful breath, that the earthquake, which overthrows cities and swallows up their inhabitants, was a mode by which he visited punishment upon sinners. We hav learned better since that time. Now we recognize in the thunder and the lightning the beneficent action of a mighty and universal force, that clears and purifies the air we breathe and liv in; we see in the tornado the unfailing action of nature's law to maintain the aerial equilibrium; we recognize in the earthquake one part of the action of that mighty process of cooling and contraction which is still going on. Its thickening rocky crust opposing to the interior molten mass such bounds as the fire, acting always under law, must here and there burst through.

Everywhere we find law—law and its manifestations; nowhere do we find miracle. In slowly rising to this plane of perception, the teachers hav not failed to set aside certain subjects, and reserve them especially for the domain of miracle, if other things had to be given up. But one by one these special reservations of theology hav been conquered and reclaimed. Miracle only reigns where ignorance prevails; it ends where knowledge begins.

Law must hav presided over the development of life, just as it clearly has presided over all that preceded that development. If I am told that behind all this impressive universal manifestation of law there is an intelligent ruling spirit, I recognize the truth of the assertion. Evidently there is such a universal and beneficent ruling spirit. But it rules by law, and therefore makes no mistakes—never has to mend things.

Thus was our world, thus was the universe of worlds, made; thus does everything move, from an infinite past to an infinite future.

I believe there is a law of vitality by which the first forms of organic animal life came into existence without the agency of the preceding egg. Nay, that originating law of vitality holds even below the realm of the animal kingdom; it shows itself in the geometrically perfect and beautiful forms of crystals and minerals. Take the beautiful clay-stones of the Connecticut valley—below the water-line I hav found them—growing in the very perfection of geometrical proportion and beautiful forms, unseen and unknown, down in beds of mud. The principle of life inheres even in these lowly things, the particles aggregate, and life is developed. When we go below these forms, to the atoms, we find the microscope of no use; but why should we believe that law governs one realm and not the other? Put a handful of hay in water, let it soak there three or four days, and you find the water begins to be tinged with green, and an inspection reveals that it is fairly swarming with life—animal or vegetable life, or both. Whence comes this life? Some scientists tell us the whole air is full of almost infinitely small life-germs, and that these are developed in the hay-water by the necessary conditions—warmth and moisture. Possibly. But how much heat will these microscopic lives endure? Let us set the water boiling. They are still as lively as ever. Try a hotter degree still; hermetically seal the neck of the flask and subject it to a heat of five hundred degrees—as has actually been done. If any of these alleged life-germs from the air are there, we cannot conceive of such life surviving that tremendous degree of heat. But even then and there, after that test, we hav still found life. Even with no hay, or other vegetable organization, we hav still found life to exist at that degree of heat, and that, too, after having been developed out of merely chemical, unorganized conditions. And men are now discussing the question whether life originates in such germs or not. But there is a law of vitality, by which, under proper conditions of heat and moisture, living beings come into life. This was the case in the ancient seas—before man was. In those inconceivably remote times there were countless millions of organic forms brought into being under that law. Hence I do not believe Darwin is right in saying that life started on this planet by its being breathed into some original lower form. Against that idea he even contends himself. A miracle is still a miracle, whether it be wrought upon a trilobite, a human being, or an angel. Life divine exists in every atom of the universe. The divine spirit is a part of us and of all creation; he is in the lower as in the higher form, and a part of it; and hence he cannot stand out of it and breathe into it its life; he is always in it and ready to start life as soon as the lawful and orderly conditions permit.

But if Darwin is wrong on that point, he is right on other and important points. He is right in ascribing the origin of our lives to ancient and early forms. There is, from the first, a law of variation, by which the progeny of creatures will deviate, in some respects, from the original stock as soon as such creatures begin to propagate. The boy, who so wonderfully resembles his father, is found to be not like his father, after all; he differs in important respects. The girl does not exactly resemble her mother; there is a point of departure manifest; peculiarities arise which are not accounted for. In western Massachusetts lived Seth Wright, an owner of sheep. He found one of his sheep, from some unseen cause, to hav shorter legs than the rest. It was found that when the flock were on the run, this one sheep couldn't follow the rest in jumping over a stone wall. "Here," said Wright, "is a kind of sheep worth having; I'll see if I can't raise that kind." He went to work at breeding from that sheep, and by saving out its lambs and preserving their inherited mark, he soon had flocks of short-legged sheep. They couldn't jump over any stone wall. Except for the Merino wool, which about that time began to be brought to the American market, these short-legged sheep would be the rule to-day. This principle of selection and heredity is at the bottom of the origin of species.

Go lower, and you find it vindicated in the endless variety of seaweeds, some changing into such forms that natural history students hav regarded them as actually belonging to different genera. It is so of sponges; so of calcareous growths. The tall man has an ancestry and brotherhood of tall men. The Syrian nose of the Jew is on the monuments of Egypt, carved 3,000 years ago. Wherever a variety makes its appearance, it is transmitted. Animals will deviate until new varieties are followed by new species and new genera.

"Ah, but," you say, "they don't go so far as that! They come round again to the original type."

But do they? Does geology, does geography, confirm your assertion?

Go to the Galapagos Islands, in the Pacific, seven hundred miles off the Ecuador coast of South America, and you find peculiar birds, such as exist nowhere else; peculiar in structure. But, as Darwin says, they are still South American birds. Why? if they are of a different species? Because they are comparatively near South America. So of the animals of New Guinea—they are like the animals of Australia becase the island is near Australia; so of the Cape de Verdes—even their original stock was African. It is certain these existing types are of that character, but they were bred apart until new species arose. That principle is world-wide. Then comes the law of modification. I have seen in Virginia a cherry tree one hundred and fifty feet high; yet the same kind of tree away up north, on the Great Slave Lake, only attains a hight of ten feet. Other trees illustrate the same law, as I have seen in noting the same kinds in the South and in Wyoming. There are on the slopes of the Rocky Mountains fine timber trees, as thick as a man's body, but only six feet high. In elevated South American mining regions, ten thousand feet up, the men have the largest chests of any race. Why? Because there is more work for the lungs to do, and bigger lungs to do it, owing to the thin air, which compels more breathing. And this mark of big chests is an inherited quality. Among these South American miners there came an Englishman, who, struck by the abundance of wild hares, bethought him of sending to England for a pack of hounds to hunt the hares. He obtained the hounds and started them after the hares; but lo! the hounds, after running about a mile, lay down, panting. They couldn't run; the air was too rare for them. But the man found that, by breeding, their descendants could chase the hares all day! Their lungs were developed under this modifying law I speak of.

And the same law accounts for the eyeless fish of the Mammoth Cave.

But, says the miracle advocate, those eyeless fish are fitted to their habitation; it is just what we might expect; God made them so,

But stop a moment. Let us examine. Take a knife, cut away the place where eyes should be, remove the outer covering, and what do we find? Lo! a little eye! A rudimentary-looking eye—or rather what was once an eye in the far back ancestry of this fish—and an optic nerve! Now, if these fish were made by miracle, why that eye, or any need of that optic nerve at all?

I think it was made by modification. These fish were in an ancient river. The geological changes which produced the cave itself led the river, by gravitation, to flow into it. Generations of fish born in darkness, and finding eyes useless, were not very long in finding themselves no longer possessed of eyes. Tie up your right arm, leave it for a sufficient time without exercise, and it will be useless. There are lots of people who, from want of the proper exercise of a certain organ, go about with empty, rattling skulls. In the case of that fish, generation after generation came with steadily diminishing eyes, till finally no eyes were left, for lack of any use for eyes. Other creatures in the cave show the working of the same law. Whence came the red cabbage and the cauliflower, loved of our German friends? Lyell says they came from a bitter plant obtained from the sea. Cultivation—changed conditions—did the rest; and it was done by virtue of the law of modification. But inherently there was a principle in that bitter sea-plant that was capable of this fine development, and only awaited the requisite conditions.

Then comes the broad, natural law of selection mentioned by Darwin. Various creatures reproduce themselves in almost infinite numbers; the carp produces nine millions of that kind of fish at a single birth. Only the strongest or the best equipped survive. Whatever is unfitted for the battle of life is ruthlessly crowded to the wall. Suppose a lion without claws. Nature says, Away with you! I've no place for any such lion. Turn loose every dog in the world; how long would the lapdogs survive? Take the red grouse of Scotland; it feeds among red heather. Wonderful provision by God's action—saves the grouse from falcons and eagles. "What a beautiful provision!" exclaims the miracle-believer. But hold. Do not the hawks and eagles also need a breakfast? And suppose one grouse had been born white—as some were—his progeny would all fall a prey to foes, and all the living grouse would be red.

God's providence is a general providence; it watches over the whole universe; and all things, plants and animals, are suited to their own conditions.

"Do you believe, then, that blind law made this wondrous mechanism of the seeing eye, the hearing ear?"

No, it is not a blind force; it is the manifestation of an infinite and beneficient Spirit. Nothing but intellect could hav produced the intellect of man. But the process is always governed by natural law. Investigate the wide realm of things. Nothing else makes its appearance to account for what we see; scientists recognize no other law.

Two men were discussing how a baby grows. One said it was done by "a fairy," who gets inside the sleeping child and stretches its limbs and makes them grow. The other said, "No, it was by sucking, by sleep, by exercise." And so say I. When you tell me the fairy story, the miracle story, I shake my head. We see the work of law and order in all the development of man. It is not a blind force; it is governed by the highest intelligence. I see the operations of the infinite spirit; but it is the operation of law. He can only act through law; it is a part of himself. He has done so in everything from this world's fiery birth to the development we find to-day. Its most significant feature is the law of metamorphosis. All animals are alike at one period of their history; all come from an egg. In that germinal state man and the mosquito are alike. The queenly moth develops from the blind silkworm, the frog from the wiggling tadpole, and, using his newly developed legs and discarding his tail, he takes his first mouthful of fresh air in a newer and better world—a gentleman frog. If there had been no fish there would hav been no frog. So of man; he is no exception to the rule. There was a time when he was a mosquito; there was a time when he was a fish; there was a time when he was a reptile; a time when he was a young bird, and then a mammal. He has gone through a series of forms similar to the forms he went through as a fœtus.

The miracle-believer turns up his nose at this. But that very man once had gills like a codfish.

Why do we hav a pulsating heart, with all this system so fearfully and wonderfully made? If there had never been a fish, there had never been a reptile; never a reptile, never a bird or mammal—never a man. Through tens of millions of years, on the ladder of life, hav we ascended to the magnificent position we occupy to day. You laugh at this? Then you are given to love a life, and much good may i do you.

The more we examine into nature's wondrous laws and works, the stronger becomes the proof of the doctrine I here lay down.

I am answered, there is a great "gap" between the ape and man. But there is actually less difference between the lowest Australian and the monkey than there is between the same Australian and a Darwin or a Humboldt.

It is further said that forms are so linked and blended that in some cases we cannot tell whether they are animal or vegetable; the protozoa and the mollusca; the fish and the amphibia; gills and lungs. Between reptiles and birds there is a wide gap, but it is rapidly filling up. There are fossil reptiles that are half reptile, half bird. The platypus, or ornithorhyncus, of Australia, is a sort of musk-rat with the bill of a duck and claws like a cat's; and it rears its young from eggs. Go on to the apes and the gorillas; they seem to be lifting up their hands to the lowest man.

There is another significant "pointer" to the work of the law of modification in its relation to our common origin; it is the redundant, or so-called rudimentary, organs of various animals. The cow has no front teeth in her upper jaw, but chews by moving her jaws sideways. But her unborn calf has those front teeth—only they are never cut through. If the cow was made to giv us milk, why are these teeth not cut through. What do I think? I think the original variation was by a cow who found she could chew by this lateral motion of her jaws, and that this practice was transmitted, till finally, in later generations, such teeth being unused, only the rudiments of these teeth were produced. So of people in our country. They are losing their teeth for want of use—eating too much soft food. The unborn calf, having the missing teeth, is in the condition of his ancestors.

Some people can move their ears, Gorillas can move their scalps, and frighten other creatures by doing it. The skeleton of man has a tail. It points—points away back to ancestral traits millions of years ago.

I listen, at this point, to the answer from those who oppose this theory. What is that answer? I find it generally ridicule. "So-o-oh! we hav a monkey for our grandfather, and an oyster for our grandmother."

Well, my friend, what do you believe?

"I believe the first human being was made from dust."

"I believe God made it by a special act."

If you believe God comes down here and works like a mechanic, I do not. I believe he works far away, through the infinity of forms. If you believe in an instant, complete creation of man, what becomes of the million other forms, in all time? Where are they, and what were they for? Every geological era has its own teeming life-forms. Does any man believe an infinite being comes to earth to create and keep up forms?

But some say, and even Agassiz: "What a degrading theory! what a degrading idea! to believe we came from such low types of life! If I believed it, I would never tell of it! I believe man was originally created in the image of God as the Bible says."

Yes, let us see that primal pair in the garden. What a noble, god-like brow the old man has! What a majestic person! What a man! And the woman—what a lovely creature! The rose blushes in her cheek. The star of evening is not more lustrous than her eye. The odor of the rose and the apple-blossom is not sweeter than her breath. And how mellow and musical her voice! The very trees bend to offer this noble pair their fruit. And I look over the face of the planet to-day, and exclaim, "What has six thousand years done?" These brutes in human shape, black or white; these thick lips, these protruding jaws, these sooty faces, these protuberant bellies, spindle shanks, and glaring eyes, looking as if the devil had made them. If six thousand years has done this, what, in God's name, will six thousand more years do? It will bring the race into the condition of fighting baboons and alligators in Florida. An orthodox hell would be just the place for such a set.

But we, who believe in the origin of all life from the primal seas, can say: "My brother, the race has come up in harmony with God's universal law of progress, and there is a future for us. No heaven is too high, no state of spiritual and intellectual progression too great, for a race with such a history. Where, then, lies the 'degradation?' On which side?"

Our opponents' position is best illustrated by a man seen standing on a lofty pillar. I come along and ask a man I meet, "How came that man away up there?" "Why," exclaims the man, "an angel came down and took him by the hair, and placed him there." This I cannot readily believe. Going round behind the pillar I discover a long ladder. It reaches all the way up to the top. But several rounds are missing. There is a vacant place where a half dozen rounds are lacking, two-thirds of the way up, and others are missing here and there. I call my friend and tell him the ladder is the way by which that man got up there. "Nonsense," he responds, "do you call that a ladder? Why, don't you see the rounds are missing? I tell you an angel took him up there by the hair, and if you don't believe it you are an Infidel."

But I look around and presently see a ladder-rung sticking up out of the ground. I dig, and finally unearth another, and then another. They fit exactly into the ladder. They diminish some of the gaps. I believe they will all be found, and the ladder again be seen complete.

"But if we came from the brute, to the brute we shall return."

Nay, this does not follow. Even if the brute perishes with this life—which I by no means concede—even then your conclusion does not follow. Take two apple seeds. One is vitalized and will grow; the other will not. Between them there is the difference of infinity. A little more sap and sunshine has made one a perpetual life, while the other perishes. So, if brutes perish, I do not believe that man does, for a brute might hav missed the conditions of immortality. We hav reason, however, to think the contrary. But as to man, I know that death does not end him.

Here I wish to meet the objection that this theory of the origin of life "destroys religion." Man is as much a religious being as he is a musical being. The religion of to-day is not a scientific religion. Nobody is to blame for this, for the people are not a scientific people. Their religion was born of ignorance. Do I think it will always be so? No! Science and religion are brothers. The more glorious the advances of science, the grander the truths of a true religion. We shall eventually hav a religion no man need blush to own, when men shall recognize the existence of the father and mother of universal humanity, whose stripes are given us for our good; when men, grown wiser, shall be brothers, and leave this old world better than they found it.

Some of Comstock's Work Cropping Out.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Reading the editorial of a week ago or more in your paper it reminded me of a remark made to me by one of Comstock's allies last summer, when canvassing for "Cupid's Yokes" in this city, where I hav sold thousands unmolested since Mr. Bennett's imprisonment. Turning round in his chair, with "Cupid's Yokes" in his hand, he said something like this: "Mr. Bennett's friends are not going to get him out as easily as they expect; this time we fixed it all beforehand." He gave me to understand that before Bennett's case was acted upon imprisonment was made sure of in advance.

Sincerely, Josephine S. Tilton.

At eight o'clock precisely Mr. Reuben Dailey, editor of the Jeffersonville (Ind.) Daily News, stepped to the footlights and delivered an able address on the "Life and Services of Thomas Paine," from which we take the following points:

Ladies and Gentlemen: Time brings its revenges and its rewards. Although tardy it is in the reward due the honored apostle of civil and religious liberty, whose natal day we meet this evening to celebrate, yet it is none the less real or less sure of competent accomplishment. His life went out in a black night of religious bigotry, and his enemies hav pursued him with vandal malice after death. No words hav been considered too harsh for him, no character too black or damnable to fit him, and to-day he stands for all that is hideous, repulsive, and hellish in the minds of many ignorant people. He has even been irreverently termed Tom Paine, just as we speak of Tom Allen, Joe Goss, or some other champion of the Christian prize-ring. Well, be it so. Let us take the name of Tom Paine—that synonym of disgrace, vice, immorality to an ignorant and bigoted multitude of priest-followers—and sound it with deepest feelings of reverence—with the most thrilling sensations of patriotic ardor and enthusiasm. I am sure no intelligent and candid American patriot can be thrilled with the glowing eulogies of Washington without hearing from the deepest recesses of his heart the grand and swelling echoes that come back with the chorus, "Without the pen of Thomas Paine the sword of Washington might hav fought in vain." His unsullied character and matchless nerve made him the life and soul of the most blessed revolution ever given to man since the dawn of creation on the barren earth, or since time and eternity hav been measured by the science of man. Do not suspect me of indulging in "gush" or hyperbole or extravagant eulogy, for language is poor, stammering, and trashy when it comes to sounding the pæans of praise of the martyr, Thomas Paine.

In the present light of ages, but dim and obscured, I might at best be considered a wild, rattle-brained enthusiast when I say that of the two heroes, Paine and Christ, Paine has given the most valuable and lasting blessings to man. Jesus of Nazareth, in the far-distant future, will be numbered among the central figures of many different religions. He may occupy a place with Buddha, Confucius, Mohammed, and that class of so-called spiritual guides, but Thomas Paine, when the world's history is complete, will be the cap-stone of civil freedom. I don't say religious freedom, for as men advance in learning—in arts and sciences—religion, itself a barren delusion, will fade away and become a thing of curiosity, and not a matter of admiration or use to mankind.

Let us drop rhetoric, drop eulogy, and deal in cold chunks of hard, stubborn facts. Jesus came as the representative of a narrow-minded, religious delusion among the Jews. There was a tradition among them that a Messiah should come and save the nation. I believe that was originally a literal earthly savior, but, like all other frauds promised by the priesthood, when it could no longer be foisted upon the people in the shape of a temporal affair, it was changed into that of a heavenly Messiah. The reward was not to be here, but hereafter, just as the ancient Druids used to borrow money of their blind devotees and giv them notes payable in the next world; and, in fact, just as our preachers do at this present time, who, in begging from the people, tell them that their reward will be great in the kingdom of heaven.

Born in Thetford, Sussex, England, January 27, 1737, the first public act of his life was to write, in 1772, a pamphlet, entitled, "The Case of the Excise Officers," and although this was specially intended to cover the case of a very ill-paid class of government officers, it was a remarkably clear and concise showing that the only way to make the people honest was to relieve them from the necessity of being otherwise. His superior officers placed him under the ban, and in April, 1774, he paid the penalty of his temerity by the loss of his petty office. In 1774 Paine met Franklin in London. The latter was there on an embassy to the British government, and perceiving in Paine abilities of no ordinary character he advised him to quit his native country and try his fortunes in America. In two months Paine is in Philadelphia. The storm of the Revolution has broken forth in its fury. The black pall of war covers the land, the flashes of artillery light up the heavens, and the thunderings of the conflict shake the earth. In the dread lull after those battles, at the close of the year 1775, we see Washington, John Adams, Benjamin Rush, and Franklin considering the awful news they hav received. An oppressive silence reigns. They stand on the shores of the Rubicon. Then Thomas Paine arrives. He comes as if sent by heaven. With thrilling voice he cries, "These colonies of America must be independent of England; that is the only solution of the question!" It is electric! Treasonable words against the mother country! Political heresy! Pleading for our manhood, for self-government, for the natural nobility of a liberty-loving people; and then you see his compatriots, each a few moments ago blanched with fear at his awful suggestion, catch his invincible spirit. They go forth nerved to battle, nerved for the crisis, strengthened for that deadly contest which must ensue, go determined to conquer or die.

The tribute of his greatest enemy was, "The cannon of Washington were not more formidable to the British than the pen of the author of 'Common Sense.'" Mr. Paine held several positions during the Revolutionary war, and was ever found where he could do the most good for the cause. He went with Colonel Laurens to France to obtain a government loan of £1,000,000 annually during the war, and was eminently successful. He suggested and aided in the raising of a camp of 10,000 soldiers, formed of volunteers from New Jersey, Maryland, and Pennsylvania. During an emergency he subscribed $500, all the money he had, for the support of the soldiers, and in every way writing, suggesting, and planning for the success of American independence. At the conclusion of the war Pennsylvania donated to him £500, and New York gave him the confiscated estate of Frederick Devoe, situated at New Rochelle, N. Y., consisting of three hundred acres of land under a high state of cultivation. He went to England in 1787; but in 1788 the situation in France became exceedingly interesting, and attracted the attention of all Europe. Paine's fame had preceded him. Seeing that the downfall of Bourbonism was at hand, he went to the realm of Louis XVI. to be a participator in that event, and gave the weight of his influence in the further establishment of the rights of humanity as against tyranny.

In March, 1791, he published the first part of his "Rights of Man," an able and conclusive reply to the reflections of Edmund Burke upon the French Revolution. Mr. Paine was in London in the year 1791, preparing the second part of his "Rights of Man," and having got hold of the name of the printer, the authorities employed this printer to purchase the copyright of Paine. At first the royal briber offered a hundred guineas, then five hundred, and at last a thousand; but honest, patriotic Thomas Paine said: "No! that he would never put it into the power of any printer or publisher to suppress or alter his work." Here negotiations ended.

While in England, in 1792, a French deputation announced to Mr. Paine that he had been elected to represent the Department of Calais in the National Convention of France. At Dover, whither he repaired to embark for France, the treatment of the minions of British despotism was disgraceful in the extreme. During his stay in Calais, before leaving for Paris, there was a continued ovation offered to him by the citizens of that city.

Such was the enthusiasm of the French people for Paine that he was also elected Deputy for Abbeville, Beauvais, and Versailles; but the people of Calais having first expressed their preference, he felt it a duty to remain as their representative.

Paine was released from a French prison November 4, 1794, after eleven months of imprisonment, and was kindly invited to the house of Monroe, where he spent eighteen months of his time.

He returned to America in 1806, in the seventieth year of his age.

After his release from prison he wrote the second part of the "Age of Reason," and several other works in the interest of popular government. Mr. Paine was active in the formation of a society called the "Theophilanthropists," which appears to hav been a cross between a church and a society formed for the advancement of morals.

Mr. Paine's motto was the best religion that could be furnished to man: "The world is my country; to do good, my religion. I believe in one God and no more, and I hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe in the equality of man. I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy."

His death took place at New Rochelle, N. Y., in June, 1809, in the seventy-second year of his age. I hardly think it necessary to dwell on the numerous slanders which religious malice has invented against his good name. The purity of his soul is attested by the fact that he was ever against the rich and the powerful, and in favor of the poor. That he was never a drunken sot is proved by the ripe old age to which he lived, and the magnificent testimonials to his worth by the eminent men of his age. That he did not die in poverty is proved by his will, and that he never recanted has been ably proved by Colonel Ingersoll; but the fact that he wrote the "Age of Reason" when daily in anticipation of death, the fact that he spent eleven months in the presence of the guillotine and came near dying of typhoid fever, was the best proof that he was sincere and believed in all what he wrote.

There remains now for me to state, after a review of his life, if I am prepared to withdraw my assertion in regard to

Seventh Letter from Albany.

PENITENTIARY, Feb. 8, 1880.

MY DEAR READERS AND FRIENDS: Still another moon has come and waxed and waned, and I am still here in prison as safe and sound as ever. Among the few pleasures allowed me is to receive letters from you and to write you once every four weeks. It is with gladness that I perform my part of this little business. First of all I wish to assure you, my friends, that I am feeling much better than when I wrote you last. I hav found again the art of sleeping, my appetite and digestion are all that could be asked, and I am as cheerful as the nature of the case will permit.

There was a hope indulged among some of my friends that when my term was "partly served out" the President would see fit to open my prison doors and let me go home. In fact there was a sort of semi-official statement made to that effect, but that hope proved as illusive as the one that was indulged in early in my imprisonment, in view of the fact that the President did not consider mailing "Cupid's Yokes" was a violation of the statute under which I was convicted, and that Attorney General Devens did not regard the pamphlet as "obscene" in the meaning of the law; that several members of the Cabinet had expressed the opinion that there was no good reason why I should be imprisoned; that Judge Gray, the pardon clerk, was in favor of my being restored to liberty; that the President's private secretary had declared it an outrage that I should be imprisoned on such a frivolous pretext; all this, with the still greater fact that two hundred thousand of as good people as there are in America respectfully asked the President to perform a simple act of justice and set me at liberty; that he took the matter into consideration and did promise, while I was still awaiting his pleasure in Ludlow-Street Jail, that he would sign a pardon. That promise was broken. Comstock set himself at work. He induced numerous Sunday-school children between eight and fifteen years of age to sign petitions to Mrs. Hayes that Bennett be kept in prison. He induced many clergymen in New York, New England, and other places to do the same. Even the Rev. Leonard Wolsey Bacon, of Norwich, Conn., exercised his vast abilities in the same direction. The pressure was immense. Mrs. Hayes' pastor said Bennett must not be pardoned. Mrs. Hayes, of course, reiterated her pastor's injunction. The President listened, faltered, and concluded he must obey home orders. The time was when Rutherford was a good little boy, and probably he is still.

"Mary had a little lamb,"
That didn't dare say boo,
And ev'ry thing his wife did say,
Ruthy was sure to do.

The wife's instructions were obeyed. To make the thing more secure, however, I am informed that Comstock visited Washington in person and took with him the somewhat foolish but harmless letters which Bundy and Abbot were afterwards unkind enough to publish. Comstock is said to hav also taken with him the immaculate paragon to whom the letters were written. He took the letters and the woman before the President. He, of course, used both with his wonted ability with his Excellency against myself. The procuring of private letters written two years before, and using them to cause me to be retained in prison was quite worthy of the man—just in his line. The malice of himself and the woman were probably about equal, and quite sufficient for any vile purpose. The President listened to their malicious misrepresentations. His promise was set aside, and I was peremptorily ordered to this prison. What connection a lot of private letters two years old had with the statute under which I was arrested, or with the charge upon which I had a mock trial and an unjust conviction, or with the question whether I should be set at liberty or not, is hard to be seen. And I will giv my honest opinion right here that any man who would let such considerations and such persons swerve him in the discharge of his duty and his promise is unfit to be the Chief Executive of this great country—despite Joseph Bradley's casting vote. However ill-advised those letters were, no law was broken in the writing of them; no person was injured by them; none were sought to be injured. What business Comstock had with them, what business the President had with them, or what business anybody else had with them, is not clear; but they served Comstock's purpose well, and they were afterwards placed in the hands of Bundy, and what he and Abbot did with them is well known. They thought they saw their opportunity to do me a great injury and a chance for themselves to rise upon my downfall. They co-operated with alacrity with Comstock and the "special agent" of the R.-P. Journal. Yes, the church demanded that I should not be liberated, and the President obeyed its behest. It was, however, given out, as observed and published in the New York dailies, that I would not be released till a part of my time had been served out.

Here a hope was given that in a few months justice would be done me. When my health gave way, two months ago, several symptoms presented themselves more or less alarming; vertigo, an unnatural feeling in the cerebellum, and a constant ringing in the head were present. These are often the precursors of apoplexy and paralysis. My strength gave way; my appetite failed; for days together I took not a mouthful of food; I fell off in flesh; my mind became affected, and sleep nearly entirely forsook my eyelids for weeks in succession. A feverish and nervous condition was upon me. I felt that I was breaking down under the physical and mental pressure forced upon me. Several who saw me had the same opinion and thought me a decidedly changed man from my former self. My wife thought I was going to die. I was not unwilling to do so. She hurried to Washington, taking with her petitions which had not before been sent on, bearing some thirty thousand names, asking the President for my release. She had an interview with the President. With tears, she prayed and implored him to do the simple act of justice of granting me liberty. She told him of my condition and her fears. For the moment he seemed touched. He told her to hav the physician of the prison here make out a statement in reference to my condition. This was done. The physician made a truthful statement of the case, and added that he feared I could not get better while under such close confinement. This was sent to the President. Two or three other physicians also sent statements corroborative in character.

It was urgently hoped that the Chief Executive would perform the simple act which both justice and mercy dictated. Friends in Washington called upon him urging him to this course. Numerous letters in the same direction were sent to him from all parts of the country. The Attorney-General told a friend that he had reported favorably on the application for a pardon to be granted, and he thought it would be. My poor wife was in an agony of hope, suspense, and anxiety. I, of course, participated in the same. Day after day, and even week after week, passed, and every hope was broken. The disappointment to my poor wife was great indeed, and almost resulted in the agony of despair and a fit of settled illness.

It was learned that my arch-enemy had, through a spy, been informed of the effort that was being made, when he at once telegraphed to Washington to stay proceedings until he could be heard from. The church influence was again brought to bear with such force that, combined with home orders, a pardon was again prevented. Yes, the Executive again hesitated and refused to do his duty. And now that arch-enemy gets up in his pious pow-wow in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association in New York, and after exulting over being able to prevent a pardon, and after denouncing me in bitterest terms, he lauds the President for the possession of moral courage. Bah! A greater falsehood could not be uttered. That is exactly the quality of character the Executive lacks. Had he "moral courage" he would not suffer pious hypocrites to deter him from performing a just and righteous deed. He knows I am imprisoned unjustly. He knows that I hav done nothing that any American citizen has not a perfect right to do, and that I ought to be as free this moment as he is himself. But Comstock and the clergy say I must not be liberated, and he dares not disobey them. "Moral courage" with a vengeance!

But let no one longer expect "clemency" in my case from the man now filling the presidential chair. I say, Let him keep his "clemency." I hope no friend of mine will again ask him for a quality he has so little of and parts with so reluctantly. If any choose to write him expressive of their opinion of his conduct, it is no business of mine; but do not ask him again for clemency.

Less than three months now remain of the sentence which that religious bigot, Benedict, passed upon me; and every man who has given a note at ninety days, payable in bank, knows how quickly that time will roll around. It may not seem quite so short to me, but it is not long at most.

Thanks to a good constitution, which has not been abused, and thanks to the recuperative energies of nature, I am much better. The vertigo has largely passed away; the unnatural feeling in the head has departed; the feverishness and nervousness hav left; sleeplessness troubles me no more; my appetite has returned; my mind is tolerably serene, and, in the language of the immortal bard of Avon, "Richard is himself again."

The annual public meeting of Comstock's obscene society, just alluded to, and held January 16th, reminds me of an Indian pow-wow, or war-dance, when, after a victory is over, some fellow-Indians meet together to torture their captives and exult in savage joy over the victory they hav gained. Bancroft, in his History of the United States, describes one of these savage scenes. Returning from one of their cruel battles, the victorious demons had with them an Iroquois prisoner, and on their way home they crushed his hands between stones, tore off his fingers, and scorched and gashed his arms. Upon reaching home they mocked him by wiping the thick drops of sweat from his brow, in hypocritical kindness, handing him a pipe, and giving him a young squaw, as if a bride. This was only to add intensity to the pains and indignities already thrust upon him. When they brought him forth for the final torture, the brave man said: "My brothers, I am going to die; make merry with good heart; I am a man; I fear neither death nor your torments." They then took him to the cabin of blood. A war-chief strips the prisoner, shows him, naked, to the spectators present, and assigns to the young men selected as torturers their parts in the hellish work. Then ensued a scene of the most horrible character, which lasted through the night, "when the wretched victim, bruised, gashed, mutilated, half-roasted, and scalped, was carried out of the village and hacked in pieces." This horrid deed was called a "religious ceremony."

The pow-wow at the Young Men's Christian Association Hall was also a religious affair; but it differed from the red men's savage orgies in the victim being absent, but the spirit manifested was much the same. I fancy I hear Chief Anthony speaking thus: "Ugh! me big Injun! me do all big things! me cotch 'one Bennett!' very bad man! me send him to prison! me keep him there! they thought to git him out! me no let 'em! me told big chief at Washington he must not let that bad man go! he had to mind what me say! he got so much 'moral courage' he no dare disobey what me and Sammy and Howard and Joe Cook bid him! Bad man, Bennett! Great brave, Rutherford! He hav big courage! Big Injun, me! Ugh!"

How coolly Comstock uttered his lies at that pious meeting about my not being prosecuted and convicted on account of my religious views! He knew he lied when he said it. Colgate knew he lied. Howard Crosby knew he lied. Every man present knew he lied, and every person in the country who has paid any attention to the case knows he lied. If it were possible for a lie to strangle that man he would hav been choked to death long ago, and his foul carcass ere this served as food for the fowls of the air or the worms of the earth. What was it but my religious opinions that caused the discussion in the Young Men's Christian Association as to what course should be pursued to suppress my paper and my publications? What was it but my religious opinions that caused Comstock to undertake the enterprise of "crushing me out?" What but my religious convictions induced him to visit my place and search over my stock of books and pamphlets to see what he could find to arrest me on? Was it obscenity that caused him to arrest me for mailing my "Open Letter to Jesus Christ" on a decoy letter he wrote in the name of S. Bender, Squan Village, N. J.? Is there a single word of obscenity in that letter? Was it not because it was considered "blasphemous," and for that reason alone, that that letter was pitched upon? Of course it was, and if he lies about it a thousand times and before a thousand of his admirers it will not change the truth one particle. What was it but my religious opinions that made him angry when the first case against me was dismissed by orders from Washington, when he almost swore that he would get Bennett in his power yet? What was it but an opposition to the religious views of Liberals, including myself, that made Samuel Colgate and Anthony Comstock, two years ago, in their yearly obscene meeting, declare that Freelove and Freethought publications were in a fair way to be "stamped out?" What was it but opposition to our religious views that caused that statement to be printed in their annual report of the society? What was it but opposition to my religious views that caused Comstock to say to many persons that he would yet "crush" me out? What but a determination to "crush" me caused him, on many occasions, to try to deter printers from printing my papers and books, the mailer from folding and mailing the papers, the news companies from dealing in them, the news-stands on the streets from selling them, and the post-office people from receiving them? He has been mean enough in his treatment of me without further damning his conduct with basest falsehoods. It is utterly useless for him to lie and say I "hav not been prosecuted for opinion's sake." There is not, I repeat, an intelligent man or woman in the country, who has any correct information upon the subject, but what knows that I was prosecuted for opinion's sake, and that only. It is enrolled on the pages of history that I hav been sent to prison with felons because I am a prominent publisher of hated Infidel books and papers, and a million of lies from Comstock and his coadjutors will not change the truth. What else was it but opposition to Liberal views that made him say, when in Rochester organizing his auxiliary society, that Infidel papers and "Infidel tracts should soon be squelched?" In that threat he had special reference to myself, for I am about the only one publishing such tracts to any extent. If selling a copy of "Cupid's Yokes" is so criminal a deed that I should be sent to prison for it, and if it is not for religious opinions, why hav not some of the principal booksellers of New York and other localities been also sent to prison who hav likewise sold it? What was it but opposition to my religious opinions that made him say in his so-called meeting of clergymen and others in Boston in connection with his society, that after Heywood and Bennett were disposed of, the Investigator and Banner of Light would next be taken in hand? Is it because they are obscene? No. It is wholly because they entertain opinions upon religious subjects that the church is not pleased with; because they are unbelievers and antichristian. This is the living truth, and Comstock's lies cannot change it. Let him cease his lying and go on with his dirty work.

There was another man at the pow-wow at the Young Men's Christian Association Hall that distinguished himself in no slight degree. The same was no less than the Reverend Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., A.SS., Chancellor of the University of New York, expounder of the story of "Moses and the Lamb," at the 4th ave. Presbyterian church, big mogul and founder of the Society for the Prevention of Crime, humble follower of the Meek and Lowly One—who was so unfortunate when alive as to hav no title at either end of his name—bosom friend and admirer of Anthony Comstock, etc., etc. This man is a very brilliant light in the church militant, which is trying to "crush out" those who presume to disbelieve what it declares all must accept as truth. It is a neck-and-neck race between him and Cardinal McCloskey as to which stands the nearest to the Great White Throne, one being at the head of the Catholic division of the godly saints in this country, and the other at the head of the Protestant brigades. This Holy Reverend,

Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D. A.SS. Chancellor, etc., Expounder, etc., Big Mogul, etc., Humble Follower, etc., Bosom Friend, etc., etc., distinguished himself at that powwow in a most brilliant manner. It seems by the report that he jumped up spasmodically, and, swinging his arms like a wild man, said, vociferously, that he would rather swear by Anthony Comstock then anybody else; then, after lauding Comstock's Obscene Society to the skies for the great, great, GREAT good it has done, he gave vent to this very pious ejaculation: "If this society had never done anything more than put that man Bennett in the Albany Penitentiary—the man who was the leader and defender of the propagators of obscenity [Oh, what a lie!], . . . . . it was worth a hundred thousand times more than all that our citizens hav given into its treasury."

Now this is an extraordinary assertion for such a pious, leading divine to make in a public assembly. Let us look at it a minute or two. Since reading this godly man's words I hav had a curiosity to see how much I am earning, while shut up here, for our heavenly-minded Christian friends. That obscene Comstock society has been in existence over six years. It costs $8,000 per year to pay Comstock and Britton and meet other expenses. That would make a sum of $48,000. But that penknife wound on Anthony's face cost $8,000 or $10,000 more; but throw in the $8,000 for good measure and we hav the snug total sum of $50,000. My getting into the penitentiary is worth a hundred thousand times that sum, which makes, as every school-boy can easily calculate without steelyards, the nice little sum of $5,000,000,000. That is five thousand million, or, more properly written, five billion dollars. Oh, my! what a big sum of money! I never, never, never, well, not "hardly ever," thought I would ever in all my life be able to earn one hundred-thousandth part of that immense amount! Why! it is almost as much as the national debts of the United States and Great Britain combined! Oh, dear! it almost takes my breath away to think of it! Can it be I am doing so much good? Is it possible that my incarceration is having such a beneficial effect upon the cause of Christianity? Is there not some mistake about it? No, no; there is no mistake; those are the very words the holy man uttered, and it must be true, for the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., A.SS., Chancellor, Expounder, Big Mogul, Humble Follower, Bosom Friend, etc., etc., etc., would not say a word not strictly true, no, not if he knew it would kill him!

My friends, you can't think how much more contented I feel since I hav learned how much good I am doing! Just think of it for a moment. Deducting the time I am entitled to by the laws of this state, my term of imprisonment amounts to three hundred and thirty days. $5,000,000,000 divided into that number of days shows that I am earning every day the enormous sum of $15,151,515.15. Most astonishing! Over fifteen millions per day! Who ever earned so much as that before and kept it up for three hundred and thirty days! How much do I earn every hour? Counting twelve hours per day, every hour brings in the most magnificent sum of $1,226,626.26! About a million and a quarter of dollars per hour; or $21,104.77 per minute; or $350.72 every second. My dear readers, would you hav thunk it? I declare to you, in the most solemn manner, I never would! I really believe, if the Rev. H. C., D.D., LL.D., A.SS., etc., etc., etc., tells the truth, that I am earning more money than all the other men on a salary in the country. The President is supposed to draw the largest salary of anybody, the comfortable sum of $50,000 per year; but, pshaw! that is nothing at all compared with my earnings; why, it would take him ten thousand years to earn as much as I earn in a single year. He would hav had to begin four thousand years before Adam embarked in the apple business, and kept at it all the time since, drawing $50,000 every year, to hav earned as much as I do in one single year. You can't tell how happy the thought of all this makes me here in prison. I can look right between the bars and hardly see them. I thank thee, Howard—excuse the title this time—for that good word. You hav sweetened my cup of sorrow so greatly that I cannot taste the bitter at all!

There is only one drawback in the whole thing, and that is I don't see any of the money; what is more, I don't believe I ever shall. Comstock, Colgate, Cook, Crosby, and Co. (what a lot of C.'s!), will keep it all and never giv me a cent of it. I think they might, at least, giv me ten or twenty thousand. Comstock got $100,000—more or less—for a little cut, with a penknife, on his cheek (the saint has so very much cheek I presume the one-handed man could hardly hit him anywhere else), and I would be willing to be cut almost anywhere for that sum of money.

As astounding as Howard's statement is (excuse titles again), considering the high source whence it came, it could not be questioned had he not in the same brilliant little speech spoken so highly in favor of deceit and mendacity. That certainly throws a damper over his high credibility. Why, he said with emphasis, "I tell you, gentlemen, I believe in deceit." . . "You hav a right to use deceit." Oh, that nearly knocks in the head all the good things he said about my earning so much? How am I to know but when he said my imprisonment was doing so much good that he was only practicing some of that very kind of deceit that he admires so much? Perhaps, after his extraordinary utterances on that occasion, nobody should think strange that he swears by Comstock, or by any other man, or that he would swear to anything. O cruel thought! has the good Howard (please excuse the titles once more, they take up so much room)—has the good, dear Howard, after all, been giving us some of his beloved deceit, instead of truth? Is it only a Crosby falsehood that I am earning $5,000,000,000? Did he tell that to the good brethren present just to make them happy and to giv them a specimen of a tip-top article of deceit? If this is so it is a most unkind and cruel blow at me? How could Howard (excuse titles once more)—how could Howard "sarve me so," when so many mean things hav been done to me?

Let me make a proposition, right here, before I forget it. Despite what the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., A.SS., etc., etc., etc., said about his fondness for deceit, there is no kind of doubt but what the good, heavenly Christian brethren and sisters were very anxious to get me into this prison, and are still very anxious to keep me here. If this is not so, they never would hav tried so hard to accomplish it, and would not hav rejoiced so heartily when they had achieved their wishes. Now, I am disposed to be accommodating with them. I am very willing to do all the good I can. Now, attention, Crosby, Comstock, Colgate, Cook, Courteney, Newman, Hall, and all the rest of the meek and lowly shepherds who giv their time and talents, and their very lives, to the cause of Christ, without a cent of remuneration, ahem! I offer you a big bargain. If you will giv me one per cent of the sum that the good Rev. H. C., D.D., LL.D., A.SS., etc., etc., etc., says it is worth to hav me in prison a year I will stay another year without a new trial, thereby saving Anthony the trouble of writing another decoy letter and further disgracing the courts of this great country in securing my conviction. I certainly ought to hav one per cent of the sum which, by great deprivation, I am earning. One per cent is but a small part. Let us see how much is one per cent of $5,000,000,000? Why, it is $50,000 000! Oh, I won't ask that much! I'll stay cheaper; I will stay for one-tenth of one per cent—only $5,000,000. Is that too much for the gentleman to giv? Then I will be generous. I will stay for one-tenth of one-tenth of one per cent, which is only $500,000. They can't complain of that. They ought to make up that little amount in a very short time. Let Anthony furnish the blanks, and every saint mark down how much he will giv. Do they think $500,000 too much? Then I will be magnanimous. I will stay for one-tenth of one-tenth of one-tenth of one per cent, which is only the pitiful sum of $50,000. That is the best I can do. As the auctioneers say, "I will not hav a cent more, and never will take a cent less." The good brothers cannot refuse this very reasonable offer. It is only what Rutherford has for signing a few bills, writing a message once a year, refusing to sign pardons, and visiting county fairs and church festivals, with all his expenses paid, and a big fuss made over him besides. Who would not rather pass through that severe ordeal than to be shut up as I am, not able to see hardly anybody, never getting any champagne or big dinners at all?

Now, gentlemen, I leave the matter with you, and ask you to do the handsome. Come, Howard, how much will you spare out of your ten thousand a year? Samuel, how much will you contribute from your profits on vaseline? Anthony, how much will you spare out of your four thousand a year? Flavius Josephus, how much can you donate from the proceeds of your scientifico-theological lectures? Perhaps Henry and DeWitt may be induced to shell out freely. Among you all, sixty thousand of you, you can make up the sum very easily, so don't be bashful; don't be backward in coming forward. Be generous once in your life. Remember the great end to be gained—Bennett, the great truth seeker and truth speaker, is to be kept caged another whole year for the miserable pittance of fifty thousand dollars, when it is worth five billion dollars. Don't hesitate a moment. You never will hav such an offer again. Close in with it at once. I will giv security for the performance of the contract, and will insist upon your doing the same, or planking down the cash in advance. Do not forget, it is only "filthy lucre," the root of all evil, that you hav to part with to keep me in prison another year. I giv you sixty days to complete the arrangement and sign the papers. Telephone me when you hav decided to do it. If you are honest in your professions you will come to my figures. I don't think one of you would perform the task on more reasonable terms.

But it is possible some of you may think the job can be accomplished by the aid of Uncle Sam and without costing you a red cent. I learn that Anthony has several times declared that he will arrest me again when my time is out. I presume he can do it as easily as he did before; and if it was just then, it will be just again. I hav sold other copies of "Cupid's Yokes" besides the one I sent to him under the lying cognomen of G. Brackett. I hav sent by mail many copies of the report of my trial, in which the passages from "Cupid's Yokes" are given upon which my conviction was secured. I mailed thousands of papers containing my "Eighth Letter from Ludlow-Street Jail," in which those bad passages were again given and contrasted with some choice selections from the Holy Bible. Oh, yes, there are plenty of grounds to commence another prosecution against me, and all know Anthony is perfectly willing so long as he can manipulate the courts of the government for the purpose, and it don't cost him a cent. The United States District-Attorney is reported as saying, "Bennett will hav to go through another trial." May it be fairer than the last! The fiery Fiero will doubtless be willing to make another powerful forensic speech to secure another conviction against me, and will dwell upon the United States government as the great Society for the Prevention of Vice, to wit, sending men to prison for not believing right, and hunting down people who mail "Cupid's Yokes. There can be no doubt that another accommodating Christian jury can be selected who will readily find me guilty, and no one can question for a moment but what the pious Judge Benedict would cheerfully sentence me to another imprisonment and fine. If it was right for him to do it before, why not again? It is reduced to a certainty that Rutherford would not "interfere with the courts," no matter how severe the sentence; so I would be sure for the remainder of his term.

In view of all this, it is not improbable that the godly and honorable gentlemen may conclude to let this great, free (?) government of the American republic prosecute me again and enable them to save their hard-earned money for domestic purposes.

Well, I hav learned to submit to what I cannot avert; and if it is to be my fate to die in prison at the behests of the Christian church, I hope I may die like a man—as did old Socrates, Bruno, and Vanini. That these religious zealots and hypocrites will pursue me to the bitter end there is but little doubt. Their enmity is too marked, their malice is too apparent, and their disposition to persecute for opinion's sake too fully demonstrated.

But cannot they see the folly of their course? Can they not discern their own short-sightedness? They cannot crush out Freethought in this great country by persecuting here and there a single individual. They cannot crush THE TRUTH SEEKER by imprisoning its editor; the result of their efforts has been directly to the contrary. Comstock's first arrest of me caused the paper to jump from an eight-page to a sixteen-page journal. His second arrest brought thousands of new readers and patrons; and so it will continue to be. The more they try to crush THE TRUTH SEEKER, the more it won't crush at all. The more they persecute for opinion's sake, the more those same opinions will spread. Among the great masses of the American people there is an honest love of fair play, and the church even cannot attempt to crush it with impunity. If it succeeds in sending me to my grave, Freethought will not be crushed, and THE TRUTH SEEKER will still liv and hav a wider circulation than ever. We shall see what we shall see.

As much as I admire the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D, A.SS., etc., etc., I cannot deny that I think he did me an injustice in his brilliant oration at the hall of the Y. M. C. A. when he declared to the audience that I was "the leader and defender of the propagators of obscenity." That is, in plain, mild terms, a wholesale, barefaced falsehood, and I am afraid it is libelous also. It may do for Howard to be in favor of deceit and to justify some sleek, pious lies now and then when they are told for Christ's sake, but he ought not thus to malign a poor, unfortunate man whom his bosom friend has thrown into prison. I am no leader or defender of propagators of obscenity. I hav had nothing whatever to do with obscene literature. The only obscene book I hav seen for many years, except the Bible, is one that Comstock sent to a friend of mine. What I hav done, and all I hav done, was to show up his bosom friend, Anthony, and to let the public know something of his damnable wrongs upon his unfortunate fellow-beings. I hav no sympathy with obscenity or the dealers in it. I do not even know a man who has dealt in it for ten years or more. How false, then, how slanderous, how shameful and ungentlemanly, for the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., A.SS., Chancellor, Expounder, Humble Follower, Big Mogul, Bosom Friend, etc., etc., to make use of such language! Let him admire deceit and lying in his friend Anthony as much as he pleases, but let him try to at least maintain a semblance of truthfulness.

It may be questioned what there is about Anthony Comstock that makes Bro. Howard so highly pleased with him that he had rather swear by him than anybody else? Is it because Anthony is so angelic in character, so pure-minded and sainted? Is it because Anthony has confessed in a public meeting that he wrote letters over false names, that he set traps for people, and decoyed them into the commission of crimes they would not otherwise commit, and this for the purpose of getting them into his power? Is it because he acknowledged that he had forged the names of women in the false letters he wrote? Is it because Anthony dragged the excellent Mr. Prosch and Leonard Fox off to prison in the most brutal manner? Is it because that by his heartless persecution he is able to boast that he has driven fifteen persons to commit suicide? Is it because by his fiendish conduct he has driven a larger number of people to unhappy and untimely graves? Is it because by his villainous meanness he has rendered hundreds of people wretchedly unhappy, and robbed them in the aggregate of hundreds of thousands of dollars? Is it because he exhibited such consummate and infamous taste and skill in manipulating the exhibition of nude unfortunate girls on Greene street? Is it because he turned his poor, aged, debilitated father from his door to starve and perish with cold and exposure? Is it because he is such a deceitful, meddlesome, intriguing, contemptible character? It must be these in part, for these largely make up Comstock's character. A good deal of the brotherly feeling between the two men doubtless grows out of a feeling of sympathy from the similar kind of occupation they are engaged in. Sympathy is a strong bond of union between man and man, and sometimes between man and woman.

Here is where the sympathy comes in between Howard and Anthony. They are both at the heads of "Suppression Societies." Howard organized and runs a society for the prevention of "crime;" Anthony organized and runs one for the suppression of "vice." The two societies run very nearly together, and are conducted upon the same despicable principles. They both use duplicity, trickery, deceit, falsehood, and utter meanness to accomplish their ends and secure their victims. They hav both used these very agencies upon their unfortunate victims times without number. It is no wonder, then, that Howard is ready to stand up in a public audience and apologize for Anthony's deceit and hypocrisy, and declare he had rather swear by him than anybody else. And when business is a little slack with Anthony in suppressing "vice," and Howard has rather more "crime" on hand than he can attend to handily, Anthony has shown a kindly willingness to lend a hand and to send his man Britton also. Cases of this kind occurred at Stamford and New Canaan, Conn. Certain men there were suspected of disposing of numbers of drams of whisky without dividing the profits with the town authorities. Anthony the services of Thomas Paine. The result of Paine's work was the enlightenment of the people as to their rights of resistance against wrong and oppression. It broke the theological shackles which bound them slaves to the priests, who are but the accessories of kings in their assumed right to govern the people, not for the people's good but for their own selfish desires. He broke that spell which bound men in classes and castes, and declared the absolute equality of all men upon earth, the absolute and undeniable right of "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." He did not, in the cowardly manner of Christ, say, "Render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's, and unto God the things that are God's;" but he boldly held that no government was right which was not founded in the consent of the people.

The speaker then gave his creed of religion. He said: First, you need giv your attention to infancy, childhood, and youth. Make home pleasing to them. Do not consider any pleasure a sin. Open your home and say, "Children, here, dance and sing, play cards, checkers, chess, games of all kinds: make this home pleasant, enjoy yourselves in any way." You are thus making life pleasant, and you giv them an enduring impression that life is a condition of happiness and not a condition of toil and sorrow and superstitious fears. Instead of wasting your money for whisky, tobacco, gambling, dissipation, spend it in making home cheerful. Fill it with good furniture, handsome carpets, beautiful pictures. Spend your energy first in making home happy, saying to yourself: "This is my kingdom; I am responsible for this little state, and if it is not cheerful and happy it will be in a great measure my fault." Say to your children: "Look for happiness here;" and say this also to your fellowmen. Do not bother yourself about another world. An impenetrable veil has been drawn across the future. It is none of my business. My business is to attend strictly to the affairs of this world. Before I was born I did not hav to bother about how I was to be born, and I am not going to bother myself about how I am going to be born again. I had somebody else to bother for me. These are matters beyond the ken of human wisdom and beyond the control of human power. The talents the Lord hath given me I am going to work up to the best of my ability, in order that when he comes I may say: "My Lord, here are ten talents which I made out of the one talent you gave me." Jesus said: "Hide the talent, and bury it in the ground." Paine: "Change; take the talent and make of it ten other talents." Hence I say Paine was better than Jesus. I say his principles were better calculated to raise and elevate man, and I think that any candid observer will say I am right. Paine set the great internal forces of men at work. Jesus taught the people vainly to expect that some great external force would make them happy. Paine taught us to take the talents and functions the Creator gave us and hew out our fortunes. Jesus taught us,

> "There's a divinity that shapes our ends,
> Rough-hew them how we will."

Mr. Dailey was frequently interrupted by applause.

The speech of Mr. E. P. Brown was received with much favor. Among other things he said:

Man is the creation of his own fancy. The mind of man possessed but little light in the dawn of creation. The truths of nature were hidden from him, and age after age fulfilled their mission before he could understand cause and effect.

In all stages of development man has modified his religion. In every new era he has appropriated such timbers as suited his fancy, and thus built up his temple. He improved his architecture finally, and gradually the structure has been enlarged and embellished; but there still remains room for improvement, and will be until man shall become as the gods, and make use of the grand fruit on the tree of life.

The crowbar of Infidelity is making the walls of religion fly, and the foundations of superstition will be replaced with the walls of truth.

The new fabric will not be based on religion, but on the truth of man to man. The religion of humanity will be great to all, and one that will pay one hundred cents on the dollar every time. We want a religion that does not seek to make a man a saint hereafter, but a good citizen here. We want a religion for this life; one that will keep him straight when he is measuring out molasses as well as when he is shouting at some camp meeting; a religion that will take any man by the hand and call him brother, and that will do good right here, and that will not put a lens in every man's hands to gaze on the faults of his neighbors; one that will do to sell with and buy with, that will giv equal and exact justice to every man, woman, and child; not a religion that will frighten children to death or scare the dying. The world is starving for a religion that does not exist on the principle of a cheap restaurant, putting everything in the front window and not having any meat on the table. We don't want a religion that dwells in the clouds; we don't want it as ethereal as the woman we hav heard about. She was so thin that her husband had to pinch himself and read over his marriage certificate to be sure that he was married. We want a religion that will not shirk any burden of responsibility, and that will miss no chance to make the world wiser and better; that will look upon life as an ever-present reality; whose mission it will be to do good on every hand; a religion that will liv up to sound business principles, and will not advertise inducements that it is not able to fulfil; that will try to make home what it should be; a religion that will teach little children that there can be no God that is not good; that the highest reward goes hand in hand with the good deed itself. Let us not lead the tender feet of children in the slough of despond, but into the bright and shining future—a religion that will be fragrant with the blossoms of love.

The musical part of the programme was especially enjoyable. Miss Minnie Fleissner, in the aria from "Figaro," and Masters Johnny and Benny Smith, in their piano duet from "Il Trovatore," won encores, to which they responded.

The audience, says the Cincinnati Enquirer, was above the average in intelligence, and the frequent demonstrations of approval that greeted both Mr. Dailey and Mr. Brown during the delivery of their remarks told plainly that Paine's memory is held in respect yet, and that there are people in Cincinnati who will see to it that his grave is kept clean.

PAINE'S BIRTHDAY IN LOWELL, MICH.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: Our celebration of the birthday of Thomas Paine was a grand success, notwithstanding the most herculean efforts of the priests and their blood-washed brethren to the contrary. The hall, which is large, was crowded both afternoon and evening by an audience of earnest and attentive listeners. In the afternoon the exercises consisted of speaking by Marvin Babcock and Mrs L. A. Pearsall.

In the evening opening remarks by President Matthewson, a report of a sermon on Thomas Paine, by Rev. S. E. Busser the preceding Sabbath, where he strove to the fullest extent to conceal his merits, and to vilify and blacken his character (said report I send you for publication, headed "Thomas Paine as viewed through orthodox spectacles), a poem, "In Memoriam," by Mrs. E. A. Chapman, and speaking by Rev. J. H. Burnham and Mrs. Pearsall, closing with a social hop. The speech by Rev. J. H. Burnham was one of the finest the writer has ever heard. In a few words he disposed of the fearful wrong Paine has received at the hands of the church. He showed that the clergy hav ever considered it their duty to lie for Christ's sake, and then from a philosophical standpoint showed how the works of Paine, like a mighty lever, are lifting the people out of the ruts of ignorance and superstition, and placing them upon the broad plains of universal freedom. All acquitted themselves with great credit, and we believe much good has been accomplished in this community. E. A. Chapman.

THOMAS PAINE AS VIEWED THROUGH ORTHODOX SPECTACLES.—SERMON BY REV. S. E. BUSSER, LOWELL, MICH.—TEXT, "WHATEVER A MAN SOW, THAT SHALL HE ALSO REAP."

Thomas Paine had the misfortune to be without religious training in his early youth. His parents were not church-members. He served in the navy, a school which hardens and crushes out the best elements of humanity. He returned home repentant and without friends. As a boy he was a failure, had no high aspirations or noble purposes in his youth. "The boy is the father of the man." In public life he was bloodthirsty, because he excited and urged people to war. His pamphlets were without merit, mere tirades against George III. and monarchical forms of government. He borrowed goodness and wisdom of Benjamin Franklin. Franklin swayed him, and therefore should receive the credit of whatever good Paine did. Had he then died, posterity would hav lauded him as highly as Washington or Lincoln. Was ambitious and conceited, therefore went to France. The French people showed that they appropriately appreciated his services by throwing him into prison. He separated from his wife, but did not make any charges, because history was silent on the subject. [Like Paul] he then abstained from matrimony; therefore by his silence approved of licentiousness and libertinism. Was not a profound writer. The "Age of Reason" was a vulgar tirade, a coarse burlesque on the Bible. He ridiculed the sacred scriptures, God's inspired book, the great beacon-light of humanity.

The reverend preacher was glad that David and Solomon were old worn-out libertines, that the latter had six hundred concubines, and that the whale swallowed Jonah. The book was valuable because it was a true record, but did not say that David was a man after God's own heart. Paine was very naughty to ridicule those beautiful stories. Judging Paine by his followers, he whom respectable people would hardly care to associate with, dare not charge Paine with drunkenness, but D. M. Bennett who openly advocates Freelove says he was a drunkard. He swept away religion, the Bible, and the church, but left nothing in their stead, left humanity in darkness, and without hope. Amen. Not one word of praise, but everything in condemnation. This so-called mouth-piece of God believes that by concealing Thomas Paine's true merits, and vilifying and blackening his character, he is doing God and himself a service; that he is building upon a rock. But ere long he will find that his little boomerang will do its most effective work where he least expects it. At the outset great anxiety was expressed that the congregation be set right in reference to this wicked man, Thomas Paine. Such as the following of Thomas Paine's writings was entirely overlooked: "The world is my country, to do good my religion. I believe in one God and no more, and hope for happiness beyond this life. I believe that religious duties consist in doing justice, loving mercy, and endeavoring to make our fellow-creatures happy."

Last Sabbath we were told that Thomas Paine gave the world nothing. That he tore down but did not build up. In all candor I ask what more is needeeded than the above, to secure happiness here and hereafter? Is it necessary when humanity has been cured of one disease to hav another take the place of it? If you cure my carbuncle must I hav a boil or a cancer to take its place? The priests are mighty anxious about having something to take the place of religion as founded on the rock of faith. Reason does not answer their purposes. The people would not pay as well. Their business is at stake, and they are in the balance and about to be found wanting. So this last death struggle to sustain themselves and their dear religion. One word as to the followers of Paine, so sneeringly alluded to. They are those who are simply striving to see that justice is done, who believe in no man-made religions, bibles, or gods. Reason their teacher, nature their bible, justice their religion, and the universe their god. E. A. C.

EXTRACTS FROM AN ADDRESS DELIVERED AT PHILADELPHIA ON THOMAS PAINE'S ANNIVERSARY DAY.—BY SADA BAILEY.

Friends, you may think me a very bold woman when I tell you that I come before such an audience as this for the purpose of talking to you about a man that I am deeply in love with. I am in love with Thomas Paine. But do not think for a moment that dead men are the only ones I fall in love with. I love live men, and I love live women too. My belief, however, is that Thomas Paine is not dead, but that he is alive to day, notwithstanding our Materialistic friends may think otherwise, yet we will not quarrel with them upon this point, for although it may be important for us to know whether Thomas Paine is alive individually or not, it is more important for us to be alive to the principles he advocated.

Sisters, brothers, do you love truth better than you love popular favor? If so, then this great man may feel honored that you honor him. Do you know that more than a century ago strong men turned pale when Thomas Paine said, "America will never be free until we break the chains which bind us to the priesthood."

To the practicalization of this truth we owe our independence to-day; and only so far as we now resist the tyranny of the priesthood everywhere shall we enjoy the blessings of liberty which our so-called Infidel forefathers bequeathed to us.

It is well we call George Washington the father of our country; but let us remember that when this great general, overwhelmed with the magnitude of his undertaking, and his weary soldiers, too, faltered 'neath their heavy load, Thomas Paine took them, as it were, in his arms and carried them onward in the magnetic strength of his glorious power. Then, when we call George Washington the father of our country, let us call Thomas Paine the grandfather of our country.

Retrograde Liberalism.

To the Editor of The Truth Seeker, Sir: There was a time in the history of the Liberal cause when, notwithstanding differences of opinion among Liberals, the lines between Liberalism and its antithesis, theology, were always so well defined that there was no mistaking a friend for an enemy, and no fear of being stabbed in the back by those professing to be soldiers in the Liberal ranks. But of late years all this has changed. The heaviest blows and the most deadly thrusts come now from those claiming to be of the Liberal party.

Once the batteries to be silenced lay in front of us; now they unexpectedly open upon us in our rear. Our force was once spent against the common enemy; now it is directed to repel attacks from conservatives or retrogrades in our own ranks.

In this work of obstruction and retrogression, second only to Mr. Abbot, of the Index, must be ranked Prof. Adler of the Society for Ethical Culture, and President of the Free Religious Association, both men of learning and culture and of comparatively recent advent in the Liberal movement, one from the church, the other from the synagogue.

It is of the latter, or rather of some of his recent utterances, that I propose to speak.

In a recent discourse on Thomas Paine, after a generous recognition of his genius and a hearty commendation of his honesty of purpose, nobility of character, and eminent services in the cause of liberty and Freethought, he assumed the attitude of a critic and impeached his methods and denied the truth of some of his arguments against the Bible, especially such as related to the Jewish people and to the character of their prophets. Referring to Paine's criticism and scathing denunciation of the command of Moses, "to kill every male among the little ones, and kill every woman," etc., "but all the women-children," etc., "keep alive for yourselves." The Professor essayed to justify this command on the ground that when the religion or institutions of a country are endangered, as were the monotheism and monogamy of the Israelites by the idolatrous nations of the valley, it is justifiable by the law of self-preservation to extirpate whatever threatened their destruction.

Monotheism, said the Professor, owes its origin to the monogamic family, the family on which the religion of the nation was founded, and which would fall with the corruption of the family relation, was threatened with subversion by contact with the women of their idolatrous neighbors, hence the justice of their destruction.

Let us see to what this reasoning commits us: It is plain that it entirely ignores humanity and the brotherhood of man, which was supposed to be a fundamental dogma of Free Religion, while it exalts physical force as the principal agent in government for self-protection, and makes it a virtue in each nature to seek the extirpation of its neighbor if not of a similar social and political faith as itself.

On this principle Russia would be justified in invading and subjugating the government and domestic relations of Turkey; and Turkry, for the same reasons, would be justified in subverting the monogamic institutions of its Christian subjects and of the adjacent Christian countries.

The North, had it consulted Prof. Adler, need not to hav waited for the secession of the South before it attacked the domestic institution of slavery, guaranteed by the Constitution, but might hav invaded the South at once and liberated the slaves, on the ground that free and slave labor were incompatible in the same nation, which indeed they were.

England, acting on this principle, leagued all the nations of Europe to destroy republicanism in France, and what were the consequences? The sacrifice of millions of lives, misery and suffering too great for description, and the entailment of a load of debt that has been and will continue to be for all time a millstone around the necks of the laboring classe of that country.

What but this intolerance of opinions and institutions opposed to their own, and which we assume are endangered by the existence of others, caused all the religious wars and persecutions of the past?

But granting that there was in the peculiar and exceptional condition of the Israelitish nation a necessity for killing the women among their captives, could any circumstances justify killing the "little ones?" And on what plea other than the right of the conqueror and the practice of savage men could the appropriation of the maidens be justified? All this we hav been told by Christians before; and were no claim urged for divine approbation of the Israelitish nation, and for the divine sanction of its leader and of its records, the plea could be received, and the criticism placed on historical grounds as on the acts of other nations.

But Prof. Adler discredits and flouts that claim equally with Paine. On what grounds then does he object to Paine's criticism of the command in question?

But a still more atrocious utterance in the same discourse is the declaration that there is a point at which toleration ceases to be a virtue, or, to quote his own words, as near as I can recollect them, "We will tolerate no opinions or practices that tend to impair the integrity of the family or to subvert the monogamic marriage system."

It was not generally known before, and will scarcely be believed now, that any one except the Pope of Rome claimed infallibility for the opinions held by himself or by his church. But this utterance of the President of the Free Religious Association, which in truth is but a bolder announcement of a doctrine frequently taught of late in the columns of the Index, will place the matter beyond dispute.

It will be news to Liberals of every school of thought that a finality has been reached in any matter relating to the social condition of mankind. It was not before believed that in the present state of knowledge any man was competent to assign a limit to the law of evolution in the realm of sociology. On the contrary, it was hoped that when the conception of an infallible God was outgrown, no other infallibility, either of opinion or institution, would be set up in its place.

"No toleration for any relation of the sexes, or any theories concerning the same, which (in the opinion of some Christians and conservative Liberals) tend to subvert the monogamic marriage system!" What an assumption hav we here! An institution that had its inception in feudalism, and was conceived in the interest of property, and not of morality, and which is sought to be retained now in the same interest; an institution that previous to taking the monogamic form had passed through four other distinct phases, is now declared to be a finality, and that in the face of the fact that it has never become universal, and that its defects are so great wherever it prevails in its entirety—as in France—as to be the cause of immorality rather than its conservator.

"France," says Dumas in his late work in favor of divorce, a question now being agitated in that country, "is the most immoral nation in Europe, and it is to its indissoluble marriage system to which it is to be attributed"—a system which has ever prevailed in that country, except during the time of the first republic, and which was established by the Roman Catholic church, whose clergy there and everywhere are its most determined advocates and defenders. This charge now, not made for the first time, is fully proved by Dumas, and can be verified by the experience of every country where it has prevailed unmodified by divorce laws; and just to the extent that the system has been so modified to suit it to the changing conditions of our modern civilization has it become a conservator rather than a cause of crime and immortality.

But let us submit this retrograde doctrine of no toleration for differences of opinion and practice in the sexual relations to a crucial test.

"A rule" that won't "work both ways" is generally conceded to be prima facie unsound. How will these two utterances of Prof. Adler stand this test?

Supposing that the monogamic system should be in a measure supplanted by either a return to polygamy, to the institution of the associative or complex family, or to a greatly modified form of monogamy. How would the Professor like the application of his no-toleration doctrine when he was in the minority, and when power and influence were in the hands of those whom he now will not tolerate?

If a people is justified in killing and exterminating another people whose institutions are deemed to be subversive of its own, on what grounds could the Professor object to the extermination of monogamists when the wheel of fortune or evolution should bring other institutions into power, even granting them not to be as good and pure as those they would subvert?

Such an indorsement of the pet institution of the church by Liberals is unfortunate, to say the least; for although it does not follow that everything taught by the church must necessarily be false, yet the presumption is that it is so; and until the doctrines there taught, and the institutions founded, on them hav received other indorsement than a "thus saith the Lord," it should be a cause of alarm and distrust for a Liberal to find himself in accord with any doctrines, social or otherwise, of which the church has been for any length of time the expounder and advocate.

And it is especially unfortunate for the cause of constructive Liberalism that these retrograde doctrines should hav emanated from a representative of the Free Religious movement.

Many Liberals were just beginning to feel the necessity of replacing the old with something better, and were in a fair way to conquer their prejudices against the word "religion," and to realize that it was the misconception and abuse of the thing, and not the thing itself, which they hated; and thus all that was required was to dissociate the word from its bad associations in the past, and that by substituting science for its basis, and humanity for its object and inspiration, it would become as potent for good as in the past it has in the service of superstition been for evil.

But now in the name of religion once more comes a justification of acts opposed to human brotherhood, and detrimental to human well-being, together with an advocacy of doctrines that estop evolution and progress in a direction most vital to human happiness.

Such retrograde teaching can hav no other result than to strengthen the church and retard the growth of constructive Liberalism, and keep Freethought forever in the dismal swamp of mere negation.

It is most unfortunate for the cause that such teachers ever emerged from the church, or, having emerged, that they could not hav freed themselves from the thraldom of its social as well as its theological errors.

A Congressional Libel.

In the Winter of 1877-8 a petition was sent to Congress requesting the repeal of the statute known as Comstock's Postal laws. This petition was signed by over 70,000 people, among whom were many of our most respectable citizens. The leader in the movement was Col. R. G. Ingersoll, than whom a purer man does not liv to-day. To assert that Col. Ingersoll and those who joined him in the petition were advocates of indecency, obscenity, or lewdness, is to be guilty of the basest and most wanton libel. And yet that is precisely what was done by the Committee on Revision of the Laws, to whom this petition was referred. They made an adverse report, in which they said:

"In the opinion of your committee, the post-office was not established to carry instruments of vice or obscene writings, indecent pictures, or lewd books."

Here is a positive insinuation that Ingersoll and his fellow-petitioners sought to open the mails to the transmission of bawdy publications. The committee knew full well that that was not the purpose of the petition, or the desire of its signers; and the introduction into the report of such a foul and slanderous charge upon the moral purity of men like Ingersoll can be attributed only to the Jesuitical character of Anthony Comstock's society, whose insidious agencies enter the grand jury room, the jury box, the prosecutor's office, the judge's bench, and even into the White House and the halls of Congress.

This petition was made and presented in the interest of free discussion; and had the laws whose repeal was asked been enforced and administered as they read, no necessity or desire for it would ever hav arisen. But, owing to the growth of religious free thought in this country and England, an English Society for the Suppression of Vice was organized. Openly, its purpose was what its name implies; secretly, however, its object was to stamp out Infidelity. Soon after, a similar society, with identical objects, was organized here.

The English Society first revealed its aim by prosecuting Charles Bradlaugh and Annie Besant, two leading Infidels of Great Britain, against neither of whom the breath of scandal had ever been raised. They published a book that can be had at any book-store, which advocated a limitation to the propagation of the human race. No instructions were given by which such a result might be accomplished; it was a pure, honest discussion of a subject that interests every man; about which every thinking man has an opinion; upon which there is a wide division of sentiment; and which every man has a right to discuss upon the platform or through the press.

And for publishing this book Mr. Bradlaugh and Mrs. Besant, both of whom detest lewdness and obscenity beyond the capacity of a low, salacious mind like that of Anthony Comstock to comprehend, were convicted. This modern society of Jesuits had already brought under their influence at least one judge and one jury panel in England. It will be observed that while the prosecution was ostensibly for publishing obscenity, it was really for Infidelity. First, because the book was not obscene within any fair definition of the word; and, second, because none but Infidels were prosecuted, although many others sold it.

In this country, the real motives of the society were not openly developed until recently, although, by threats made to newsdealers, the circulation of Freethought literature, notably Ingersoll's "Gods," was greatly impeded. By a series of prosecutions against men who were charged with dealing in the vile stuff that is really contemplated by the statute, the society acquired a power that it could never hav commanded as an avowed enemy of Infidelity. Judges were brought into confidential relations with it; a prosecuting officer at the center of commerce in the country became an active member; influential citizens, who are selected for jurors, were secured for its purposes; the President's influence was acquired by one of the holiest ties, and members of Congress became its blind and zealous advocates. The language of the statute was expanded by judicial construction to embrace many standard publications and honest discussions. That the sweeping character of these definitions may be understood, we assert, and are able to show, that, if a man were indicted for mailing a copy of the Bible, and the same rulings were applied to it that are applied to other publications, no jury could escape a verdict of guilty without flying in the face of the court's instructions. Who wrote, or who published the book is immaterial; for what purpose it was written, or what are its objects or uses, is set aside; and whether, as a whole, it is a proper publication, is not allowed to be discussed. The prosecutor selects one or more passages, and the jury are not allowed to consider any other.

With precedents like these, and agencies at work in all the places of power, the American Society felt strong enough to open their batteries upon the real objects of their attack, early in 1878, and in their annual report of that year announced their purpose as follows:

"Another class of publications issued by Freelovers and Freethinkers, is in a fair way of being stamped out. The public generally can scarcely be aware of the extent that blasphemy and filth commingled hav found vent through these channels. Under a plausible pretense, men who raise a howl about 'free press,' 'free speech,' etc., ruthlessly trample under feet the most sacred things, breaking down the altars of religion, bursting asunder the ties of home, and seeking to overthrow every social restraint."

The principal publication alluded to in this quotation was "An Open Letter to Jesus Christ," written and published by a Freethought publisher named Bennett. In the preceding November, Bennett had been arrested for this, upon the pretended ground that it was obscene. The only possible approach to what some minds peculiarly constituted might call obscene, was a discussion of the immaculate conception. And as one side of this question is discussed in the pulpit, and drilled into the minds of little children at Sunday-school, it is difficult to understand how a discussion of the other side for the consideration of adults can be indecent.

This was the position of the Society for the Suppression of Vice when Col. Ingersoll and his supporters petitioned for a repeal of the laws under which it acted. They made no such a petition until the laws were deliberately perverted to the suppression of Freethought and honest discussion.

Col. Ingersoll did not want the "post-office to carry instruments of vice, or obscene writings, or indecent pictures," nor does Truth. But he objected, as we do, to making literary censors of this society, or its agents, either on or off the bench.

The laws are obnoxious, not alone because they allow trials in federal courts that ought to be had in the state courts, but also because in their present shape they are instruments of oppression in the hands of a Jesuitical society. They are not objectionable because they prohibit the publication of obscenity.

The Imprisonment of D. M. Bennett.

MR. EDITOR: Considering the Boston Investigator the sterling free paper of these United States, I offer you a few plain thoughts on the imprisonment of Mr. D. M. Bennett. I hav always thought that individual liberty was the principal object of our fathers in laying the foundation of our government deep and strong; I now see that the action of our government officials is anything but liberty, and instead of my comparatively bold and sober treatment, the imprisonment of Mr. Bennett deserves rather the pitiless exposure and the measureless anger and red-hot steel courage of every American freeman.

But I leave untold its darkest details, and waiving every other consideration, I rest solely and squarely on the general indignity and injury this action offers to individual liberty. I claim that to imprison an editor of a public journal and subject him to public contempt, solely because he has committed an act which no one can declare criminal, without declaring all lovers of mental liberty criminals, is to affix a penalty to Freethought and to distrust the freedom of letters. I declare this act of the imprisonment of our aged friend the audacious captain of a series of acts and a style of tyranny whose tendency and effect throughout this broad land is to dwarf and degrade the spirit of manhood, and to make free men and great men impossible, except under pains of martyrdom. As such, I arraign it before every Liberal and thoughtful mind. I denounce it as a sinister precedent here, as a ban upon the free action of genius, as a logical insult to all commanding literature.

Differences of opinion there may and must be upon the topic, but upon the act itself there can be none. I call upon every scholar, every man of letters, every editor, every untrammeled man and good fellow everywhere, who wields the pen, to make common cause with us in visiting upon it the full tempest of condemnation this act deserves.

I remember Tennyson, a spirit of vengeance over the desecrated grave of Moore; I remember Scott rolling back the tide of obloquy from the grave of Byron; and if there liv aught of that old chivalry of letters which in all ages has sprung to the succor and defense of genius, I summon it to act the part of honor and duty on a wrong which, done to a single member of the great confraternity of literature, is done to all, and which flings insult and menace upon every page that dares transcend the black heart and conceited brains.

I address this letter to every reader of the Investigator, and also to every one who guards the freedom of thought and liberty of speech throughout this land of ours. Arouse, freemen, and may it not be in vain that upon this outrage we invoke the judgment of the mighty spirit of literature and the fires of every honest heart of both man and woman!

Winchester, Ill., Jan. 28, 1880. W. A. D. H.

and Britton, upon invitation, went out there to help "suppress." But unfortunately Britton got drunk and spent too much time with abandoned women. He thereby got into trouble with the officers of the law. The "suppressor" was arrested and was likely to be suppressed himself, and Anthony had to go to his relief. Then it was that the valorous suppressor, Anthony, drew his revolver in the court room, and, brandishing it in a most alarming manner, took his "man Friday" forcibly off to the depot. Those were brave deeds, and it is such that makes Howard love Anthony. But it cannot be lost sight of that Anthony is to be adored most of all, and eternally to be thanked for getting Bennett into the penitentiary and preventing the President from granting a pardon. For that manly and victorious deed Howard will never cease to swear by him and defend him. How could he do less when the feat is worth $5,000,000,000 to the cause of godly suppression?

I would willingly giv a minute and a half's earnings to know which the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., A.SS., etc., etc., really loves the most sincerely, Anthony or Jesus. It may be "six of one and half a dozen of the other." I can only say that if he loves Jesus as devotedly as he does Anthony, it is quite sufficient. He will surely be saved. But I fear Jesus does not reciprocate the love, that he does not love either of them with intensity. I do not cherish a doubt; I don't see how he can and be consistent. If I were Jesus myself, I fear I could not love them well enough to save them. I would let them take the lowest seat in h—l. I believe Jesus likes me to-day better than he does them—that is, if he likes anybody—and for the reason thatI am an honester man than they are. I don't advocate deceit and falsehood; I don't wish to harm anybody, and I try to discharge my duty towards my fellow-beings honestly and faithfully. I don't want to bring trouble upon any one.

Yes, I candidly believe that if Jeaus should happen along in this part of the world, just the same sort of person he was eighteen hundred and fifty years ago—plain, humble, and unpretending—he would call upon me, at THE TRUTH SEEKER office, or even visit me here in prison, and ask me to go a fishing with him, or to take a ride on the water, before he would call upon Howard at his residence, or go into his splendid church, or call upon Anthony at 150 Nassau street. Yes, I honestly believe the old-fashioned Jesus would rather look over THE TRUTH SEEKER and inquire how the paper was doing than to hear Howard preach one of his best sermons. If he wanted any "suppressing" done in the most unfeeling manner he might call upon them, but not otherwise. He did not, however, exhibit the suppressing disposition when he lived in Palestine, and I don't believe he would now were he to come again. True, his church for centuries has been a persistent suppressor, but it did not receive the instructions from him to be so. I am willing to venture fifteen minutes of my earnings that there is this day more resemblance between Jesus and myself than between Howard and Jesus, and I will, my readers, leave it with you to decide. Let us look into the matter for a few minutes:

1. Jesus was born in humble life. So was I.
2. He is said to hav learned a trade when young. So did I.
3. He is claimed to hav used the saw and jack-plane. So hav I.
4. He did not follow his trade when he became a man. Neither did I.
5. He took up the avocation of a teacher. So did I.
6. He was fond of speaking in parables. I wrote letters. (Inquire of Comstock, Bundy, and Abbot.)
7. He was an Infidel to what was the orthodoxy of his day. So am I.
8. His doctrines were unpopular with the high and the proud of the nation. So are mine.
9. But he spoke what he honestly believed to be truth, however unpopular. So do I.
10. He wrote once in the sand. I wrote several times on paper. His was the easier rubbed out.
11. He was rather partial to the opposite sex. So am I.
12. He never held any improper connection with females (not as anybody knows of). "Them's my sentiments."
13. "Jesus wept." So hav I.
14. He had very little of this world's goods. So hav I.
15. He sometimes did not know where his next dinner was coming from. I hav been in the same predicament.
16. He was not proud, haughty, nor aristocratic. Neither am I.
17. He was the friend of publicans and sinners. So am I.
18. He wished to do injustice to none. Neither do I.
19. He tried to do the best he could under the circumstances. So do I.
20. He was fond of going fishing, and strolling around the country, and resorting to the woods. I used to be when I was a boy, and would again if I did not hav so much else to attend to.
21. He had no particular veneration for the Sabbath. Neither hav I.
22. He liked truth better than deceit and falsehood. So do I.
23. He favored a marriage ceremony with his presence. So hav I.
24. He turned water into wine. I hav done the same, and can again.
25. He cured the sick and lame. So hav I.
26. He said, "Blessed are the merciful," and "Blessed are the peacemakers." I second the motion.
27. He once got angry and cursed a fig tree. I once lost my temper and swore at a hemlock.
28. He had a band of trusty, faithful friends. So hav I.
29. He had a great number of mean and bitter enemies. So hav I.
30. The chief priests, the scribes, and the Pharisees were his worst enemies. So they are mine.
31. They complained of him to the authorities, and got him into trouble. They hav done the same by me.
32. There was a false, black-hearted detective who betrayed him; his name was Judas. Mine was Anthony.
33. Judas got thirty pieces of silver from the self-righteous priests for his meanness. Anthony gets four thousand pieces every year.
34. Judas did one good deed; he hung himself. Anthony ought to do the same.
35. The religious bigots caused Jesus to be arrested. So they did me.
36. Many false charges were made against him. So there were against me.
37. They hated him because he told the truth. So they do me.
38. They accused him of blasphemy. So they did me.
39. They made the false charges of sedition and disloyalty against him. With me it was obscenity.
40. He was condemned on a false pretext. So was I.
41. He had a most unfair trial. So had I.
42. He was reviled, insulted, and imposed upon. So was I.
43. His judge ruled against him and decided against him most unjustly. So did mine.
44. He was cruelly deprived of his dearest rights. So was I.
45. He was sent to execution. I was sent to prison (two thousand years in time make a great difference).
46. He had a thief on each side. I hav hundreds around me on all sides.
47. He suffered as a martyr to freedom of thought and action. So do I.
48. His persecutors disgraced themselves in the eyes of the world. So hav mine.
49. He rose again. So will I.
50. His sayings and teachings were remembered long after he died. I hope mine will be.

There are fifty points of resemblance between us two distinguished individuals, besides about as many more that I won't name till next time. There are doubtless some people in the country who are not aware that Jesus and Bennett were so much alike. That comes from not reading THE TRUTH SEEKER. Verily, verily, I say unto you, unless ye read THE TRUTH SEEKER ye will tarry in the tents of ignorance.

It is but fair to state, however, that though we are so very much alike, there are some few points of dissimilarity. I will name a few of them.

1. There was a very remarkable event attending the begetting of Jesus. There was not in my case.
2. He was said to be the descendant of a king by the way of his stepfather. I did not descend from a king in any way. I had no stepfather to descend from.
3. Astounding predictions were said to hav been made of his advent some seven hundred years before it took place. There was nothing of that kind in my case that I ever heard of.
4. His father was never seen by any person. Thousands of people saw my father.
5. Jesus never got married. I did, once.
6. It is not known that Jesus toiled much with his hands. I hav been a hard worker.
7. Jesus was annoyed a good deal by the devil. I never was.
8. The devil was said to hav tempted Jesus severely. I don't think he did me.
9. The devil carried him up on to the pinnacle, as well as on the top of a high mountain. He never did me.
10. Jesus did not kill the devil, his father's deadly enemy and the bitter foe of the human race, when his death would hav been an immense benefit to both. I would hav done it sure.
11. Jesus is said to hav obtained a view at that time of all the kingdoms and lands of the earth. I never hav been able to see anything on the opposite side of the globe. In fact my vision has never extended but about forty miles on the surface of the earth in any direction.
12. Jesus cast out a great many devils—seven out of one woman. I never was successful in that line.
13. He is said to hav brought a dead man to life after his body began to decompose. I never tried to do that, and don't believe I could if I should try a hundred times.
14. He is said to hav walked on the water. I never could successfully unless it was frozen.
15. According to nearly all the pictures of him that I hav seen, he parted his hair in the middle and wore a halo over his head. I do not.
16. He advised his followers to make no provision for to-morrow or next week. I do not approve of the doctrine. It is death to all enterprise and thrift. If carried out in all cases it would reduce the world to a terribly bad condition.
17. He taught if a man's eye troubled him, like being inflamed, to pluck it out. I regard it as poor advice. It would be better to cure it and keep it in. The same will apply to his advice to cut off one's hand if it was lame, or sore, or had offended. I don't believe in chopping off any part of our bodies.
18. Jesus said, "If a man takes your coat giv him your cloak also." I cannot recommend the principle. It is a reward for crime that should never be given. That theory carried out to the full would make some of the convicts in this prison very rich men.
19. When Jesus made his grand entry into Jerusalem he sent one of his attendants to take a man's ass without asking the permission of the owner. I would not hav done it. I would sooner hav gone afoot, even if the show were far less imposing.
20. He was ambitious and a monarchist. He aspired to be a prince and a king, and recognized the rights of kings to rule over their fellow-men. I do not believe in kings, but in a republican form of government. I never aspired to be a ruler: no, not even a constable.
21. Jesus said, "If a man smite the one cheek, turn the other to him also." I would not do it. I would sooner giv the blow right back to the fellow.
22. Jesus did not take much interest in this world. I do. I think more of it than any world I know anything about.
23. Jesus believed that Jonah lived three days in the stomach of a fish. I do not. My faith don't hold out that far.
24. It is claimed for Jesus that he had the power to save himself from a painful, ignominious death and would not exercise it. I would hav taken the opposite course.
25. He showed a disposition to send those who would not believe what they could not in any way, to everlasting misery. I hav not that disposition.

There, those are the principal points I think of just now wherein Jesus and I widely differ. But it will be seen that we are alike in twice as many points as we disagree in. So I am just twice as much like him as unlike him.

But how is it with Howard? Wherein are he and Jesus alike? Wait a minute; let me think. Is there anything they agree in? Hav they any sentiments, dispositions, or characteristics in common? No, I cannot think that they hav. If they are alike in anything I cannot think what it is except in the one thing of sending people to hell for not believing. It occurs to me, however, that they differ in several little particulars, some of which I will mention.

1. Howard is popular among the rich and proud ones of the earth. Jesus was not.
2. Howard is paid a large salary for delivering two sermons in a week. Jesus taught nearly all the time free gratis for nothing.
3. Howard has a splendid church to preach in and a fine mansion for himself and family. Jesus generally had to preach out in the highways or in the wilderness, and he said he even had not a place whereon to lay his head.
4. Howard is imperious and haughty. Jesus was not.
5. Howard wears fine broadcloth and linen. Jesus did not.
6. Howard has titles at both ends of his name. Jesus had neither.
7. Howard is Chancellor of a fashionable, aristocratic, institution. Jesus never was.
8. Howard is a great "Doctor of Divinity." Jesus was not.
9. Howard is a great "Doctor of Laws." Jesus was not.
10. Howard is a man of extensive learning. There is no reason to suppose Jesus was.
11. Howard runs a suppression society to crush the rights of others. Jesus did nothing of the kind.
12. Howard lays traps and snares to decoy the unsuspecting. Jesus would hav scorned anything so base.
13. Howard accuses others falsely. Jesus never did.
14. Howard approves of depriving others of their liberty and their rights. Nothing could hav been further from Jesus.
15. Howard goes with the popular current and acts with the majority. Jesus was always in a small, unpopular minority.
16. Howard shows a fiendish disposition to stamp on an unfortunate, ill-used, old man, already bound and prostrate. Jesus never did, and never could be mean enough to do a thing so vile.
17. Howard trims his sails to catch the popular breeze, and is very fond of the homage of men. Jesus was totally different.
18. Howard is a Pharisee and a great friend to the Pharisees. Jesus was diametrically the opposite of this.
19. Howard stands up among his brethren and defends deceit and falsehood. Jesus would hav died before doing that.
20. Howard thus sets a very bad example to young men. Jesus would not.
21. Howard hob-nobs with arrant hypocrites. Jesus did not.
22. Howard is a worldly man. Jesus was a heavenly man.
23. Howard apologizes for villainy in others. Jesus would not.
24. Howard likes Anthony Comstock. Jesus does not, never did, and never will. I am very sure of that, and am willing to risk my money on it. But I will say this: if I ever learn it for certain that Jesus has taken Anthony into his friendship and company, I will immediately look up another hotel, even if I hav to take a common boarding-house. I would rather be in hell with decent people than to be in heaven with Comstock. But he'll never see heaven; there's no danger of that.

There are numerous other points wherein Jesus and Howard are the very antipodes of each other. It is needless, however, to mention them all now. I hav said enough to show that Jesus and myself are far more alike than Jesus and Howard, or Howard and myself. And I will repeat what I said before, that were it possible for Jesus to come back here and be just as he used to be, I believe he would keep my company far quicker than Howard's. I don't believe Jesus entertains the least bit of ill-will towards me, while Howard hates me with intensity. He denounces me in public and private; he accuses me falsely, and he virtually drove a man from his house with whom he had for years been on friendly terms, simply because he spoke and acted in my defense.

Howard boasts of his love for Jesus, and it is his principal stock in trade; but I believe it to be all a sham, and a part of the system of deceit and falsehood which he advocates. He loves Jesus just as much as Comstock does, and that it not as much as a pinch of snuff. They both love the money and power they hav acquired and can retain by shouting for Jesus and pretending to follow him; but as true as the sun shines in the heavens they neither love nor follow the humble, lowly, despised, persecuted Galilean. They are as unlike as light and darkness.

I'll tell you, my friends, whom Howard Crosby likes, whom he resembles, and whom he follows, and that is John Calvin. He is a disciple of John Calvin. He believes in Calvin's theology and teaches it. Yes, he is vastly more like Calvin than like Jesus. You know something about what kind of a man Calvin was. Let me refresh your memories a little. Calvin was a close student. He studied Latin, Greek, theology, and other branches of learning. He was a Doctor of Divinity, and doctored it very extensively. He was also a "Doctor of Laws," and the titles of D.D. and LL.D. were conferred upon him. He intended at first to practice law for a profession, but concluded later to pursue theology. He became a teacher of theology at Geneva, and ultimately acquired great power there, not only in the church but in the administration, laws, and the courts. He was imperious and overbearing in style, and vindictive and merciless toward those who had the temerity to oppose his views. As his power increased he bitterly persecuted and crushed, even unto death, several of his unfortunate victims. He had not the slightest sympathy for those in distress, in prison, or in trouble. He employed spies, and used a system of espoinage much the same as Crosby uses and approves. He drove from Geneva an excellent man named Castalio, who, afterward, on the point of starvation in Berne, appealed to Calvin for a little aid. With the spirit of a fiend Calvin falsely charged him with theft. The poor man finally died of hunger, and his family was reduced to extreme misery. This man had dared to disagree with some of Calvin's views. Bishop Spalding, in his "History of the Reformation," in speaking of Calvin, says: "Whosoever opposed Calvin, whether in religion or politics, was hunted down, and his blood was sought at his instigation. He never forgave a personal injury. In regard to his enemies, he was as watchful as a tiger preparing to pounce upon its prey, and as treacherous." He showed his mercilessness toward a class of dissenters called Faquins. He wrote of them to the Marquis de Poet thus: "Do not hesitate to rid the country of those fanatical fellows who, in their conversation, seek to excite the people against us, who blacken our conduct, and would fain make our belief pass as a revery. Such monsters ought to be strangled, as I did in the execution of Michael Servetus." This is from Calvin's own pen, and how like it is to the way Howard Crosby feels toward myself and other unbelievers!

Calvin showed his utter vindictiveness of character in the case of Pierre Ameaux, a member of the Genevan Council. At supper, while inflamed with wine, he said some hard things about Calvin. The next morning Ameaux was cited before the council for the words he had dared to utter against the dictator. He made an apology and said he was under the influence of liquor. The council fined him, however, thirty thalers, which was a considerable sum in those times. But it was not enough to suit the merciless Calvin. On hearing of the sentence he donned his doctor's dress, entered the hall in an excited condition, and swung his arms (much as Crosby did in the meeting where I was denounced, and where he lied about me so meanly), and demanded, in the name of God whom Ameaux had outraged, and in the name of morals he had sullied, that a public apology should be made in three places in the city by the humbled offender. The council yielded. The next day Ameaux, half-naked, with a torch in his hand, accused himself, in a loud voice, of having knowingly and wickedly offended God, and begged pardon of the offended citizens.

Another man, Henry de la Mar, on the same occasion spoke a few words against Calvin, and the tyrant must hav his revenge upon him also. He sent his spy Texier (a regular Comstock sort of a fellow) to dog him and see what he could learn. The spy, under an oath of secresy, obtained from La Mar an admission of the words he had spoken against Calvin, and then with the same regard for his oath that Comstock has, he rushed up to his master, the Rev. John Calvin, D.D., LL.D., and reported what he had learned. The consequence was Calvin procured La Mar to lose a lucrative situation, and be thrown into prison. The reason assigned by the judges was that La Mar had blamed Mr. Calvin.

A course equally mean and despicable was pursued by Calvin against Francis Favre, a veteran soldier of the republic and a counsellor of the city. He attended a wedding where dancing and hilarity were participated in. Calvin had spies there, as he had on all occasions, and the same as Crosby keeps in his employ. They reported that Favre had used seditious language (if it were now, and here, it would be termed obscenity). Favre was arrested under a charge of ten specifications, the most grievous of which was that on being conducted to prison by Calvin's minions he had cried out "Liberty! Liberty! I would give a thousand thalers to have a general council." He was convicted and sentenced to beg pardon. He had too much spirit to do so, when he had committed no wrong; and upon this he was thrown into prison, where he lay several weeks, and was only released upon urgent solicitation of a deputation from Berne. This was the conduct of Rev. John Calvin D.D., LL.D., of whom Howard Crosby is an admiring disciple and follower.

Archbishop Spalding again says: "Calvin also sought the life of Ami Perrin, the Captain-General of Geneva. Perrin's wife had been guilty of dancing in the territory of Berne. Calvin sought to entrap Perrin before the Council; and he was, in consequence, thrown into prison. Calvin thirsted for his blood. But the people loved Perrin. The Council of two hundred assembled to try him for his life. A reaction took place; Perrin was about to be liberated, and Megret (Calvin's friend) was openly denounced. At this juncture Calvin entered the council hall. The people received him with cries of 'Death to Calvin.' Calvin waved his hand (Crosby-like), addressed them and calmed their fury; but he barely succeeded, by his eloquence, in saving his life." "By his overwhelming influence, however, Calvin succeeded in having Perrin afterwards tried, when, though his life was spared, he was deprived of the place of captain-general.

There is probably no more learned writer in this country than Archbishop Spalding of Baltimore, who penned the above, quoting the very best authors and historians, like Audin, Beza, and others. Here is what he says about Calvin's murder of poor James Gruet: "Who will not be stricken with horror on reading of the cold-blooded cruelty with which he hunted down and compassed the death of poor Gruet, the poet! This unfortunate man was accused of having fixed a placard on Calvin's pulpit at St. Peter's church, in which the reformer was severely handled. He was apprehended, and his papers seized. Among these, consisting of nothing but loose sheets, were found some scraps of poetry and other fugitive pieces, which were tortured into heresy and treason. He was applied with torture by Calvin's creature, Colladon, every day for a whole month. They wished him to implicate Favre or Perrin; but, though he cried out in agony of torture, 'Finish me, I beseech you! I am dying!' he remained firm and would not accuse them. The Council pronounced sentence of death upon him. Among the charges against him, the principal were that he had endeavored to ruin the authority of the consistory; that he had menaced the ministers, and spoken ill of Calvin; and that he had conspired with the king of France against the safety of Calvin and the state. Gruet died on the scaffold. But Calvin was not yet satisfied; he wished that Gruet's writings should be condemned, and he himself drew up a long form of condemnation of them, which was approved by the Council. Calvin alone is responsible for the blood of Gruet; it still cries aloud to heaven against him."

How easily could the same charges be made against me, and with equal justice! How gladly, too, Crosby and Comstock would hav me tortured and executed in the same way that their captain, Calvin, wreaked his vengeance upon poor Gruet! They would undoubtedly quickly do so had they the same power to wield that Calvin had. Benedict is willing enough, but his power, thanks to the spread of civilization and general intelligence, is not equal to that of the father of Presbyterianism, Congregationalism, and Calvinistic Methodism.

I cannot take the space to describe Calvin's mean and tyrannous treatment of Bolsec, of Gentilis, of Berthellier, and numerous others; but it was heartless, merciless, and damnable in the extreme, and bespoke most unmistakably the blood-thirsty conduct of a fiend incarnate. I will, however, quote what the archbishop says of the horrible murder of Michael Servetus by Calvin, as condensed from two chapters of Audin's history:

"1st. Servetus was burned on the 27th of October, 1553, but as early as 1546—seven years previously—Calvin had thirsted for his blood, as appears from these words taken from his famous letter to Farel, written in that year. 'If he (Servetus) comes here (to Geneva), and my authority be considered, I will not permit him to escape with his life.'

"2d. Pursuing this blood-thirsty purpose, he had denounced Servetus to the police of Lyons, where he then was. And when he (Servetus) had fled to Vienne he very narrowly escaped—probably with the connivance of the Catholic clergy of Vienne—from the prison to which he had been consigned, at the instigation of officers sent in quest of him, in consequence of his denunciation by Calvin's agents at Lyons.

"3d. When Servetus, fleeing from his enemies, passed through Geneva, Calvin denounced and had him arrested, against all the laws of both God and man. For Servetus was a stranger, only passing through Geneva; and he was not responsible to the Genevan tribunals for a crime which he had not committed within the Genevan territory; and this, even supposing heresy to be a crime punishable by the civil laws.

"4th. Though Servetus was a poor stranger, and though he begged for counsel to defend him, that right, not denied even to the meanest culprit, was refused him at the instance of Calvin.

"5th. After Servetus had lain in prison five weeks, a victim of disease and devoured by vermin, he wrote to the Council stating his situation and begging for a change of linen. The counsel wished to grant his request, but Calvin opposed it, and he succeeded. Three other letters written during the following week from prison, in which Servetus begged for counsel and asked that the charges against him should be specified and made known to him, were answered by—silence.

"6th. When, on the morning of his execution, Servetus sent for Calvin and begged his pardon, if he had offended him, Calvin answered with cold-hearted cruelty. We hav seen above how he insulted his tears.

"7th. The heartless cruelty of the minister Farel (Calvin's tool), who accompanied Servetus to execution, is enough to make one's blood run cold at the bare reading of it.

"8th. The year after the execution of Servetus—1554—Calvin published his famous work on punishing heretics, in which he justified the whole proceeding by the authority of scripture."

It will ever be remembered that Servetus' only offense was writing a book called Christianismi Restitutio, in which he combated in mild language the doctrine of the trinity. The charge against him was blasphemy, "blasphemy!" Calvin acted the part of accuser, prosecutor, and judge. The court was under his control, and a conviction was a forgone conclusion, the same as it was in my case. Sentence of death was passed against an amiable and learned physician, who, like a dove hunted by hawks, fled to the nest of a vulture for safety. For the heinous offense of having convictions of his own, and expressing them like an honorable man, he was condemned to be burnt to death by a slow fire. The fire was made of green oak and burned very slowly, so that the wretched victim was doomed to unnecessarily suffer for many hours the acute agony of the most cruel of deaths. The poor man's cries and shrieks were most pitiful. He begged for a speedy death that his torments might be over, but this reasonable request was fiendishly denied him, and the sufferer's agonies were beyond description. Calvin in writing to a friend coldly said of his victim, "He bellowed after the manner of a Spaniard—'mercy, mercy!'"

The historian Hallam, in speaking of this damnable blot upon human nature, says: "The death of Servetus has, perhaps, as many circumstances of aggravation as any execution for heresy that ever took place. One of these, and among the most striking, is that he was not the subject of Geneva, nor domiciled in the city, nor had the Christianismi Restitutio been published there, but at Vienna. According to our laws and those, I believe, of most civilized nations, he was not amenable to the tribunals of the republic."

This, my readers, was the work of the Rev. John Calvin, D.D., LL. D., of whom Howard Crosby is a very close copy and disciple; and had he the same power over me to-day that his admired leader had over Servetus, there can be no question but what I would share a similar fate. And I don't know but what a man who is torn from his family, friends, and business, and is immured in a prison cell for a year, with thousands of the clergy and self-righteous of the land reviling him and slandering him, really suffers more, in the aggregate, mentally and physically, than he who is put to a sudden death, whether by fire or on the cross. By the latter modes it is more painful, of course, but it is soon over, while the agony of a year's close imprisonment none can fully estimate who has not had the misfortune to experience it.

Yes, I repeat it, that the Rev. Howard Crosby, D.D., LL.D., is far more like the merciless Rev. John Calvin, D.D., LL.D., than he is like the humble, merciful, and long-suffering Jesus; and, taking the difference of the times into consideration, I pronounce him as merciless, as persecuting, and as detestable a character as was the man whose religion he so stoutly upholds. When he (Crosby) said it was worth to society $5,000,000,000 for me to be kept in prison one year, he lied most egregiously. When he said I was "the leader and defender of the propagators of obscenity," he lied most infamously. He reads from, prays over, and thumps every Sunday an old Jewish book that has a thousand times more obscenity and indecency in it than I am imprisoned for mailing. If it is just that I should be here on a charge of "obscenity," Howard Crosby should be here also. If I am justly sentenced for one year, he ought to be sent here for twenty years.

His proud position and his rich friends will of course shield him. He can do about as he pleases; but it is barely possible he may stretch his power a little too far. He and his man Whitney may play the spy and the blackmailer rather more than the intelligent people of New York will tamely submit to. These are not exactly the days of John Calvin, even though the church has succeeded in getting an aged heretic in prison. He and his sneaks, Whitney and Comstock, may get more business on hand than they can well attend to. A day of retribution may come. It may suit him to swear by Anthony Comstock and Whitney; but if he would swear by Jesus or by God it might be quite as well.

He acted the part of a clerical bully and slanderer at the obscenity meeting in the Y. M. C. A. hall. He was so brave as to denounce and revile an unpopular old man who was absent, who was bound in chains and in prison, simply because the old man has the independence to hold his own convictions on theology. Why don't the bigot and braggart take somebody near his size and somebody who is free? He is Chancellor of the University of the great city of New York. Prof. J. W. Draper fills one of the chairs in the same university. I believe Prof. Draper's theological views and mine are very nearly alike, or rather mine are very nearly like his. I hav read his "Intellectual Development of Europe" and his "Conflict Between Religion and Science." I regard them as two of the best books I ever read. My views harmonize with his very closely. Now, if I am wrong in my belief, Prof. Draper is wrong also. If I ought to be in prison for heresy or blasphemy—for that is really what I am here for—why should he not also be prosecuted and sent here? Why should not everybody be imprisoned or burnt who don't believe as John Calvin and Howard Crosby say they must? But, I ask again, why don't Crosby pitch into Prof. Draper, who is at least his equal, morally, socially, and mentally? Why not let me rest quietly here in prison until my term has expired, and direct his darts of venom and hate to Prof. Draper?

If, however, he thinks I am game worthy of his attention, I will make him a proposition. If he will wait till I again hav the liberty which belongs to me—if he and Comstock will not prosecute me again—and he thinks he can show me that I am in theological error and darkness, I will enter into a fair and honorable discussion with him for six months, more or less, the same to be published in THE TRUTH SEEKER and in any paper of his own denomination, or in any secular paper that he may select. I will pay the expense of the printing. I will print every word that he may write, verbatim, just as he wishes it, and when it is completed I will issue the whole in book form, and furnish him with as many copies as he wishes at absolute cost.

Yes, I go so far as to challenge the reverend gentleman to this discusion. Let there be a fair contest between Calvin-

Religious Instruction for Our Criminals and Its Effect upon Them.—Concluded.

His religion givs him no strength or manly courage to resist the temptations that beset him, adds no new faculties to body or mind, improves not in the least his intellect or reason, givs no idea of the worth of a moral and upright life, but requires a belief in myths and fallacies; therefore it is worthless to him here, being calculated only for an imaginary future life.

The convict on leaving prison soon finds he has been deluded by the priests, who labor for money, rob him of knowledge, doing nothing to improve him here; and the Gods upon whom he has been taught to trust fail him, being utterly powerless to assist or unwilling to do so. Thus he is thrown back upon his own individual efforts and self-reliance, and can but fail. Having no knowledge whatever of self-effort, he will resort to his old methods of living in some way upon the earnings of others.

This is the result of allowing religion to fill the place of proper and sensible teaching to our criminals, being the experience of thousands in our state yearly, many of whom might, with suitable instruction, be restored again to their friends and families and to the state as useful and respected citizens.

In this connection it is well to examine the claim of these insolent and dogmatic Pharisees of the superiority of their religious to natural morality, and the assistance they claim to render the state in instructing its criminals.

It is evident their labors are actuated by selfish motives, for the pay received, to be rated as reformers and philanthropists, and to propagate their own religious views and spread their religion.

This is likely to prejudice the mind of the convict in favor of some form of religion, but is productive of strife, envy, and contention that creates inharmony and bitterness amongst convicts as with all classes of religionists outside.

Religious feuds, religious injustice, and religious wranglings are the most implacable and really hostile elements to the peace, prosperity, and high moral elevation of good society outside of prisons of anything known; and strange it is that any person, however religious, should wish to introduce such an element amongst our most vicious and desperate criminals.

As the laws of the land are not founded upon religion, but upon morality, which is a system or practice of moral duties in this life concerning actions and relations toward each other and our duties to good government, its importance and superiority over all religions become obvious to the honest citizen, and for this reason religion should be discarded because it cannot fill the place of true morality.

All religions teach some moral precepts, yet none of them hav any necessary connection with morality, which is strict rectitude of character; and all religions suffer when compared with it, they being dependent on belief, not necessitating uprightness of conduct, saving without honesty and a virtuous life, while these constitute the very essence of morality and are superior to any religion in the known world.

A nation that is moral and just is greatly superior to any nation however religious but destitute of moral honesty; so it is with individuals, and we can set it down there can be nothing better in any individual than morality, and nothing better than this can be required of a convict.

Religion does not make a person moral in his acts or just in his dealings; many of our pious and most religious persons outside prisons are the most immoral, deceptive, and vicious persons to be found, and the remark is often heard, and is worth minding, too, that a very religious person will bear careful watching.

Some of the most noted defaulters, forgers, swindlers, and embezzlers of our day hav been eminently religious, having had the best religious instruction from the Sabbath-school and the pulpit, hav made long prayers with great professions of genuine piety, hav given liberally to support indolent priests to teach theology and absurdity, hav spent much time in the worship of imaginary gods, given large sums of money to help Christianize the heathen, while robbing the industrious poor of their scanty earnings.

All this has been done while occupying the best social positions, with surroundings favorable to integrity and usefulness; yet they hav ruined themselves for this life, beside, bringing untold suffering and misery upon thousands of innocent persons; all this has been and is now being done by many intelligent and educated religious persons having the confidence of the community, supported and strengthened by all good people, but use religion as a cloak to conceal these great crimes against society.

You may tell us it was a lack of religion in these persons that caused their ruin, but this does not appear; these men were pious but not moral; had they been men of moral rectitude destitute of piety, they would not hav fallen, but would now be found outside prisons, honorable men and useful members of society.

This shows the inferiority of religion to morality, and if it did not save these men while restrained by strong public sentiment and religious and moral influences combined, how is it possible to make it beneficial to a convict with his better faculties already stultified and debased by his past and present vices, surrounded by evil influences and low, base, and degrading companions, whose power over him is too strong for his weak moral nature to resist?

If religions, religious beliefs, creeds, dogmas, and all gods were banished from our penitentiaries and prisons and never brought to the notice of a convict, if he were taught natural "morality"—that is, honesty, purity, justice, benevolence, truthfulness, kindness, and all the social and moral virtues; if he regard the rights of others, do right, cease to do wrong, obey the laws, regain his own lost manhood, this is all that can be required, and all that is necessary, and the only thing that can save him; and all this can be the better effected without the introduction of religion or religious teaching, as these things can by the convict be understood, whereas religion when mixed with them only perplexes and mystifies them all. A man cannot be a moral man without being a good man, but he can be religious and be one of the greatest knaves and scoundrels in society.

Were these religious teachings given our criminals without expense to tax-payers it might be less obnoxious, but would change no principle we advocate, or commend it to a reasoning person.

Many suppose that church and state are separate in this country because no national or state law unites them; so they giv this subject no attention, while religions, the greatest enemy of this secular government—which is founded on justice to all, the equal rights of all its citizens, and the right of self-government—are forcing their way through insolent priests into all our penal institutions, claiming the right to monopolize the instruction for the criminal. Thus non-religionists of all classes are taxed annually many thousands of dollars in this state to pay for deluding, swindling, and debasing the most ignorant, vicious, and worthless scoundrels in society, and those guilty of the most brutal, cruel, and atrocious crimes. This is an injustice to three-fourths of our taxpayers, as they do not believe the doctrines taught and doubt their utility; yet, out of the respect they hav for religion and religious people, continue to suffer from this injustice. It is time that we unbelievers—Freethinkers, Liberals, and Infidels—giv this subject the attention its importance demands, correct the injustice, and retire religions to their proper place—the church, Sabbath-school, and the family circle. We hav chaplains in Congress, in halls of legislation, in the army and navy, in penitentiaries and prisons, and yet many intelligent people will tell us church and state are separate; so do the clergy, yet they, must know it is not true. Church-members and preachers, if honest, should unite with the Liberals to preserve our penal and government institutions from the contaminating influence of religions, and keep them as they were designed to be, entirely secular. Yours, R. C. Trowbridge.

Thoughts for the Thoughtful.—No. 3.

INSCRIBED TO THE REV. J. H. DODD.

If I be mistaken, it can amount to nothing more than a mere delusion for a few years. I can be just as moral, as scientific, social, or earnest, as pure and noble, in believing in a God as are those who do not believe in a God, heaven, or hell.—J. H. Dodd.

So thee thinks, but so do not I think. Error is never as elevating as truth. Dreams are never as desirable as realities. Wasted labor spent on myths is never as beneficial as useful work devoted to real good. One who grounds his edifice on fable can never be as scientific as though he built on fact. To say a God created the world just as it is, and made man out of dust, and woman out of his rib, and each plant, flower, and tree perfect and fully developed at once, is not scientific. To say the world is only a few thousand years old is not scientific. To divide waters so that dry land appears for the godly to walk upon is not scientific. To confound language because men attempt to build a tower to heaven is not scientific. To believe in trees whose fruit is knowledge or eternal life is not scientific. To change pure water into pure wine is not scientific. To believe in a beast whose tail could drag stars to earth is not scientific. To think one star could touch the earth and not destroy it is not scientific. And indeed I could fill pages with facts from thy God-book proving that no believer can be scientific, because he dares not be so. He cannot be as pure, for he is tied down to examples that are not pure. He cannot rise above his guide and still believe him perfect. Neither God nor Christ were perfect. No heaven-believer can be as good as the same man would be had he been taught morality aside from religion, for so much is wasted in visionary intangibilities that should go to reform the real and the new. And last, worst, and surest, no hell-believer can be good, noble, pure, or moral. If we believe a theory to be good or useful, we wish it to be true. And a man who really believes in hell desires a hell. He thinks his God perfect; he thinks Omniscience saw and desired a hell and created one for his own good purposes. And shall he be wiser than his God, more kind than his God, or more merciful than his God? No, he is only a reflex image of his Deity. He has created a monster-man and endowed him with all the powers, passions, and capacities he conceives to be best, noblest, grandest, and most powerful, and fancies this creation to be a real entity, while it is only himself idealized.

Now every Christian who abandons the hell-belief makes a better God than those who retain it, and this better God grows out of the better man. Every Christian who drops the idea of miracles advances one step further towards scientific truth and robs his imaginary God of just so much imaginary power.

'Tis too late in the day to teach or preach the idea that delusion is harmless. Science has become too strong to be wheedled into yielding her prerogatives to dreamers and delusionists. She demands solid ground to build upon, and sweeps away Bibles, creeds, dogmas, and myths as if they were but motes upon the great sea of progress. You may keep alive your peculiar tenets for a few hundred or thousand years yet in the minds of the untaught and the unlearned, but the scientist and the scholar, the thinker and the philosopher, of the next century will no more believe them than did the old pagan philosophers swallow the wonders of the pagan theologies (theogonies, you term them); yet their temples were as grand, their gods as great, and their worship as sincere as is that of the Christian of to-day. And the very men who were the leaders, teachers, and preachers of that old mythology knew just as well as the learned and scientific preachers and teachers of to-day now know that they were teaching myths and fables for facts and truths. Philosophers bowed to Jupiter, consulted the oracles, and paid all due deference to the popular superstition of the age just as many skeptics of to-day are doing. Some did it to win popular favor; some because they thought a "mere delusion" no harm, and some because they believed it good for the ignorant and common people to be kept in bondage by their belief in and fear of the gods. The Atheist who denied the existence of the Olympian deities was condemned to death, banishment, and ostracism just as Christian believers hav condemned this class among themselves.

"A mere delusion!" And what hav all beliefs in myths and errors been but "mere delusions?" You condemn the Mormon, the Freelover, and the heathen idolater as workers of iniquity; but, if they be in error, what is it but a "mere delusion?" It will not do to use such sophistry as this in an age when truth is the highest and holiest god of the people. He who cannot prove his doctrine true will hav to go to the wall and yield his place to the man who givs facts and realities founded upon experimental knowledge.

"We steadfastly strive, though our ranks are thin,
Not in the hope of a golden meed,
But to widen the rift where the light shines in,
Which shows us the truth, not a time-worn creed.

The past has been fraught since an early day
With plans for a future world of bliss;
We modestly seek to do what we may Toward making man worthy to liv in this."

Fragments from the Book of Life.

THE BUILDING OF THE TEMPLE.

BY H. W. BOOZER.

Truth's temple is a beautiful building, of fine proportions, grandly architectural, and in exquisite harmony as a work of itself and with all its surroundings. This distinction, however, exists between the material and the intellectual world, that in the latter case as the person is individualized he must for himself build his own temple in every detail, though much or little assisted by others. The writer assumes that, like all other knowledge, we are in process of growth regarding the questions involved in the facts of sex, and that this department of the temple of truth requires the best thought and the most profound study of those who would benefit humanity. In these fragments he will, in the rough, and not in entirety, bring together material, hoping it may be of benefit to those who aspire toward something better. Ideas of truth to-day, with no promise of to-morrow. Nor is any claim made as to what they may be to others, more than they commend themselves to the reason and judgment. He has that which he has not known to be taught—orally or in writing—of importance in this field of research, involving new facts, new philosophy, new principles and methods, which will be of interest to the readers of The Truth Seeker.

To properly get at the new, it will be necessary to bring forward the old somewhat. Yet it will be as lightly treated as possible, and thinkers will bear with him in that necessary treatment.

In the erection of a building it is first necessary the space should be cleared. It is a lamentable fact with one who loves his fellow-men that so much of the labor of life is applied, not to legitimate work, but to the removal of that which ignorance has placed in the way. The world's errors are like mountains. The negation of these, which precedes their dissolution, is a herculean task. So, as we cast our eyes over the field of humanity in which to pile up our beautiful temple of sexual truth, we find the unsightly heaps of the world's error towering in hideous blackness, the monuments of the ignorance and barbarism of the past. Before making any attempts at the demolition of these vast structures—the accumulations of history as far as we hav records—let us look at some of the minor obstructions which lie in our way.

Not the least of these, perhaps, is the ghost of public opinion. The victim of theological error, in his endeavor to get from the darkness into the light, knows the withering effect of feeling concentrated on him by those he has left behind. But this is absolutely nothing compared with the intensity of hate by those who, in blissful ignorance of natural morality, bask in the moral code by priestcraft; and one who cares to know what is right here, to say nothing of its practice, must expect to receive from Mrs. Grundy such bespatterings and befoulings of the filth of ignorance and its spirit of vindictiveness as will make nature's student almost wonder if he is not as Mrs. Grundy advertises him—almost wishing he had never been born—praying for annihilation; and if he must liv again, that he may be resurrected on a planet where knowledge and not the venom of ignorance may rule. Count the cost, fellow-builder, when you construct your temple; not that you may desist from the attempt of wisdom, but that you may be firm and stanch when comes the day of trial, as it surely will. None but those born soldiers are wanted here, cowards need not apply. It is a light thing to advance toward the cannon's mouth, but who can stand the scorn of those we love? I answer, only the great-hearted. On the other hand, to the innately brave we can only say, as Moore has it:

"Danger's self is lure alone."

and, worms as we are, the Adamic spirit rises when attempt is made to trample on or crush us.

One of the difficulties connected with this investigation is the use of terms. Words derive their meaning from the sense in which they come to be used. We speak of marriage and the mass receive the impression of an institution, whose display side, and but a small portion of it, is meant; while to the student or physician it means a something from which the drop-curtain is lifted, the glamor gone, and facts revealed that shock the world. We protest against the use of the word "Freelove," as the association of ideas in the minds of those who speak or hear creates misunderstanding. We do not wish to be known as with those who are not Freelovers, while that which is not free is necessarily forced, and brings us in the intimate relations of life to the greatest of all crimes—rape. Just so in the use of all words in this connection, there clings an association of false ideas, meanings we do not wish to convey; and yet it is difficult to treat the subject without their use.

False modesty is not in place here. Honest, true words, a decision in action that interprets nature in all her works as the highest ideal of purity we can know, is the true line for us to follow. This quality of nature avoids all endeavor to go the farthest possible extreme from the false modesty of a false moral code, yet pursues a course which is never once forgetful of the central fact that this beautiful structure upon which we work is the temple of truth. A desire for what is right and just, a deep, abiding sense of the sacredness of humanity, and a love for it which will compass all things to save it from the doom of ignorance, will bring with them—no matter where they lead or no matter what details necessary for the elucidation of any subject they find—a modesty of nature's own, which will ennoble one who so uses it in the estimation of every true man or woman. So that he who builds his own temple must throw aside the flimsiness of the false, seek the light, and work openly and unflinchingy.

A Powerful Sermon on Faith.

BY BROTHER SMITH.

My beloved sisters and brothers, your 'spected preacher am again called to splain the gospel, an' it givs me 'ticular pleasure to see the St. John s school board present.

I'se dispensed with prayer on this occasion fur the reason that I'se no faith in prayer. The faith of this whole congregation, all put together, wouldn't be equal to a grain of mustard-seed. You're a set of unbelievers without faith, for if you had faith like a grain of mustard-seed, you could remove mountains. Jesus says so.

St. John has put up a million of prayers asking God to wipe out the damnable traffic in whisky, but not one of 'em has ever reached our Heavenly Father. So I'se not goin' to fool away any time in useless barkin' in that direction; 'twould be barkin' up the wrong tree. We all know that God is able to knock every barrel of whisky an' keg of beer higher than Beecher's "Life of Christ" and quicker than the jerk of a lamb's tail, but he won't do it. An' why? Well, I'll tell you. My brothers and sisters, your prayers is just like pickin' huckleberries on a shingle—they roll right off; they don't none of 'em go hum to the Heavenly Father. Prayer without faith is of no account.

Now I'se goin' to take a text to convince you that none of you believe in Jesus as taught by the scriptures. My text, my beloved, may be found in John vii, verse 38, an' it reads, "He that believeth on me, as the scriptures hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of living water." Oh, my! wouldn't it be splendid if you could only believe, if you only had faith? Every one of you, my beloved, could fish for trout in your own rivers of living water; you could get a water power an' hav a saw-mill upon every dry knoll; and, in a time of drouth, water your crops with rivers of livin' waters that would flow out of your own belly. In case of fire, the professor of our school could quench the flames, save the building, and tell the children to swim ashore in the rivers of living waters that would flow out of his belly. By all means, as a precaution against fire, our school board should hav a professor who believed in Jesus as taught by the scriptures. Babcock, the Infidel, will tell you that all of these sacred promises are but the product of a diseased brain. But I tell you that a God that can put a camel through the eye of a needle on a square trot without touching is capable of performing the river trick. A God that could cause a spring of pure water to gush out of the jawbone of an ass is capable of causing a river of pure water to gush out of a man's belly.

It's faith that you lack. You are a set of lying hypocrites. You pray an' bark when you know you hav no faith. Then why fool away your time in useless barkin'?

A God who could rain water five miles deep over the whole face of the earth, can, if he likes, cause a river of pure water to gush from every man's belly, and thereby fulfil the sacred promise given in our blessed text, which says, "He that believeth in me, as the scriptures hath said, out of his belly shall flow rivers of livin' water."

If our school board could only get the right man, one who would believe in Jesus "as the scriptures hath said, out of his belly should flow rivers of livin' water." Livin' water! Just the thing for trout! And, oh my, how nice! I fancy that now I see D. C. Hurd and each one of our school board with a long pole fishin' in the rivers that would flow from the belly of the professor of their school. Of course, the size of the stream would be governed very much by the amount of faith; the bigger the faith, the bigger the stream of living waters that would flow; but with but little faith, it am reasonable to suppose that there would be a very small river, if any at all.

So it's faith that's wanted. Jesus has made a promise, and his promises are good. It is in plain language—not to be mistaken. This text am a very important text, and well calculated to impart scientific information and save sinners from the flames of hell, for if they hav faith they can put out the flames of hell in fifteen minutes with the waters that would flow from their belly. But ye hav no faith. Then ye shall be damned and roasted for ever and ever. There'll be plenty of fire but no rivers of water.

Brother Jones will pass the hat for Christ's sake. Amen.

If the printer prints any more of Babcock's articles, do as did Bro. Smith, the harness maker, who does business at the head of the avenue; tell 'em to stop your paper, crush out Infidelity, and rely on Jesus' promises.

Report of the Northern Wisconsin Spiritualist Association.

HELD IN OMRO, JAN. 23, 24, AND 25, 1880.

The meeting was called to order on Friday at two o'clock P. M., by President Lockwood, with attendance smaller than usual on first day of convention.

Afternoon spent in conference.—W. F. Jamieson, President Lockwood, and others parlicipating. The key note of the meeting was sounded at this session, which was closely followed throughout the entire meeting—i. e., the difference between Spiritualism and Materialism. Evening, masked ball.

Saturday morning.—Meeting called to order with number considerably increased. Short conference after which W. F. Jamieson gave a very interesting lecture, entitled, "Hav We a Right to Change Our Minds," a very fine effort and well received. Music by Mr. Lockwood.

Saturday, two o'clock P. M.—Meeting called to order by president. Conference, after which Mr. Lockwood gave one of the finest and most logical lectures ever given in this place, giving his reasons for leaving the Materialistic and coming into the Spiritualistic field. He was loudly applauded by the Spiritualists at intervals through the entire lecture. In the evening W. F. Jamieson spoke on Materialism vs. Spiritualism. He reviewed Mr. Lockwood's afternoon effort, and gave many fine thoughts on Materialism, saying, among others, "If Spiritualism is true, no one will be more pleased than myself;" also, "If true, the spirit is material; consequently Materialism is true."

J. O. Barrett and J. R. Talmadge arrived on the evening train and were welcomed by hosts of warm friends. Meeting adjourned until Sunday.

Sunday morning.—A goodly number present when meeting was called to order. Conference. J. O. Barrett then gave one of his concise and spiritual discourses defending Spiritualism. "Doubt," he said, "was the portal of science—no discovery of truth or advance without it." Reviewing Mr. Jamieson: "He (Jamieson) is not lost, but will by and by blossom out and be grander and better for having passed through his experience caused by doubting." At the close of Mr. Barrett's lecture he was loudly applauded. D. L. Barnes, the secretary elected at our last meeting, being unable to attend to the business, handed in his resignation.

The convention then proceeded to elect a secretary to fill vacancy. Cora B. Phillips, daughter of Dr. J. C. Phillips, former secretary, of Omro, was unanimously elected to fill the position. Session closed by singing from J. R. Talmadge.

Two o'clock P. M.—Meeting called to order. The subject of church taxation, the extending of same courtesies by railroads to Spiritualist and Liberalist speakers as to clergymen, and the bill now before the Wisconsin Legislature prohibiting certain physicians from practicing medicine, were ably discussed. Committees were appointed to draft proper resolutions and present them at evening session for action. Mr. J. R. Talmadge then gave his lecture entitled, "Who Has the Truth?" I wish I could giv a verbatim report of it, but suffice it to say it was conceded by all to be the finest lecture of the convention. At its close Mr. Jamieson rose, and in language peculiar only to himself, gave Mr. Talmadge some very flattering compliments. J. O. Barrett also wished to know where he (Talmadge), timid soul that he was, ever got the courage to go before an audience like that to giv his earnest appeal for what he considered truth. Meeting closed with remarks from the president and a song by Mr. Talmadge.

Evening, seven o'clock.—First thing presented to the meeting was the following report, which was unanimously adopted:

The Spiritualists and Liberalists assembled in Omro this 25th of January, 1880, do hereby

Resolve, That we are utterly opposed to all laws giving one person or any set of persons the exclusive right to practice medicine and surgery in this state, and that we are in favor of giving the people the right to choose whom they shall employ and whom they shall pay without let or hindrance.

A. K. Brush,
W. F. Jamieson,
J. O. Barrett,
} Com.

The following resolutions on taxation of church property were discussed and passed:

Resolved, That the hundreds of millions of dollars in the hands of ecclesiastical organizations are a dangerous precedent to be allowed in a free government, as such can and may be wielded for the union of church and state.

Resolved, That in our secular form of government the principle of equal rights demands the taxation of church property.

Resolved, That the present law exempting such property from taxation imposes unequal burdens upon the people, more especially the producing classes.

J. O. Barrett
W. F. Jamieson,
Dr. J. C. Phillips,
} Com.

Also the following preamble and resolutions were unanimously passed:

WHEREAS, The Spiritualists and Freethinkers constitute a large body of citizens in Wisconsin, representing a commendable share of intellect and influence; and

WHEREAS, Such hav had extended to them in other states the same courtesies as clergymen, of half fare on the railroads; and

WHEREAS, Our public lecturers travel upon all such lines more than any other class of itinerants. Therefore

Resolved, That we respectfully request of railroad companies throughout the state the same courtesies to Spiritualist and Freethinking lecturers as are accorded to Christian ministers.

Resolved, That all lecturers having certificates from this association, according to forms of law, shall be entitled to make application for half fare.

Wm. M. Lockwood,
J. O. Barrett,
M. D. Morris,
} Com.

W. F. Jamieson then proceeded to giv the closing lecture of the convention, the hall being well filled by an attentive audience. Mr. Jamieson came here for the first time since his advent to Materialism, and consequently the Spiritualists, many of them, were prejudiced against him, but I may safely say he got away without an enemy. Gentlemanly and courteous in his bearing, no one can doubt his sincerity or say he is not acting out his highest convictions. The best of feeling prevailed between the speakers and attendants. The convention closed by Mr. Talmadge singing "I Wait at the Golden Gate."

The time and place of holding next meeting will be duly advertised. Wm. M. Lockwood, Pres.

The Detroit Liberal League.—The Christian Spies and Col. Ingersoll.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: The Detroit Liberal League was organized last Saturday evening under very favorable auspices. The Constitution does not differ essentially from the form recommended by the National Liberal League, except that it contains the following sections as part of Article I., defining the object of the League:

Sec. 2. The genius and tendency of religious organizations, and their policy thereto, so far as such policy may exist, to influence or control political action, to usurp political power, or to secure recognition, favor, or patronage for themselves from the civil government, shall always be proper subjects of debate and action, but beyond this this League is not organized to discuss religious beliefs or tenets.

Sec. 3. It shall be a cardinal object and duty of this League and its members to extend their sympathy and support to all persons who may be ostracized or persecuted for the reason of their holding or expressing Liberal opinions; and we urge upon all Liberalists, and all Liberal organizations, of whatever name or kind, to stand firmly as one brotherhood in this fraternal duty.

The League starts off with eighteen members. The following are the officers: President, Prof. W. N. Heilmann; Secretary, S. B. McCracken; Treasurer, B. F. Stamm; Councilors, Karl Schmemann, Mrs. C. E. Pierce, H. Jacobson, and Mrs. L. Barlow.

The President, Prof. Heilmann, is one of our representative German citizens, is principal of the German-American Seminary in Detroit, and a gentleman of high character and culture. In taking the chair he made a brief address, in which he said he thought the purposes of the Liberalists were greatly misunderstood by the public at large. They did not attack the opinions of any sect. Their purpose was not to destroy but to preserve. The Liberalists demanded equality for all opinions and beliefs, and special privileges for none, according to the spirit of the Declaration of Independence.

Col. Ingersoll is announced to lecture in Whitney's Opera House, this city, to-morrow evening. A little experience of the advertising agent of the Opera House shows the spirit of bigotry that is rampant at all times in Detroit, and especially now under the influence of a religious revival. The agent has been in the habit of leaving lithographs and placards in prominent show windows, and upon offering the portrait of Col. Ingersoll last Saturday he was refused in several cases, and in one case was roughly treated. Inquiry developed the fact that a delegation had visited the business men of the city and had importuned them not in any way to countenance Col. Ingersoll's lecture. From the treatment which the Opera House agent received, it is plain that their bulldozing was not without its effect. Of course the parties who did this did it under the authority and inspiration of some organized force. It should be accepted by all Liberals as ample notice that they are under the ban and espionage of a secret and fanatical tribunal analogous to the "holy scheme" of the middle ages in Europe. It should also teach them the necessity of burying minor differences and acting together as one body in a common cause.

Astride the Fence.

TO THE EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: Not long ago a man said to me he thought the editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER "ought to be a little more conservative." What does that mean? Is there any stopping-place between genuine orthodox Christianity and outright Infidelity? Certainly there is not. Jehovah is either a reality or a myth. There is no half-way business about that. Jesus was either the son of a God or not. He was either the Christ or he was not the Christ. There is either a hell or there is not a hell. I hav more respect for the opinion of a thorough-bred Christian than for a half-bred Unitarian. Giv me THE TRUTH SEEKER. It comes right out square and denounces the Christian fraud in every way, shape, and manner. It is the same to-day and to-morrow. It is not crying good Lord and good devil, like the Index. Its editor is not an Infidel to-day and "experiences religion" to-morrow. He shows his colors, and does not act the bigot for the sake of popularity. Long may he liv to wield the battle-ax of truth!

ism and Infidelity. If Calvinism has the most truth it ought to be easily shown. He is a learned man and a recognized leader in Calvinism. I am an unlearned man, but a recognized exponent of Infidelity. The great Chancellor ought not to decline a fair discussion with me upon the merits of his belief and mine. If he has anything better, truer, and more reasonable than I hav, let him show it to the world. I certainly will treat him fairly. If he declines this challenge I request him to cease his falsehoods, slanders, and vituperation.

Now, I submit it to you, my readers, and to everybody, whether this will not be far more fair than for him to denounce me in his pulpit and in the hall of the Young Men's Christian Association, where I hav no power to reply. If I hav not the truth he may be able to show me my error. I am certainly honest in the views I hold, and if I hav not the truth I certainly want it. While he is convincing me, he may also convince thousands of others equally in the dark with myself. Is this not worthy of his attention and effort? Our souls are probably about as valuable as anybody's, and it is represented that a single soul is worth more than the whole world. How willingly, then, he ought to labor to save them! I submit it to the gentleman himself whether the holding of such a discussion, by just and equitable rules, would not be far more honorable on his part than to pattern after John Calvin and resort to such ignoble means as malice, revenge, tyranny, defamation, and persecution. It is honestly my opinion that he and his friends hav taken the wrong course in their treatment of myself, even for the good of their own cause. They are making unbelievers faster than believers. There are thousands more of Infidels to-day than there were one year ago. And this bigoted, malicious, and damnable persecution of myself has contributed largely towards it. It has damaged the character, spirit, and history of the Christian church more than anything that it has done in this country since witches were tortured, hung, and burnt for Christ's sake. Dr. Crosby is doubtless naturally an amiable, worthy, and gentlemanly man, but his religion and his manner of defending it has made him what he is.

I hope I am the last man who will be imprisoned in this country for opinion's sake. I believe I am the only one now in prison in the United States on the false, base pretext of "dealing in obscene literature." I hope there may not be another such an outrage. If there is to be, I hope it will not take place until there is a chief executive with the honesty and courage to do his duty in restoring the sufferer to the liberty of which he may be wrongly deprived. Mrs. Hayes and her husband will not always be President; I hope Comstock and his crowd of hypocrites will not always be able to manipulate the administration and mold the laws of our nation and its courts. I do hope that the time will come when the liberty of thought and action, which is the birthright of the people of America, will be truly vouchsafed to them. I hope the next President of this country will be the one the people will elect, and that Joseph Bradley will not hav the making of him. I hav doubtless made some mistakes, but am glad that I hav not the reflection on my mind that I hav dishonestly taken an office to which I was not honestly entitled, and that I hav not by bribery and trickery of friends come into possession of that to which I had no just and legal right. I am glad I hav not drawn $50,000 a year from the government to which I had no honorable or rightful claim. As to the commission of any crime, I am doubly glad my conscience is clear.

My friends, pardon me for my great length; my heart was full, and I wanted to speak my honest feelings I hav done so in part. I wish to say I am going on with my book, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times." It is three-fourths written, and will be completed in four or five weeks. The brave printers in The Truth Seeker office are putting it into type as rapidly as possible. It will probably be out several weeks before I am. I wish every one of you to take a copy who are able to do so. I will make you this still more liberal offer: To every one who orders a copy before it is published and does not find it richly worth $3.00, and they will say so, I will send them in addition three dollars' worth of books and pamphlets; and if they are not satisfied with that, as I liv pretty near the Bible House when I am out of prison, I will send them a copy of the Holy Bible—provided they will not inform Comstock—and they can keep all. The book will be the child of my imprisonment, and I want you all to hav a copy. Who will have the hardihood to say he will take one!

Sincerely your friend, D. M. Bennett.

To the Delinquents.

We hav upon the list a great many who are in arrears. The most are trial subscribers who have not renewed. In conformity with Mr. Bennett's custom we have been sending the paper right along, trusting that those who did not want it would say so, and those who did would renew. By doing this we hav accommodated a great many who are thankful for the same, but at the same time we hav had to pay the bills. The recent and steadily increasing rise in the price of paper will preclude our sending it longer unless our friends promptly renew. We hav to pay over $100 a month more for paper than we did two months ago. Friends will see that we cannot stand the strain. We hope all will promptly come to the front and send in the past dues and renew for as long a time as they can. To all sending in $5.00 we will send The Truth Seeker one year and either of the following $3.00 works "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers," The "Champions of the Church," "Analysis of Religious Belief," "The Great Works of Thomas Paine," "Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated." For $6.00 we will send The Truth Seeker one year and "Supernatural Religion," a $4.00 book.

We would like to hav all our friends take advantage of this offer, as they will get a great deal more than their money's worth. At any rate we wish they would renew for the paper. During the next week we will once more send bills to those subscribers in arrears, after which we cannot send the paper without the money. We dislike very much to take names off the list, as we also dislike to dun our friends, but The Truth Seeker is a very large paper and costs a good deal to run, and it cannot be sent for nothing. We trust that we shall be compelled to take off but very few names. Having been friends so long it is hard to sever the pleasant relationship.

The Paine Celebration in Paine Hall, Boston.

We gave last week a partial account, and now add the business reports and the letters received.

At the recent celebration in this city of the anniversary of Thomas Paine's Birthday, the Paine Memorial Corporation held its first annual business meeting, when the following reports were submitted and acted upon:

REPORT OF THE SECRETARY OF THE PAINE MEMORIAL CORPORATION, FOR THE YEAR ENDING JAN. 29, 1880.

In pursuance of a notice issued by J. P. Mendum to the subscribers of an agreement to associate themselves with the intention of forming a corporation to be known as the Paine Memorial Corporation, the first meeting of said subscribers was held Jan. 29, 1879, and it was there voted to organize for the purpose of purchasing the Paine Memorial property, to pay therefor the sum of $65,000,. to limit the capital stock of the Corporation to that amount, and to accept the Constitution and By-Laws as offered, and the following-named gentlemen were unanimously elected Directors for the ensuing year:

Messrs. Elizur Wright, Horace Seaver, Jacob Bean, Russell Marston, Josiah P. Mendum, John S. Verity, Howell Matson, John A. O'Malley, and Ernest Mendum.

At the same meeting John S. Verity was elected Treasurer, and Ernest Mendum Secretary for one year.

At a meeting of the Directors held Feb. 3, 1879, Elizur Wright was elected President, and Horace Seaver Vice-President of the Corporation.

At a Directors' meeting held Feb. 10th, Messrs. J. S. Verity and E. Mendum resigned their position on the Board in order to fill the offices of Treasurer and Secretary, and Messrs. Moses Hull and John Buntin were elected to fill the vacancies so caused.

At a special Stockholder's meeting, held Sept. 6, 1879, it was voted to purchase the Paine Memorial Building as soon as the Directors were satisfied as to the validity of said property as held by Mr. J. P. Medum, and to pay therefor the sum of $65,000 and accrued expenses since organization, less the income upon said property since said date, and that the Directors make such payment upon the said estate as in their discretion seems advisable. At this meeting there were present 870 votes.

At a Directors' meeting held the same date, it was voted to appoint a committee of three to examine the title of the Paine Memorial Building, and Messrs. Wright, Bean, and Matson were elected to serve on this committee.

At a Directors' meeting held Oct. 13, 1879, said committee report that on examination they find Mr. J. P. Mendum's title to the property perfectly valid, and that the only title to said estate rests in him, subject to a mortgage of $50,000 held by the Massachusetts Hospital Insurance Company.

It was then voted to accept the deed of the property as offered by Mr. J. P. Mendum, and also to accept Mr. F. L. Union as a lessee of the premises for the sum of $3,500 per annum.

Voted, that the Corporation lease to Mr. Josiah P. Mendum for the business purposes of the Boston Investigator such portion of the premises as he now occupies and as are expressed by a plan accompanying the lease.

Voted, that the funds in the hands of the Treasurer, and as fast as they shall come into his possession, shall be applied to the extinguishment of the debt now on the property.

The number of meetings held during the year have been—of Stockholders, 2; Directors, 11; the largest attendance at Directors' meeting, 8; smallest, 5; average, 6 9-11. Number of Stockholders, 223; Officers, 11; Directors, 9.

E. Mendum,
Sec'y of the Paine Memorial Corporation.

Boston, Jan. 29, 1880.

A STATEMENT BY ELIZUR WRIGHT.

To the Stockholders of the Paine Memorial Corporation and the Public: As Chairman of the Corporation's Committee on the title of the Paine Memorial Building in Boston, it is proper for me to say that before accepting the estate on behalf of the Corporation, the history of the building and all transactions in regard to it were fully investtgated, and competent legal advice was taken, of which I herewith present a copy. The fact that certain malcontents have reported to the newspapers rather than the courts, is of itself pretty good evidence that no legal or equitable rights have been trespassed upon in the transfer of the estate which has so happily secured the noble building to the cause for which Thomas Paine spent his life.

Boston, Feb. 7, 1880. Elizur Wright.

VALIDITY OF THE TITLE.

Boston, Oct. 4, 1878.

Elizur Wright, Esq.—Chairman of Committee on Title to Paine Hall—Dear Sir: The question having been asked me as to my opinion whether or not J. P. Mendum can giv a good title to the estate known as Paine Memorial Hall, I respectfully answer as follows: After the estate was conveyed by Paul to Mendum, Seaver, and Savage, as joint tenants, they made a mortgage to the City Five Cents' Savings Bank for $40,000, which was discharged, and a mortgage made to the Massachusetts Hospital Life Insurance Company for $50,000. Then a mortgage was made to Henry A. Norris, April 20, 1875, which was duly assigned to Owen Jones, May 21, 1875. Then the estate was conveyed to Mendum, Jenkins, Seaver, Underwood, and Robinson, as Trustees, June 15, 1877. This conveyance to the Trustees was made subject to the two mortgages then outstanding, viz., 1st mortgage of $50,000, 2d mortgage of $12,000, with interest on both.

Mr. Jones entered for the purpose of foreclosing his mortgage of $12,000, and sold the estate at public auction on the premises, October 27, 1877, and J. P. Mendum was the purchaser, and the deed was duly executed, and recorded, to him; therefore the only title to the estate is in Mr Mendum, except to the mortgage of $50,000, and any unpaid taxes, and Mr. Mendum can make a good deed and title to the estate. In regard to the question about the Lick Fund, I would say that it was used in the building before any mortgage was made, and properly used; and no liability attaches to the building, and I hav already stated to Mendum, Savage, and Seaver, if there was any liability it was their own personal matter, for which they alone, and not the estate was responsible.

Respectfully yours, Sam'l W. Creech, Jr.

John S. Verity,
Treasurer Paine Memorial Corporation.

Boston, Jan. 29, 1880.

We hav examined above reports, and find them correct.

S. R. Urbino,
Jacob Bean,
Auditors.

The following letter was received from a friend who had been invited to attend the Celebration:

Newburyport, Mass., Jan. 16, 1880.

E. Mendum, Esq.: My Dear Sir: I feel myself greatly honored by the invitation to take part in the next celebration of the birth-day of Thomas Paine. Engagements entered into long ago will prevent my attendance; but I am not the less grateful to your committee for giving me an opportunity to attend.

If ever there lived a disinterested lover of truth, it was Thomas Paine. If ever there lived a true patriot, it was Thomas Paine. He has told us himself what that country was to which he was patriotically bound: "The world is my country, to do good is my religion."

It is not surprising that after the lapse of so many years he should hav so strong a hold upon the affections of the people; for he loved the people, and served them with fidelity and ability all his life. I was told, some time ago, by a bookseller in Nassau street, New York, that more pages of Thomas Paine are annually sold every year in the United States than of any other writer of that generation. And what a writer he was! There are single sentences of his, the publication of which were an important event; because they pierced and mortally wounded the pernicious system of lies at which they were aimed. Thus, Burke's flummery and humbug about Maria Antoinette, and all that system of sham sympathy with picturesque suffering, how completely it is portrayed and killed by Paine's remark, "He pities the plumage, but forgets the dying bird!" There are many such sentences in his works, and sometimes several in a single page.

But the best of him was his perfect courage, his absolute sincerity, and his entire disinterestedness. He truly loved his country; and his country was the human race. His enemies are the enemies of man.

I trust you will all greatly enjoy the occasion.

Very truly yours, James Parton.

Many valuable articles and friendly letters are crowded out of this issue to make room for Mr. Bennett's letter from prison and the reports of Paine celebrations.

The Milwaukee Liberal League celebrated Paine's birthday in fine style. An able and interesting address was delivered by R. C. Spencer, Esq., of that city, in which he made a strong argument in favor of state secularization.

Letters from Friends.

ORISKANY FALLS, N. Y., Jan. 8, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed find three dollars to pay for your paper up to May 14, 1880.

I see that some one has proposed that when your time is out one thousand men meet you at Albany and escort you home and put you on your throne and giv you ten dollars each. You can count me in for one. If I am not there my money will be.

I want you to load your old mortar with love and truth, mixed with a little common sense, and fire right into that den of vipers—Bundy, Abbot, Comstock & Co. You know where they liv, right in the center of hell, along with the Young Men's Concubine Association; and they get their supplies from that great upas tree, the Bible. Now Beecher has been exploring that region of late, and he has found that old upas tree is rotten to the core. Now if you can cut off their supplies they are dead at once; but their tails will wiggle until after sundown.

Yours in love and truth, CHAS. WATERMAN.

ELKLAND, PA., Jan. 26, 1880.

MR. EDITOR: Some twenty years ago I often attended schoolhouse orthodox meetings. Sniveling a little, the sisters would rise up "to stand as a witness for Jesus." Having just finished perusal of THE TRUTH SEEKER of the 17th inst., I wish to testify to the editorial ability of E. Macdonald, who is so triumphantly piloting that paper; also to the good sense and clear, sound logic of many of the contributors.

D. M. Bennett has our admiration, esteem, love, and sympathy for the great wrongs now being endured. His wrongs hav pledged our life to freedom's cause, and embittered us still more against the tyrannical system which instigated and accomplished his arrest and imprisonment.

With T. C. Leland we clasp hands; our greetings, hail! and hearty welcome, noble worker! and to Prof. Jamieson, glorious is your triumph over the Rev. J. Ditzler!

To A. Allen Noe, John A. Jost, and B. W. Franklin we say, Falter not to wield the pen so mightily, more potent than the sword. By it shackles, fetters, are cleft in twain, and man educated to look upward. THE TRUTH SEEKER is the white-winged dove of peace, herald of mankind's deliverance. GRACE L. PARKHURST.

BOZEMAN, MONTANA, Jan. 8, 1880.

FRIEND BENNETT: In looking upon the attack of Bundy & Co. it does seem to me that one cannot help seeing envy and malice implied. I think they should hav attached the 109th Psalm to their extra five thousand in order to make themselves clearly understood.

Inclosed find renewal of subscription to paper for another year. BYRON PLUM.

FLORENCE, MO.

E. M. MACDONALD: Young friend, I feel just like saying something to somebody, and I wish to say it in this paper; but don't know that I hav anything to enlist your attention, as I hav no complaint to make against the editor, nothing to dictate to him, nor do I wish to repeat the story about Abbot, Bundy & Co., but I wish to speak of Spiritualism, ex-reverends, and obscenity.

As to Spiritualism, I know but little about it, only what I hav learned from your paper. But I hav learned to regard it as a species of Christianity, and its members—the representative ones—dogmatic and dictatorial, and disposed to rule or ruin. They boast too much of their Liberalism, and show too little of it.

And for the ex-reverends, I think there are two phases, neither of which can reflect much credit upon them. First, if they were sincere while dispensing the gospel, they were so ignorant and stupid as to take the most glaring contradictions for jeweled truth, and the most horrible barbarity for infinite kindness, and the most abject and groveling fear for the most dignified reverence, which shows a lack of some substantial principle, and renders them unreliable as leaders or teachers. In the second place, if they were playing the hypocrite to please Mrs. Grundy, or for position or money, we hav no good reason to believe they are sincere Liberals; consequently, instead of being the "best class" of Liberals they certainly are the poorest class, and entitled to the least respect, and should not be dictating to THE TRUTH SEEKER or E. M. Macdonald.

I would like to giv some criticisms on that insolent, bigoted letter written by C. E. Kinman, but hav not time now, so I will leave the reverends here.

Now for the obscenity—if there be such a thing. I am opposed to any laws for suppressing it, either national, state, or municipal, because it is meddling with our morals, which are private property, and none of the law-makers' business. Besides it would destroy the right of individualism, or private judgment. Our law-makers hav the same right to define and enforce orthodoxy that they hav to define and enforce morality. Consequently this continual howl about "real obscenity"—which I think comes mostly from Spiritualists—is inconsistent and useless; besides it looks like bowing to Mrs. Grundy.

What we want and need is books teaching the Malthusian doctrine, and I think E. M. Macdonald is the man to write them. That "Plea for the Unborn" should immortalize his name. I remain hopefully yours,

ROBERT G. RICHARDSON.

AN OPEN LETTER TO F. E. ABBOT.

PIEDRA P. O., COL., Jan 15, 1880.

F. E. ABBOT, ESQ., Sir: The specimen copy of the Index came to hand only a few days since, delayed doubtless by the heavy snow in the mountains over which the mail has to travel to reach this section. I hav carefully perused the scurrilous attack of Bundy, the letters of D. M. Bennett to this paragon of female virtue and innocence, etc.

But I had already forgiven Bennett; indeed I could do no less. He humbly craved pardon of the Liberal public and his patrons; and while I regret that Bennett should hav proved too weak to resist such a temptation, that has turned thousands of good men from the paths of rectitude and virtue, I must say that I regard him as far superior to men who, through personal spite and malice, seek to destroy a man who was helpless at the time and unable to strike back.

I hav heard but one expression from Liberals in this section in regard to your course, and that is one of contempt. Your pretense of exposing Bennett's shortcomings in the interest of public morals is entirely too thin; the most casual observer cannot fail to discover the most inveterate and malignant hatred at the bottom of the matter.

An outraged Liberal public has freely and unconditionally forgiven Mr. Bennett because he has had the moral courage and nobility of character to confess that he has "loved not wisely but too well." 'Tis said that it were better to love, even though it were unwisely, than never to hav loved at all. The world will forgive an illegitimate love quicker than a premeditated hatred, yet I've no doubt that an outraged Liberal public will forgive you when you shall frankly and humbly confess to having wickedly and designedly attempted to destroy a good man's usefulness and to overturn Freethought itself. Your hatred is unwise and will prove too much. Mark the prediction.

J. ALLEN EVANS.

CARTHAGE, MO., Jan 4, 1880.

EDITOR OF THE TRUTH SEEKER, Sir: I hav just finished reading the last number of your valuable paper. For 1879 I hav all the numbers but one. Their looks show that they hav been read by many.

As I glance them over this afternoon and behold the vast store of information I hav received for so small a sum, I feel that words are inadequate to express my gratitude to one who has labored so earnestly for the advancement of knowledge, liberty, brotherhood, and humanity, and whose reward has been imprisonment. I also feel that I want to shake hands with many of the noble writers, but most of all Elmina Slenker. I want to say to her that her noble utterances hav endeared her to the hearts of her sisters, and we eagerly peruse any article bearing her name. A happy and peaceful New Year to you, my sister!

Just as surely as the year 1879 has winged her flight into the regions of the past, so surely shall the year 1880 follow. And as the past year will linger in the memory of a nation as one in which a martyr was imprisoned for the cause of right, then scourged by the lash of venom and slander, and stoned by those living in glass houses, so may the new year which has dawned upon us be remembered by our brother being restored to his just rights and united to his family.

May the cause for which you hav labored be prosperous, and may you triumph over your enemies by winning them by your noble example to work with you hand in hand for progression and humanity. With the sympathy and well wishes of a friend, JULIA E. VANAMAN.

CONNEAUT, O., Jan. 30, 1880.

EDITOR TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find draft for $5—$3 is to pay one-hundredth part of Mr. Bennett's fine, as I proposed some time ago; the remainder let stand to my credit. I may want you to send the paper on trial three months to some one, or want a book or some pamphlets. If nothing is called for within six months call it yours; it will help the cause all the same.

Hoping Mr. Bennett will not be the loser by his imprisonment, either physically, morally, or financially, and that when released he will be better fitted to fight his foes both in and out of the church, I remain, Respectfully yours, D. CUMMINS.

COLON, MICH., FEB. 5, 1880.

MRS. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Madam: Inclosed find $5 which credit on my subscription to THE TRUTH SEEKER. "Long may it wave!" as was sung of the original banner of liberty. I consider it the best Liberal paper published in the world.

My wife and I hav just returned from a trip of more than two thousand miles through Illinois, Missouri, Kansas, and Arkansas, and we are surprised to find how broad the wave of Freethought has spread over our great country. It is a fact that education is the ban of the church. Educate the children of the present generation unbiased by sectarianism, and the orthodox church pews will remain empty. Reason and common sense accept nothing but the natural religion, the rule of moral rights of man, the Golden Rule, as taught by all the great teachers of the past ages untrammeled by bigotry and superstition.

Oh, how I long for the time when the noble Bennett will be freed from durance vile! I seem now already to see his calumniators shrink beneath his castigations. The car of time is rolling on, and his readers are all waiting to welcome him at the station as he steps out upon the platform.

Yours ever, A. J. KIRNN, M. D.

AUBURN, N. Y., Feb. 2, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Having returned home very recently from a business trip, I found several copies of your valuable paper awaiting me, which fully met my sanguine expectations. I hope and trust that all your subscribers are just as anxious for the speedy transmission of your paper, which is doing so very much for humanity, as I am. I think that I can see that each edition is an improvement on the one preceding it, that no pains nor expense is being spared to make it the best, noblest, and grandest Liberal journal in the world. I will ask, Are the Christians aware of its vast, wide-spreading circulation? Are they aware of the millions of square miles of territory lying stretched out from the Passamaquoddy to the San Francisco, from the Itasca to the Delta, over which the tidal and irresistible wave of humanity's religion is dashing, having for its creed universal mental freedom, with all the great principles of justice and nature's immutable laws inborn, inwrought, and developed all through the wide and deep channels of its philanthropic and Materialistic organization? and that we, hundreds of thousands or staunch, out-spoken Liberals of America, protectors of human rights and personal liberties, now forming the compact rank and file of the grand Liberal army, defy Anthony Comstock, the noted cooing stool-pigeon of the "total depravity" and infant-skull-paved, lamp-black, and smoky, hell-believing orthodoxy, to suppress through the United States mails, all over this our country, the rapid transmission of our powerful and influential advocate, THE TRUTH SEEKER? Nay, but it shall go forth throughout the length and breadth of independent Columbia, from Dan unto Beersheba, proclaiming the truth (not the orthodox "revealed truth") upon all subjects, whether religious or secular, forever attacking and exposing all fabulous religion of human institution set up to terrify and enslave mankind.

Dear friend Bennett, you are only furthering the glorious work begun and so effectually wrought by our author-hero of the American Revolution, to whose memory is soon to be erected a monument in our western metropolis. He also was cast into a Christian prison one hundred years ago. I think you are the last man that should be imprisoned for opinion's sake and for exercising the inalienable rights of an American citizen. Soon you and your army will proclaim, "The times that tried men's souls are over, and the greatest and completest revolution the world ever knew is gloriously and happily accomplished."

When I read your sixth letter from "Behind the Bars" my heart went out in deep sympathy for you, especially when you spoke concerning your sensibility of the false, cruel, and malicious things said about you by those whom you thought were your friends. But, dear prisoner, rest contented, for even to-day you hav more friends and your paper a much larger circulation than before your false imprisonment. We will not see your paper discontinued nor your business destroyed. You spoke also in relation to your new book, "The Gods and Religions of Ancient Times," that provided there were sufficient orders received to warrant its present publication, you would vigorously push the work towards completion. I hav already large quantities of Liberal productions purchased at your office, but to encourage its speedy publication I herewith pledge you an order for a copy. As soon as completed I will send you postal order for it, or you may forward the same C. O. D. I think it very cheap for so large a book, and judging from the author's previous writings, I believe it will be a scholarly production. I hope you will receive many other orders. I also this day forward Mrs. Elmina D. Slenker, Snowville, Va., a quantity of postage stamps, to be used by her in promoting the Liberal cause, H. L. Green's earnest solicitations having actuated me to do this much toward promulgating truth. Will not all Liberals do this? What a help it would be? Let us work while the day lasts, for now is the accepted time. Hoping this will cheer your soul and make you once more glad, also your family to mingle their joys with yours, I subscribe myself

Sympathetically yours, L. DE WITT GRISWOLD.

GENESEO, ILL., Jan. 2, 1880.

EDITOR OF TRUTH SEEKER, Dear Sir: Away out here in Illinois where the murmur of the Mississippi River is heard, along whose banks reside many of your friends; whose sad thoughts and heartfelt sympathy are with you every hour, and who wish and feel that your paper must liv and its great editor be honored, I write to tell you that your paper is taken in Le Claire, Iowa; and not long ago there was a funeral of Mrs. M. Follette, a very highly-gifted and intellectual lady, at which they read several selections from the "Truth Seeker Tracts" and then sang a song from the "Truth Seeker Collection," all of which had a happy effect. First, it caused many to think there was a new departure from the old time and style of doing things; and second, it had the effect of awakening a spirit of inquiry, and many wanted to see the book and to borrow the tracts. So you see the good work goes on; a small start may grow to be something of importance by and by. As silent as the snowflakes the "Truth Seeker Tracts" are dropping into thousands of families, and as sure as time passes they will bring forth fruit.

God speed the good work, and prosper the cause to which THE TRUTH SEEKER is so earnestly devoted. Be of good cheer. Remember the darkest hour is just before the dawn. When you come forth all nature will look more lovely and smile to greet you, and thousands of hearts will beat lighter and freer when you walk forth again a free man.

OAK GROVE, Jan. 27, 1880.

MR. D. M. BENNETT: Inclosed find $3.50 to pay for my paper for the coming year and a copy of Colonel Ingersoll's lectures. I intend to stick to Bennett. I used to take Col. Bundy's paper, but stopped it several years ago, for Jones, Bundy, and Mrs. A. H. Robinson had a nest of iniquity I did not care to sustain. There used to be five Religios taken at this office, but only one now, and that one will soon be stopped. Yours truly, L. PULSIFER.

SPRINGFIELD, MO., Feb. 1, 1880.

FRIEND MACDONALD: I send you a trial subscription for three months from a friend who for many years has been a reader of the R.-P. Journal, and whose sympathies for Bro. Bennett hav been elicited by the unprincipled conduct of its editor Bundy, thus throwing his influence in favor of THE TRUTH SEEKER and its editor.

I am pleased to see by your paper that a movement is being inaugurated to petition the Legislature of New York to repeal the laws exempting church property and ministers from taxation. I think this is a wise movement, and should be extended throughout the Union. There is certainly no justice in exempting such property from taxation, as it compels in large measure the laborers to support the drones who hav in charge this property.

I can think of no class of humans more selfish and presumptuous, and possessing more cheek, than the clergy. Not being satisfied with all the rights that justly belong to them, they now want to thrust their antiquated creed-book into the public schools, and make this a Christian nation by incorporating their triune God into the Constitution.

So determined are they to rule or ruin that every advantage will be taken of Liberals to accomplish their nefarious purpose. Hitherto the church has proscribed woman's sphere, and bitterly opposed her right to the use of the ballot; but policy now whispers in its ear to grant her this privilege, that it may thereby be enabled to enforce this amendment. To accomplish this end women may at no distant day hav the same immunities politically that men hav by unwittingly becoming the willing dupes of the clergy, to be more securely manacled and completely fettered by the chains of superstition and bigotry.

While I hav always accorded to woman equal political rights with man, and while I cannot dissent from Prof. Jamieson's views as expressed in your issue of Jan. 24th, the granting of this right will in all probability be an additional power in the hands of the clergy for the suppression of free thought and speech. However, it may in the end be the means of producing the revolution in thought so much needed to enable all to rightly understand the ruinous power exerted by the priests and clergy. Let the worst come, if come it must, so that the nation may again find its level. Then, and not till then, may we expect the final triumph of truth and justice over bigotry and superstition—the glorious cause of liberty and progression over the ghastly proscriptive dogmas of the past.

I am truly sorry to learn that Bro. Bennett's health is not good. I wish to cherish ill will to no one, yet I must say I cannot respect the "powers that be" for tacitly submitting to priestly dictation, thus cruelly exposing his health and shortening his precious life. Had I faith in the efficacy of prayer, as I hav in the curative effects of hygieo-therapy, it would be freely administered in alopathic doses until he was again restored to good health. He has my warmest sympathy and most earnest wish for his early freedom from both pain and prison. Yours, for justice and freedom,

J. S. LYON, M. D.

PUEBLO, COL., Jan. 8, 1880.

D. M. BENNETT, Dear Sir: Inclosed please find P. O. order for five dollars, three of which are for THE TRUTH SEEKER, and the balance for Mr. Bennett, whom I more than regret should be imprisoned. I also regret being in arrears. I want to read THE TRUTH SEEKER, and papers like unto it, whilst life lasts. Respectfully, JOHN LYNCH.

This book contains the principal points that Mr. Ingersoll has made against the Pentateuch in all his lectures on that subject. The pamphlets that hav been surreptitiously issued are incorrect, filled with mistakes, and consist of only about fourteen or fifteen pages, while there are two hundred and seventy-five pages in the book just issued. The book is unanswerable in its facts and logic, inimitable in its style, and filled with wit, satire, eloquence, and pathos.

Superstition in all Ages.

By JOHN MESLIER.

A Roman Catholic Priest,

Who, after a pastoral service of thirty years at Etrepigny and But in Champagne, France, wholly abjured religious dogmas, and left as his "Last Will and Testament" to his parishioners, and to the world, to be published after his death, the above-named work, entitled "Common Sense."

This is a powerful work, and is attracting much attention from the Liberal public. No more scathing arraignment of the Christian system has ever been made, not even by Voltaire, as he himself confesses. The following is the opinion of a distinguished Liberal concerning the book:

The work of the honest pastor, Jean Meslier, is the most curious and the most powerful thing of the kind which the last century produced. Thomas Paine's "Age of Reason" is mere milk and water to it, and Voltaire's "Philosophical Dictionary" is a basket of champagne compared with a cask of fourth-proof brandy. You hav done a virtuous and humane act in translating his book so well.

SIXTEEN SAVIORS OR NONE;

OR,

The Explosion of a Great Theological Gun.

By KERSEY GRAVES, of Richmond, Ind. Being a reply to JOHN T. PERRY'S "Sixteen Saviors or One." Two hundred and twenty-four errors are pointed out and thoroughly exposed.

Second Edition.

Mr. Perry, who is the literary editor of the Cincinnati Gazette, is one of the most learned and able critics, and one of the best historical scholars of the age in the orthodox ranks. His work is a review of Kersey Graves' "Sixteen Crucified Saviors." He claims not only to have refuted that work, but to hav answered and overthrown all the leading arguments of the Infidel world against Christianity and the Bible. And Mr. Graves claims to hav met and answered and thoroughly demolished all of Mr. Perry's arguments and positions against Infidelity and in support of orthodoxy. The most interesting and amusing feature of this work of Mr. Graves is his "Ecclesiastical Court," in which he examines all of Mr. Perry's witnesses and authorities, one by one, and arrays them against each other and sometimes against Mr. Perry himself. The witnesses in their cross-examination not only contradict each other and sometimes themselves, but condemn each other, showing some of them are not qualified to act as witnesses in the case. This feature of the work is really laughable. It shows not only the utter failure of Mr. Perry to prove what he designed, but that some of his witnesses seem to turn "state's evidence" against him and testify for Mr. Graves. And in addition to all this, Mr. Graves has cited from many of the ablest authorities of the world an amount of historical testimony against Mr. Perry that is absolutely overwhelming. The work is enlivened by numerous anecdotes illustrative of Mr. Perry's absurdities. One reader pronounces it, "A thunder-blast against Mr. Perry, and a dead shot on orthodoxy, which leaves not a grease spot of either." In the two works will be found the ablest arguments both for orthodoxy and Infidelity. The work comprises about 200 pages.

The Bible of To-day.

By JOHN W. CHADWICK, minister of the Second Unitarian Church, Brooklyn, N. Y. This is undoubtedly one of the most valuable and truthful works that has ever been written on the Bible, and is the first book in the English language that gives an accurate account of age, origin, and character of the various books composing the Jewish Scriptures. The work is candid, learned, and eminently free from prejudice and bitterness. The author consulted largely Kuenen, Robertson, Baur, Ewald, Zeller, Davidson, J. H. Allen, Matthew Arnold, Colenso, Knappert, Reville, Nicholas, Oort Hooykaas, Noyes, Milman, DeWette, Westcott, J. J. Tayler, E. H. Sears, Renan, R. Hanson, Dr. J. Muir, Keim, Schenkel, Dean Stanley, Jowett, R. W. Greg, Emanuel Deutsch, Tregelles, Coquerel, Mackay, Neander, Alger, Prof. Fisher, and others. It is such a digest of all the reliable authorities on the Bible as can no where else be found.

Every person who wishes to know the whole truth about the old Jewish Scriptures should send for this volume. Price, $1.50.

The ground gone over by Mr. Graves in the course of this new work is simply astounding, and the literary labor performed is worthy of receiving the approximate reward of an extensive reading at the hands of the public. In the sixty-six chapters into which the book is divided, almost every question of interest which arises in the mind at the mention of the word BIBLE is considered in that straightforward style which has made the volumes of Mr. Graves so extensively sought after.

What Is the Bible?

BY J. T. SUNDERLAND.

He holds that so-called sacred books are natural products of the human mind, and gives an outline of the origin and growth of the various bibles of the world, drawing analogies between the historical development of the Jewish Bible and other great sacred books, and demonstrating religion to be a larger and richer thing than Jew, Christian, or Pagan has understood. The second chapter is devoted to the Bible, its origin, growth, the men who wrote it, when they wrote it, and why; the third shows the difficulties in the way of the theory of infallibility of the Bible, and their serious increase with the growth of scholarship and science; the fourth treats of its inspiration and revelation, considering its claims as a classic and as the parent of Monotheism. It is a very broad and catholic work, answering the questions which naturally arise in connection with religion, and negating the assumption of an infallible word of God.

STANDARD WORKS.

Published by D. M. BENNETT,
141 Eighth St., New York.

The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers. By D. M. BENNETT, Editor of THE TRUTH SEEKER. Octavo; second edition; enlarged and revised. Being the biographies and important doctrines of the most distinguished teachers, philosophers, reformers, innovators, founders of new schools of thought and religion, disbelievers in current theology, and the deepest thinkers and most active humanitarians of the world, from Menu down through the succeeding three thousand years to our own time. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Champions of the Church: Their Crimes and Persecutions. By D. M. BENNETT. Biographical sketches of eminent Christians, from the time of the reputed founder of Christianity to the present. A companion book to "The World's Sages, Thinkers, and Reformers." Containing a correct history of the distinguished ornaments and diabolical characters of the church. A full account is given of the bloody wars which Christianity has inhumanly waged to spread its rule. It also gives a history of Jesuitism for three centuries. The whole is based upon Christian authorities. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Analysis of Religious Belief. By VISCOUNT AMBERLEY, son of Lord John Russell, who was twice Premier of England. Complete, from the London edition. This remarkable work has attracted unusual attention in England. It is the work of a brilliant young lord of Christian parents, who was brought up in the Christian faith, but who, upon investigation and reflection, became a decided unbeliever; the result of which is the elaborate work here named, the preparation of which occupied him several years. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

The Great Works of Thomas Paine, Complete. New edition. The cheapest and best ever sold. Contains Life of Paine; his theological writings—the Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Erskine, Essay on Dreams, Letter to Camille Jordan, Of the Religion of Deism; his political Writings—Common Sense, The Crisis (Nos. I. to XVI. inclusive), and The Rights of Man. All in one octavo volume, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt, $4.50.

Supernatural Religion: An Inquiry into the Reality of Divine Revelation. Decidedly the ablest work in this line ever published. Probably no work printed in England excited greater interest than this. It was issued anonymously, and the great inquiry was, "Who is the author?" It is most damaging to the claims of Christianity, and its positions and statements have never been refuted by the clergy. It is very scholarly, and enters into the examination of the original Greek in detail and with great exactness. Three 8vo volumes in one, revised and corrected, and accurately reproduced from the latest London edition, which sells at $15.00. The London Times, in speaking of this great work, uses this language: "No book published in the world, at any time or in any age, has had the influence and effect on the thinking part of the community as this work. It has done more to open the eyes of the ignorant and credulous, and sweep away the cobwebs of dogma and superstition, than any other book." Published complete in a volume of 1,000 pages, with a full index, at the following low prices: Cloth, $4; leather, $5; morocco, gilt edges, $5.50.

Nature's Revelations of Character; or, Physiognomy Illustrated. Being the moral and volitive dispositions of mankind as manifested in the human form and countenance. By JOSEPH SIMMS, M.D. This work is the fruit of twenty years' diligent observation of nature, and presents a new and complete analysis and classification of the powers of the human mind and body, together with the physiognomical signs by which every faculty is disclosed. In one volume of 650 8vo pp.; illustrated by 260 cuts. Price, cloth, $3; leather, $4; morocco, gilt edges, $4.50.

Paine's Theological Works. In one volume, comprising Age of Reason, Examination of Prophecies, Reply to Bishop Llandaff, Letter to Mr. Eskine, Essay on Dreams, Of the Religion of Deism, etc., with a Life and fine steel portrait of Paine. Cloth, $1.50.

Common Sense. By THOMAS PAINE. His first and most important political work. Paper, 15 cents.

The Rights of Man. By THOMAS PAINE. Written in defense of his fellowman. A work almost without a peer in the world. Large type. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

Life of Thomas Paine. By CALVIN BLANCHARD. 12mo. Large type, with a fine steel portrait of Paine. Paper, 40 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Heathens of the Heath. By WM. MCDONNELL, author of Exeter Hall. A radical romance. Paper, $1.00; cloth, $1.50.

Career of Religious Ideas: Their Ultimate the Religion of Science. By HUDSON TUTTLE. An able examination of the sources of the past religions of the world. 140 pp. 12mo. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

Thirty Discussions, Bible Stories, Essays, and Lectures. By D. M. BENNETT. Embracing a variety of subjects, the whole making nearly seven hundred pages. The subjects treated can hardly prove uninteresting to the reader. Paper, 75 cents; cloth, $1.00.

The Humphrey-Bennett Discussion. A debate between Rev. G. H. HUMPHREY, Presbyterian clergyman, and D. M. BENNETT, Editor of "The Truth Seeker." Three propositions were discussed, viz: 1. Did unbelievers in the Bible do as much for American independence as believers in it? 2. Has Infidelity done as much as Christianity to promote learning and science? 3. Is there a stronger probability that Infidelity is true than that the Bible is divine? Bennett affirming; Humphrey denying. Cloth (550 pp.), $1.00.

The Burgess-Underwood Debate. Between Prof. O. A. BURGESS, President of the Northwestern Christian University at Indianapolis, Ind., and B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, Mass. Held during four days at Aylmer, Ont., commencing June 29, 1875. Reported by John T. Hawke. FIRST PROPOSITION: "The Christian Religion, as set forth in the New Testament, is true in fact, and of divine origin." Burgess in the affirmative; Underwood in the negative. SECOND PROPOSITION: "The Bible is erroneous in many of its teachings regarding science and morals, and is of human origin." Underwood in the affirmative; Burgess in the negative. 12mo. 188 pp. Price, paper, 50 cents; cloth, 80 cents.

The Creed of Christendom: Its Foundation Contrasted with its Superstructure. By W. R. GREG, author of "Enigmas of Life," "Literary and Social Judgments," etc. F. W. Newman, in speaking of this work in the "Fortnightly Review," says: "Some twelve years ago, in a London drawing-room, one of our most eminent men of science asked, 'Why do not the bishops answer Mr. Greg's Creed of Christendom? They are bound to answer it—if they can.' In the lifetime of the present generation the earliest work at all similar was that of Mr. Charles Hennell, which, in various respects, had great merit; but Mr. Greg, coming later, had the advantage of access to many able German researches, and his work continues the most complete on all sides; to it one may most confidently appeal when assailed by eager Christians with the current commonplaces of their warfare. Since bishops, deans, learned canons, and academic divines do not reply formally to so thorough, clear, and learned a treatise, which has been so long before the public, we have the best of proof attainable that this historical argument—occupying precisely the ground which English academicians have chosen as their own—is unanswerable."

One volume, crown octavo, with complete index. The London edition sold for $5. Price of American edition, cloth, $1.50.

The Underwood-Marples Debate. Between B. F. UNDERWOOD, of Boston, and the Rev. JOHN MARPLES, of Toronto, Ont. Held at Napanee, Ont., in July, 1875. Two propositions discussed: FIRST: "That Atheism, Naturalism, and Modern Skepticism are Illogical and contrary to Reason." SECOND: "The Bible, consisting of the Old and New Testaments, evidences beyond all other books its divine origin." Marples affirms; Underwood denies. Reported in full, and revised by the debaters. 111 pp. Paper, 35 cents; cloth, 60 cents.

Interrogatories to Jehovah. By D. M. BENNETT. A series of close questions upon a great variety of subjects, from the origin of Deity and the universe, the creation of the earth, man, and woman, the flood, the Bible, the old patriarchs and prophets, down to the doctrinal points embraced by the Church. With a full-length portrait of Jehovah according to the Bible. A bold and radical work. 12mo, 250 pp. Paper, 50 cents; cloth, 75 cents.

The Pro and Con of Supernatural Religion; or, An Answer to the Question, Have we a Supernaturally-Revealed, Infallibly-Inspired, and Miraculously-Attested Religion in the World? By E. E. GUILD, ex-Universalist clergyman; together with a sketch of the author. In four parts. Paper, 30 cents; cloth, 50 cents.

Odds and Ends.

AND it is gone! Gone like a breath;
Gone like a white sail seen at night
A moment and then lost to sight;
Gone like a star you gaze upon,
That glimmers to a bead, a speck,
Then softly melts into the dawn,
And all is still and dark as death,
And then you dance around and swear,
And snatch out handfuls of your hair,
Because you bought a "put," a "call,"
And didn't hav no sense at all.

ONLY a pin with gleaming point,
Nestled within a chair;
Only a small boy snickering while
A step is heard on the stair.
Only an upward leap through space,
And a torrent of oaths and screeches,
While the bent pin glistens in the rear
Of the old man's Sunday breeches.

HE took his sled into the road
And, lord a massy! how he slode.
And as he slid he laughing cried
"What fun upon my sled to slide."
And as he laughed, before he knewed,
He from that sliding sled was slude.
Upon the slab where he was laid.
They carved this line, "This boy was slade."

SCRIPTURAL SCAPEGOATS.

In a famous sanctuary an insurance secretary,
Very cool and calm and wary, heard his pastor preach and pray;
And this pious person wondered at denunciation thundered
'Gainst some wretches who had blundered, in a long forgotten day,
And had sadly gone astray.

Then he thought: Our well-paid preacher, like a careful sort of teacher,
Speaks of sinners out of reach, or sins that may be out of date;
But he never hurts our feelings by unseemly harsh revealings
Of the modern style of stealing, under which the rich and great
Rob the people or the state.

'Tis as it should be, surely: we are for religion purely,
And can listen quite demurely to the oft-repeated tale;
For we hav no part or lot in those old sinners, rank and rotten,
Who so scandalously got in scrapes that ought to fill the jail:
Cultured minds default or fail.

Some disciples hav recorded different duty that the Lord did,
When he scorned the rich and sordid, and upheld the poor and meek;
When he scourged the money changers, and explained to Jewish grangers
Points about the sort of dangers that will make the rich men squeak
When the heavenly land they seek.

But the present dispensation sees a vast exaggeration
In the harsh denunciation that is written as the Lord's.
Now the rich man is in favor, salt that loses not its savor,
When the marble cutter's graver his successful life records,
And his heirs divide his hoards.

IT will be remembered at the "Hub" that on Wednesday, the 16th of July last, at 3 P.M., the excessive heat of the day had prepared par-boiled humanity to welcome any change in the atmospheric condition. An hour brought on a change in the shape of a terrible thunder storm, accompanied by a well-developed sample of Western tornadoes. Many lives were lost among the shipping along the Massachusetts coast, and especially in Boston harbor. The damage to glass in the city and vicinity was very heavy. The next day after the storm one firm on Canal street reported the sale of several thousand panes of glass. The whole performance was without a precedent in the memory of the oldest inhabitant. The startling appearance of the sky previous to the bursting of the hail-burdened clouds warned travelers and pedestrians to seek shelter. Among the unfortunate ones caught out in the storm was a Globe reporter, who stepped into a doorway on Hanover street to wait until the heaviest of the shower was over. He had company in that doorway. There were two Chinese "washee-washees" from Howard street, and several less queerious-looking individuals. Rain fell in torrents, followed by great hailstones, which struck the sidewalk and rebounded in the air. Rushing out in the storm the enthusiastic reporter got several specimens, drew a tape-line from his pocket, carefully measured them, and recorded the figures in his memorandum book. Repeating this operation several times, he attracted the attention of the clerks in the office up stairs, who broke off large chunks from the block in the ice-cooler and threw them out, when the reporter measured them carefully, as before, and recorded the result. Everybody in the doorway was awe-struck at the size of the hail-stones, and the Chinamen were exhibiting eyes of unusual roundness and prominence. One of the chaps overhead accidentally dropped the balance of the block of ice—which must hav weighed over thirty pounds—from which some monstrous hail-stones had been chipped; and it came down and landed on the sidewalk with a crash, scattering the rain-water right and left. Just at this instant came that terrific crash of thunder that startled the inhabitants for miles around, and of which the papers made mention next day. This was too much for the terror-stricken Chinamen. They both scooted up the street in the driving storm, yelling in a frantic manner, as they cleared the doorway: "Hoopee up, hellee! Icee wagon comee nekst goo-bye, Johnee."

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress Assembled:

1. The undersigned citizens of the United States respectfully but earnestly remonstrate and petition against any further legislation by your Honorable Bodies, in the form of postal laws or otherwise, which shall have the effect to abridge the freedom of the press and of speech, and the inviolability of the mails.

2. Your petitioners pray that the Postal Laws of the United States may be revised and limited to purely postal purposes and brought clearly within the Constitution, and that all attempts to establish a censorship and espionage over the mails based upon the sentiments and meaning of the matter mailed may be abandoned, and that all fines and imprisonments heretofore imposed under such laws may be repaid or relieved.

3. Your Petitioners respectfully represent that their motive in signing this Petiton is not sympathy with nor a desire to further the evils against which those laws are ostensibiy directed, and which your Petitioners believe can be otherwise obviated, but from the conviction that those laws on the part of the general government are dangerous in themselves, that they have been grievously abused, and that as precedents they plainly fall within warning of President Madison:

"It is proper to take alarm at the first experiment on our liberties. We hold this prudent jealousy to be the first duty of citizens, and one of the noblest characteristics of the late Revolution. The free men of America did not delay until usurped power had strengthened itself by exercise and entangled the question in precedents. They saw all the consequences in the principle, and they avoided the consequences by denying the principle. We revere this lesson too much soon to forget it."

Your petitioners therefore earnestly submit that those laws should be repealed or limited to strictly postal purposes, and that the criminal or other objects of government sought to be attained by them should be attained by the ordinary course of governmental administration.

And your petitioners will ever pray, etc., etc.

JEALOUSY is the hight of egotism, self-love, and the irritation of a false vanity.—Balzac.

FOR virtue's self may too much zeal be had,
The worst of madness is a saint run mad.—Pope.

FOR a cloak, what is there that can be
So difficult to pierce as gayety?—L. E. Landon.

THERE are no better prudes than the women who have some little secret to hide.—George Sand.

TRUTH is the most powerful thing in the world, since fiction can only please us by its resemblance to it.

TRUTH will ever be the predominant passion of man; if he loves error, it is because he considers error as truth.—Chateaubriand.

TO SUCCEED in the world it is much more necessary to possess the penetration to discern who is a fool than to discover who is a clever man.

LOVE, purity, kindness, and morality are gradually becoming more and more universal among intelligent and enlightened nations, and when a new code of laws and a new system of belief take the place of the Mosaic code and the Christian system, there will be a far more rapid evolution towards real goodness and pure lives.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

THE sea is like a human life,
It breaks upon the shore
Of Time with a resistless might,
And, when the goal is just in sight,
Dies—to return no more.

And all along the shores of Time
Full many a wreck doth lie;
The pangs of many a mad carouse,
Of blasted hopes and broken vows,
Of happy days gone by.

AS TO Freelove, I do not indorse it, neither do I think if society were ripe for it, that it would result in lust or immorality. Any one who has studied the subject on all sides must see that freedom is right always, if taken in the abstract; but men are so ilv taught that they need care, restraint, and guidance, and perhaps always will. But if a few people are so organized and circumstanced as to be able to liv above the law, I am willing they should do so and fear no "terrific scenes of crime, debauchery, and licentiousness" as a result.

MY believing friend, it is just as impossible for me to tell thee why the sugar exists in the sugar-producing vegetable and not in others, and why salt is produced in some localities and not in others, and why some fruits are sweet and others sour, etc., etc., as thee would find it to be to inform me of the true reasons for these phenomena. Thee may say they are so because a God so created them, and I may say they are so from laws inherent in the materials of which they are composed which attract certain properties and not others. Yet neither of us can go to the bottom and tell all the whys and wherefores. We know it is a fact, and know that no power in the universe can change one single law of nature. Now, if there was an omnipotent God he could do this: he could make men who could walk without limbs and fly without wings; he could make gods more peaceable than himself; he could do impossibilities of all kinds; if not, he would not be omnipotent.—Elmina Drake Slenker.

THE GREAT SPECIALIST,

Treats all Private, Chronic, and Sexual Diseases with unprecedented success. The thousands of cures he is performing annually substantiate this fact. He has at this moment patients in every State of the Union and in the British Provinces. Every reader of this who has any affection of the Head, Throat, Lungs, Heart, Stomach, Liver, Kidneys, Bladder, Bowels, Womb, Genital Organs, Rheumatic or Neuralgic Difficulties, or Eruptions of the Skin, Blood Impurities, Tumors, Cancers, or any Nervous Affections, or diseases of the Eye or Ear, are invited to write to Dr. Fellows, whose system of practice is entirely original, omitting all Drugs and Mineral Medicines of both the Old and New schools, hence reliable. The Doctor's crowning medical achievement has been in the discovery of an external or outside application for the permanent cure of Spermatorrhœa and Impotency as the result of self-abuse in youth, sexual excess in maturer years, and other causes, producing some of the following effects: Nervousness, Seminal Emissions (night emissions, by dreams), Dimness of Sight, Defective memory, Physical Decay, Pimples on Face, Aversion to Society of Females, Confusion of Ideas, Loss of Sexual Power, etc., etc., rendering marriage improper or unhappy.

Dr. Fellows has prescribed his external remedy for 1,500 cases without a failure to cure in a single case, and some of them were in a terribly shattered condition; had been in the insane asylums, many had Falling Sickness—Fits; others upon the verge of Consumption; while others again had become Foolish and hardly able to take care of themselves. For further information address, with two 3-cent stamps, Vineland, New Jersey, where Doctor R. P. Fellows is permanently located, and obtain his private circular on "Spermatorrhœa and its Cure," or, if afflicted with other complaints, his large circular treating on the above-named chronic diseases, both containing sworn evidences, which is convincing and positive testimony to the Doctor's great skill. In order that all can avail themselves of his services he has placed his terms at a very reasonable figure.

[From the Denver (Col.) Rocky Mountain Herald.]

"Dr. Fellows is a successful specialist for all the diseases which he claims to cure, such as chronic and sexual complaints. His wonderful skill and success are bringing him hundreds of cases weekly by letter and otherwise from all over the United States."

[From The Boston Investigator.]

"Dr. Fellows is a physician of superior education and extensive practice in private, chronic, and sexual diseases. We don't see any need of priests for anything, but as a good DOCTOR is, in our eyes, a benefactor of mankind, we would advise the reader if he has got any of the diseases mentioned, and doesn't want to keep them, let him write to Dr. Fellows, and obtain health which is better than fortune, political office, or even religion.

THE POCASSET TRAGEDY THE LEGITIMATE FRUITS OF CHRISTIANITY.

A Discourse by

WILLIAM DENTON.

This is the masterly lecture reprinted in THE TRUTH SEEKER. It is the best on the subject, and shows in the clearest manner that that sad tragedy was but the to-be-looked-for outcome of the teaching of the Bible.

Price 10 cents. D. M. BENNETT, 141 Eighth Street, N. Y. City.

Freethinkers' Badge Pin.

The cut shows the design and size of the badge, but not its beauty. The whole badge is intended to signify symbolically that the "world moves," and that "universal mental liberty" is being spread over the world by the "leaves of learning." Badges made of heavy gold plate; price of single badge, package registered and postage paid, $1.25. Club of one dozen or more, ordered to one address, package registered and postage paid, $1.10 each. Remit by P. O. order or registered letter. For fractional parts of a dollar, postage stamps of the denomination of one, three, and ten cents taken. Orders filled in the order of their application. Badges to be had only from the patentee, LUCY L. CHURCHILL, West Richfield, Summit Co., Ohio.

SALAMANCA, N. Y., Dec. 23, 1878.

MISS CHURCHILL: I am much pleased with your "Freethinkers' Badge Pin." It is a splendid design, and every Freethinker and member of the Liberal League should hav one and wear it "to be seen of men," and women too, and thus "let their light shine." Send me one as soon as they are completed. H. L. GREEN.

NEWBURYPORT, MASS., May 19, 1879.

MY DEAR MADAM: Your idea of an external and visible sign for the friends of mental liberty, to exhibit to one another on their persons, seems to me very good. In union there is strength. In union there is also conscious strength, i. e., courage. A quiet, pretty badge, such as you propose, can certainly do no harm, I should like to wear one. But it must be pleasing; for part of our mission is to promote beauty everywhere and in all things. To make the world beautiful, and the human life in it beautiful, are the vast results of liberty. We must do nothing ugly, think nothing ugly, feel nothing ugly, wear nothing ugly.

Very truly yours, JAMES PARTON.

Notes and Clippings.

SEVEN churches hav been destroyed in Sicily by order of the authorities.

IF Samson had been like J. C. Bundy he never would hav suffered shame and defeat by having his hair cut.

DR. EDWARD EGGLESTON says that "probably one-half the effort put forth in Sunday-school work is wasted, and some of it worse than wasted."

OWING to the recent heavy advances in the price of paper, the Chicago Times has increased the subscription price of that paper twenty per cent.

AN Englishman writes to the London Times that there was not a total abstainer from strong drink among the American Episcopal bishops who attended the Pan-Anglican Congress.

THE Rev. Joe Cook is attacking Rev. Phillips Brooks, the Rev. Edward Everett Hale, and the Rev. James Freeman Clarke, because they hav joined the St. Botolph, a club which furnishes liquors and segars.

IN the town of Minerva, N. Y., a Catholic Irishman joined the Methodist church. The Irish flew at him and swore they would kill him. He had to be protected by the authorities, and finally, to save his life, he went back into the Catholic church.

COL. INGERSOLL says that on account of his Infidelity he loses the company of a good many fools, and that he has noticed that people who hav the smallest souls make the greatest fuss about getting them saved.

FATHER DANNEHOFFER, a Roman Catholic pastor at Morris, Ind., was fined $10 by a judge for whipping a pupil in the parochial school. He carried the case to the highest court possible, and is now compelled to pay the original fine and $400 costs.

THE case of Infidelity vs. Christianity came on for a final hearing at Neosho Falls on the 24th of this current month. A. O. Phelps appeared for the plaintiff, while D. M. Mitchell had been promised to conduct the defence. The defendent, either in person or by counsel, failed to appear, and the case went by default.

"Where, oh where was David Mitchell?
Where, oh where was David Mitchell?
Where, oh where was David Mitchell?"
"Safe over in another town."
—Burlington Independent.

DR. PRUDEN walked into a prayer-meeting at Benton, Minn., with an open Bible in one hand and a cocked pistol in the other. He said there had been altogether too much controversy over the meaning of a certain scriptural passage, and that he meant to kill anybody who differed with him on the subject. He was hurried off to an insane asylum.

WHILE the Baptist preachers are trying to make up their minds what to do with Baptist girls who dance, the girls will probably go on dancing, after the manner of the light-hearted and light-footed youth, without puzzling their young brains too much over what seems to them the incomprehensible prejudice of their pastors against that amusement. It might be worth while for the preachers, before they resume the discussion, to consult the girls and hear what they hav to say.

THE "business boom" has struck the newspapers a backhanded blow. The cost of white paper has advanced thirty-five per cent, and there hav been advances in all the other departments. The cost of publishing a newspaper now is already a third greater than it was six months ago. In St. Louis all the papers except the Post-Dispatch hav raised their prices to $3.60 per year, and the chances are that if the cost of publication increases, or even continues at the present rate, there will be a general advance.—Denver Tribune.

THE Society for the Prevention of Crime in New York has taken to dogging men in the streets and prying into their private affairs by means of hired spies. It professes to hav the names of some very respectable parties whom it has caught frequenting houses of ill-repute, and it proposes to use them, if necessary, in suppressing such places. Undoubtedly all questionable places, except those patronized by the deacons, the jolly fat parsons, and members of the Y. M. C. A., will be closed immediately.

THE Presbyterian says that the Independent is dissatisfied with the account of the creation in Genesis, and that it is getting quite as much dissatisfied with the New Testament. The "Congregation of the Index" has issued a decree placing a number of works on the Index Expurgatorius, among which are "The Religion of the Future," by Count Terenzio Mamiani, and a "Critical Essay on the Revelations," by Jonathan Heverley, of Charleston, S. C., which is included by Count Mamiana in an appendix to his own work.

SEVERAL ministers in New York Sunday last preached against the espionage system of the New York Society for the Prevention of Crime. The Rev. Wm. Lloyd was applauded in the Madison avenue Presbyterian church when he said: "It is our duty to bear one another's burdens, to throw the mantle of charity over the errors of others, and not to appoint church committees to smell them out. My whole soul revolts at that which is against the very genius of religion. I do not believe that any society calling itself a Society for the Prevention of Crime has any right to send its emissaries into the very places where men fall and tempt men to break the law that they may prosecute them."

WEST PAWLET, VT., has a militant minister. He joined the Debating Club, and when they had the question of the Bible in the public schools to discuss, he refused to attend, and now he has been inquiring around to find out who said that "Jesus Christ was nothing but a tramp." He would do better to attend the lyceums and hear what is said. He is also greatly enraged to think that the Spiritualists and Liberals would dare to hold a convention at West Pawlet. He says he is going to do all he can to stop it. Nevertheless the Convention will come off on Feb. 20th, 21st, and 22d, as advertised, and it will take more than one Frenchman to stop it.

MR. JONES of Oswego county is either a remarkably pious man or something else. A week ago Mrs. Jones suddenly closed her eyes, and has not opened them or given any other sign of life since. But, on the other hand, the physical changes which usually follow death hav not shown themselves, and many believe it is a case of suspended animation or trance. Naturally, a physician was called in, but when he prepared to administer restoratives, Mr. Jones stopped him. The Lord, Mr. Jones said, had thrown Mrs. Jones into the trance, and if the Lord thought best to bring her out of it, he would do so without the doctor's help. So far as appears, the doctor bowed himself out and left Mrs. Jones to her fate.

MR. H. H. HAYDEN, the Methodist clergyman who is accused of the murder of Mary Stannard, and concerning whose guilt the jury disagreed, was lately released from custody upon giving $5,000 bail, conditioned for his appearance at court when wanted. His counsel became his bondsmen. It is reported that the reverend gentleman has decided not to resume his clerical duties, but that he will sell his autobiography and deliver lectures. That he will not perform the duties of a minister until fully exonorated from all connection with the crime of which he is accused, is as it should be. The sale of his autobiography is well enough but his entry upon the lecture field before the courts are through with him would be highly improper. Piling wood is a very respectable and entirely unobjectionable occupation. The dexterity shown by Mr. Hayden in this branch of industry would seem to point out the woodpile as the place where he can best display his power of mind and body.

IN Philadelphia a society for Christianizing the Jews struggles along its weary and unsatisfactory way, the principal thing it is noted for being that it converts either very few Jews or none at all. During five of the twenty years of the existence of this society there were no conversions reported. The anniversary of the society was held a few days ago. The secretary was ill and was unable to present a formal report, but the statement was made that during the fiscal year then closing he had baptized two infants and two adults. The Jewish Record sharply denounces the society and its work, and says that it positively knows that the secretary was suffering from illness caused by overeating himself at a dinner party. The expenses of the society run from $2,500 to $4,000 a year, being as heavy in years when there are no conversions as when five or six converts are reported. The Episcopal Recorder says that more Jews hav been converted to Christianity in the present age than in any former one, and that the number of converts throughout the world is now about 100,000 a year. The Jewish Record says that this statement is false, and that it was invented by some pious fraud.
